And I think we lost ground when we had an opportunity in the beginning to freeze the situation and gain control, and we let all these snakes come out.

RUSSERT: In your book, and I'll quote from it, The Battle for Peace, it says, quote, Our current war in Iraq may be turning into a repetition of Vietnam. The military out there goes from operation to operation; our leaders in Washington assure us we are powering ahead from success to success; yet our young 19 or 20-year-old soldiers are now asking hard questions, 'I can win any battle. But am I winning this war?'

I've heard these questions before in Vietnam. The answer there was, 'No.'

My answer for Iraq is, 'I don't know.' Nobody can tell our soldiers if they're winning or not. But the parallels are disturbing.

Explain.

ZINNI: Well, you can see almost every day on T.V, a young lieutenant colonel, colonel, a young sergeant that's out there trying to make a difference, that tells you that in this village, in this province, my unit is connecting to the people. We're trying hard.

The frustration is they leave, and the next unit in may not repeat it. They're successful, but there is no national program that takes hold.

All their efforts out there at the local level, the successes that they're trying to achieve on the scene, aren't solidified into some national movement forward.

The remarkable similarities to Vietnam is I saw in places in Vietnam where we were making a difference in the villages, where we had programs that innovative commanders were exercising, where there were troops that were dedicated to changing the life of the Vietnamese.

Meanwhile, back in Saigon, we had the revolving generals -- coup after coup -- while we sat there and watched. And this wasn't the kind of government that the people felt they could risk their lives for.

What I'm saying is don't mistake the efforts of the troops on the ground. We just saw Colonel McMasters, Tal Afar. We know General Petraeus, General Mattis, others that have made a difference on the ground.

But that's like putting your foot in a bucket of water. You pull it out and no one is going to know you were there, unless there is a national program, a belief in that government in Baghdad, a hope for the future, a belief that staying together as a united Iraq is better for these people in the long run.

That has to come from a strategic plan, from a set of policies emerging out of Washington and Baghdad. It isn't going to be built from the bottom up, from the Anbar Provinces and Ramadis, and the Mosuls out there.

RUSSERT: Do you believe the American media is distorting the news from Iraq or presenting an accurate picture?

ZINNI: Well, I think the American media is being made a scapegoat for what's going on out there.

At last count I think something like 80 journalists have been killed in Iraq. It's hard to get outside the green zone and not risk your life or risk kidnapping at a minimum to get the story.

And it's hard to blame the media for no good stories when the security situation is such that they can't even go out and get the good stories without risking their lives.

And you have to remember that it's hard to dwell on the good things when the bad things are so overwhelmingly traumatic and catastrophic.

So I think that's an unfair blame that's put on the media. I think that there probably are good things at the lower level, but are they balanced out by the bad things that are happening? All the good things happening out there will mean nothing if this unity government doesn't come together.

RUSSERT: I want to bring you back to a book you co-wrote with Tom Clancy called Battle Ready. And you wrote this, In the lead-up to the Iraq war and its later conduct, I saw, at a minimum, true dereliction, negligence, and irresponsibility; at worst, lying, incompetence, and corruption.

That's very serious.

ZINNI: Yes.

RUSSERT: Where did you see that, at what level?

ZINNI: Well, first of all, I saw it in the way the intelligence was being portrayed. I knew the intelligence. I saw it right up to the day of the war.

I was asked at a Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing a month before the war if I thought the threat was imminent. I didn't.

Many of the people that I know that were involved in the intelligence side of this or in the military felt the same way.

I saw the -- what this town is known for, spin, cherry-picking facts, using metaphors to evoke certain emotional responses or shading the context.

We know the mushroom clouds and the other things that were all described that the media has covered well.

I saw on the ground a sort of walking away from 10 years' worth of planning. Ever since the end of the first Gulf War, there's been planning by serious officers and planners and others and policies put in place. Ten years' worth of planning were thrown away. Troop levels dismissed out of hand, General Shinseki basically insulted for speaking the truth and giving an honest opinion, the lack of cohesive approach to how we deal with the aftermath, the political, economic, social reconstruction of a nation, which is no small task, a belief in these exiles that anyone in the region, anyone that had any knowledge would tell you were not credible on the ground and on and on and on, decisions to disband the army that were not in the initial plans.

I mean there's a series of disastrous mistakes. We just heard the secretary of state say these were tactical mistakes. These were not tactical mistakes. These were strategic mistakes, mistakes of policies made back here. Don't blame the troops. They're the one that perform the tactics on the ground. They've been magnificent. If anything saves us, it will be them.

RUSSERT: Should someone resign?

ZINNI: Absolutely.

RUSSERT: Who?

ZINNI: Secretary of defense to begin with.

RUSSERT: Anyone else?

ZINNI: Well, I think that we -- those that have been responsible for the planning, for overriding all the efforts that were made in planning before that, that those that stood by and allowed this to happen, that didn't speak out, and there were appropriate ways within the system you can speak out, at Congressional hearings and otherwise. I think they have to be held accountable.

The point is those that are in power now that have been part of this are finding that their time is spent defending the past. And if they have to defend the past, they're unable to make the kinds of changes, adjustments, admit to mistakes and move on.

And that's where we are now, trying to rewrite history, defend the past, ridiculous statements that well, wait 20 years and history will tell you how this turns out.

Well, I don't think anybody wants 20 years to continue like it is now.

RUSSERT: Should the president say to the country, I was wrong about weapons of mass destruction, wrong about troop levels, wrong about the costs of the war, wrong about the level of insurgency, but we need to put all that behind us and come together as a nation because this is too important to lose?

ZINNI: I think the president of the United States ought to certainly say that there were mistakes made at each of those levels. In some cases these were presented to him. May not be necessarily the case that he was wrong. He was given bad information.

Every president in history has held people accountable and moved on. Look at President Lincoln and the conduct of the war. He went through every general till he found Grant.

Senator McCain mentioned Douglas MacArthur. Well, when he screwed up, the president relieved him.

You have to make tough choices. Integrity and getting on with the mission and doing it right is more important than loyalty. Both are great traits, but integrity, honesty and performance and competence have to outweigh, in this business, loyalty.

RUSSERT: I want to bring you back to August 26, 2002, the Veterans of Foreign Wars had a convention, a meeting. Vice President Cheney was the guest speaker. You were honored, as you can see the medal around your neck. This is what the vice president said on that day.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Simply stated, there is no doubt that Saddam Hussein now has weapons of mass destruction. There is no doubt that he is amassing them to use against our friends, against our allies and against us.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RUSSERT: After that event, The Washington Post captured your thinking in a conversation with you, Cheney's certitude bewildered retired Gen. Tony Zinni, 'In my time at Centcom, I watched the intelligence, and never - not once - did it say, 'He has WMD."

Though retired for nearly two years, Zinni says, he remained current on the intelligence through his consulting with the CIA and the military. 'I did consulting work for the agency, right up to the beginning of the war. I never saw anything. I'd say to analysts, 'Where's the threat?' Their response, he recalls was, 'Silence.'

Zinni's concern deepened as Cheney pressed on. Zinni's conclusion as he slowly walked off stage was that the Bush administration was determined to go to war. A moment later, he had another equally chilling thought: 'These guys don't understand what they're getting into.'

Why did you think that on that day?

ZINNI: Well, first of all, prior to that I heard the president say, because these rumors of debates and people pushing for this entry into Iraq, that the president said Well, look, I'm going to listen to the debate and then I'll look at the intelligence.

First of all, I thought that was a little backwards, but I said well, the president hasn't made up his mind to this point. And when he looks at the intelligence, takes an honest look at it, when he hears the debate, he'll realize that this isn't something that should be done now, and it should -- and if you're going to do it, you would do it in a way to try to restart the United Nations process, go back to what President Bush 41 had done.

But what I heard on that stage today -- or that day was not the case of restarting that process in any serious way. I heard the case being built to go to war right away.

And what bothered me, I had been hearing about some of the assumptions on the planning, dismissal of the previous plans, and I was hearing a depiction of the intelligence that didn't fit what I knew.

There was no solid proof that I ever saw that Saddam had WMD.

Now, I'd be the first to say we had to assume he had WMD leftover that wasn't accounted for, artillery rounds, chemical rounds, a scud missile or two.

But these things over time degrade. These things did not present operationally, strategic level threats at best.

Plus, we were watching a Saddam with an army that had caved in. It was nothing like the Gulf War army. It was a shell of its former self. We knew we could go through it quickly. We had stripped away his air defenses. He was at our mercy. We had air superiority before we even -- or actually air supremacy before we would even start an operation.

So to say this threat was imminent or grave and gathering seemed like a great exaggeration to me.

RUSSERT: The president, the secretary of state all said he was not contained, he was not in a box, that he was a mad man.

ZINNI: Well, I think that is an insult to the troops who, for 10 years, ran the containment. Those brave pilots that flew the no-fly zones, the sailors that enforced the maritime intercept operations, our soldiers and Marines that were on the ground out there, that responded to every crisis, our support for the efforts of the inspectors that were in there.

We had less troops on a day-to-day basis out there than go to work at the Pentagon every day doing this. And these were not assigned troops to Centcom. These were troops that rotated in and out. We had allies out there that helped foot the bill for this, $300 million to $500 million supporting us with bases, supporting us with overflight, supporting us with assistance in kind, joining us in places like Somalia and the Balkans when we required coalition troops.

I thought the containment worked remarkably well, and it was a tribute to our troops and how they handled it.

RUSSERT: The overall thesis in your book, The Battle for Peace, you write it this way, The 'Battle for Peace' is not a battle in the classical sense -- a battle that follows the sudden crisis blow that triggers a military conflict. The battle is the constant struggle to develop and build the measures, programs, systems, and institutions that will prevent crisis. The battle is the constant struggle to shape and manage the harmful elements in the environment that generate instabilities.

The 'Battle for Peace' is the battle to achieve a stable world.

The president's dream is democracy around the world and in the Middle East. What happens to countries like Iran, countries like Egypt, Saudi Arabia or in the Palestine area when Hamas is elected.

RUSSERT: Does democracy necessarily bring about a desired result from America's security interest?

ZINNI: Well, first of all, you have to understand how you instill democracy. It isn't an election. An election doesn't equal democracy.

Think about it. We need an educated electorate. We need political parties that are transparent, that people understand their platforms, that compete in a fair process.

We have to have a governmental system that people are voting into and they have to understand that. And then you can have elections. We've sort of reversed the process.

Look what's happened in Iraq. We've had three elections now and we don't have a government yet that can stand up. There aren't people that I think really understood what they voted for.

I saw a scene in Basra, one of the elections where a woman ran in so excited about voting. And then she asked the poll tender, who do I vote for?

And he told her -- he couldn't tell her, but he had to read a list to her of 169 parties. She was confused. When he hit number seven that said the Islamic party of something or other, she said, that's the one.

I mean, is that democracy? Are they voting how they're told at Friday prayers? Are they voting for sectarian leaders that dominate their lives? Do they truly understand what it's all about?

And it's not just democracy. It's economic development. It's social reform. This takes time; it takes an investment from the stable part of the world and the unstable part of the world to establish these.

BLITZER: General Tony Zinni, we thank you for joining us.

ZINNI: Thank you, Tim.

BLITZER: Thank you for Battle for Peace. And we'll be watching.

ZINNI: Thank you, Tim.

RUSSERT: We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RUSSERT: Don't forget you can now watch the entire hour of Meet the Press whenever and wherever you want. Our Meet the Press Web cast, posted each Sunday at 1:00 p.m. Eastern on our Web site, mtp.msnbc.com.

That's all for today. We'll be back next week. If it's Sunday, it's Meet the Press.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. The blessing of the week: journalist Jill Carroll released in Baghdad after three months in captivity. She'll be back in Boston today.

But the big story in Washington remained immigration. Showdown votes in the Senate are expected this week, and our first guest is a key player in the debate, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois. Welcome back to This Week, Senator.

OBAMA: Great to talk to you, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: We know that this issue divides Republicans; it divides the country. It is also beginning to divide Democrats, particularly the provision of the bill that calls for a guest worker, allows 400,000 guest workers into the country.

The head of the AFL-CIO says that's going to harm all workers. Your colleague, Senator Byron Dorgan calls it a corporate strategy to keep wages low.

What do you say to your fellow Democrats?

OBAMA: Well, I think there are three components to this bill and all three are critical. The first is border security, and this bill -- I think we haven't talked enough about the enforcement provisions that are in the bill that came out of the Judiciary Committee. Improving border security, tightening employer sanctions, all those provisions I think are absolutely critical.

The second provision is providing a pathway to citizenship. We've got 11 million to 12 million undocumented workers in the country. We want to regularize their lives, bring them out into the open, make sure that employers are not exploiting them. And that's something I think that is good for all Americans.

The third component is this guest worker program. And I think that that within the Democratic caucus probably generates the most controversy. The numbers that are allowed under the program are about 400,000. That number may be too high. I think it's important, and I'm preparing amendments to make sure that if we have a guest worker program, that it is targeted at those industries like agriculture where it really is difficult to find American workers.

In some cases and in some particular cities there may be worker shortages where this is justified. In others there may not be.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And will you require employers to pay at or above the average wage to make sure that this is not a program that depresses wages?

OBAMA: That would be a provision that I would support. I think a lot of Democrats would support it.

I think the broader story here is that the American people have a pretty good common sense approach to immigration. I think they recognize that we're a nation of immigrants. I think they want to continue that legacy.

What I think they're concerned about is that if there is no legal process whereby immigrants are coming here, and you have these horrendous heartbreaking stories of people coming across the border, many of them putting themselves at risk where they're living in the shadows and potentially being abused by employers, that's something that I think concerns them.

They're willing to provide a pathway to citizenship, earned citizenship that takes 11 years and requires at least 10 criteria. They're willing to go along as long as they feel the borders are actually secured and people aren't being exploited.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But a lot of people are going to get hurt. A Harvard economist, George Borjas, has shown that low income workers, especially high school dropouts, lose about 8 percent of their income because of immigrants, and there is particular concern that this is going to really hurt the African-American community.

I saw Professor Ron Walters of University of Maryland as quoted in The New York Times this morning saying that this is causing great angst among African-American leadership. It's not just a black problem, he says, but we are the most acutely affected. The fact is it's hurting us.

OBAMA: Well, look, I don't think there's any doubt that low- skill workers of every race are having problems right now because of globalization.

There may be some modest impact on employment rates or wages at the very bottom of the skills levels as a consequence of undocumented workers in particular areas. Part of that is because an undocumented worker has no legal status, and so they're vulnerable to being exploited and wages are further depressed.

The more that we can get those folks subject to existing rules, minimum wage laws, making sure that worker safety laws are overseen and so forth, then the costs of hiring undocumented workers actually increases, and that will potentially have a salutary impact on all workers.

But here's one thing that I want to make sure, that we're not using this debate to further divide African-American workers who are struggling, and Latino or Polish or Ukrainian workers who are struggling. They're all struggling.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But isn't that what's going to happen?

OBAMA: Well, no, look, if anybody thinks that the problem of unemployment among African-American youth in inner city Baltimore or Los Angeles or Chicago is somehow caused by illegal immigration, then I don't think they're looking at the larger trends. The fact of the matter is that we have got a whole host of issues within the African- American community that have to be dealt with, and employers do need to systemically reach out to these groups -- something that's not being done -- but the reason they're not is not because of undocumented workers.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've mentioned a couple of times this pathway to what you called earned citizenship. As you know, the opponents of that call it amnesty. And one of the proposals that's going to be talked about this week is suggesting that anyone who is here will first have to go home before they can be put on that pathway, whether they're illegals here or part of the guest worker program. Can you go along with that?

OBAMA: I cannot, George, because nobody who makes these proposals has explained to me a realistic mechanism whereby we're going to ship 11 to 12 million people out of the country. People who are neighbors, people who have children in the schools all across the country, people who are workers in vital industries -- the notion that somehow these 12 million people are going to get on a bus and go back across the border just isn't realistic, and I think that what we have to acknowledge is that these are people who came to this country for the same reason that most of our parents, grandparents, great grandparents came to this country, in search for a better life. They didn't follow the rules for legal immigration, but these are not people who have done us harm, or are lawbreakers, or came here for nefarious reasons. They came here in search of a better life.

We need to figure out how can we create a system of serious border enforcement, how can we make sure that employers are not taking advantage of the porous borders that we have. So I think that employer sanctions that are serious and serious verification systems that can't be ignored the way they are right now is absolutely critical, and then we have to say to the 11 million to 12 million people who are already here and are working alongside us and living alongside us, let's make sure that you are not a permanent underclass, that rather you're part of the broader American community.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senate's going to pass a bill this week?

OBAMA: I think that it is going to be close. I think we have a majority for a bill along the lines that came out of the Judiciary Committee. What I'm not yet certain of is whether we have a 60-vote majority. It is possible that opponents of the legislation mount a filibuster.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to Iraq. Secretary of State Rice landed in Baghdad this morning with British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, trying to push the different Iraqi factions into an agreement on a government. Basically, it looks like the United States is trying to push the current prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, out. Several of your Democratic colleagues have said, if the Iraqis don't create a government within the next four or five weeks, then the U.S. has to reassess its whole position.
Should Secretary Rice be telling the Iraqis, if you can't get it together, you cannot count on U.S. military support? We're going to have to reassess?

OBAMA: Absolutely. Look, I traveled there in January, and my assessment coming back was there is no military solution to this problem. There's only a political solution to this problem. The Shias, the Kurds, the Sunnis, they have to make a decision that they want to live together. We cannot enforce unity in Iraq through military means. We can be a useful partner to them as they are rebuilding their country.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But are you willing to say...

OBAMA: But so far...

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... that we should pull out if they don't get their act together?

OBAMA: I think that we should condition our continued presence there on them -- their willingness to work together in a non-sectarian fashion, and that means some very concrete things. It means, for example, that the security apparatus can't be controlled by sectarians. We can't have a Ministry of the Interior, that controls the police, that is using that as an extension of the militias and rounding up Sunnis and being involved in executions or kidnappings. That is not something we can be party to, and we just can't be successful.

It is not fair for us to put our brave young men and women who have been doing an outstanding job in Iraq, put them in a position where they are caught up in the middle of a civil war. We can't prevent a civil war militarily if there's not a willingness on the part of the leadership there to get their act together.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Obama, thank you very much.

OBAMA: Thank you, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Republican George Allen and the roundtable are next. And later, George Will, one on one with Jimmy Rollins.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WILL: Some people think baseball's hardest record to break, Joe DiMaggio's 56-game hitting streak. Going to break it?

ROLLINS: Oh, definitely. That's how I feel. That's the only way I can go about it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we are back with Virginia Senator George Allen. Welcome back to This Week, sir.

ALLEN: Good to be with you this morning, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You heard Senator Barack Obama there describe a path towards what he calls earned citizenship. Is that amnesty to you?

ALLEN: It's rewarding illegal behavior. We're a nation that has welcomed immigrants throughout our history. They have settled, they have built this country. But we're also a nation of laws.

I think it's vitally important that we first and foremost recognize there's a consensus in America that we need to secure our borders, and that's one thing that I hope...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, he's for that. And he said they're going to pay back taxes. They're going to pay fines. That's not a reward, is it?

ALLEN: Well, it allows those who are in here illegally then to get in line to become a citizen. If we have a reward of illegal behavior, all one will get is more illegal behavior. There are many people who have come into this country legally.

They have come in, some work in this country, because this is the land of opportunity. Others have come into this country wanting to become a citizen. My view of the situation is, is that we have neglected, as a government, that first responsibility, and that's to secure the border with more detention facilities rather than the catch-and-release approach.

We need unmanned aerial vehicle, sensors, patrol agents, and all of those -- virtual fences, actual fences...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Are you for the wall? Are you for the House wall, 700 miles?

ALLEN: Well, I think you can have an actual fence in some places. In other places, virtual fences.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But not the 700-mile wall.

ALLEN: Well, I'm not going to get into whether you need 612 miles versus 110 miles, but key areas need to have, I think, an actual fence. But there's other areas where you can use sensors, unmanned aerial vehicles, and we do need more border patrol personnel so that they can go to those areas to round them up.

And of course, the detention centers right now, very few who are actually caught actually go to the detention centers. They're released on their own recognizance, and of course, they never show up again.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So, is it a bottom line for you that anyone here illegally now is going to go home first before they can be put back on a path towards citizenship?

ALLEN: I'm not sure we have a consensus on that yet.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But I'm asking about you, what about you?

ALLEN: All right, here's what I want us to do. I want us to secure our borders. Then it may be several years down the road or months down the road we can get a consensus on how you handle a good temporary worker system. It may be built upon the H2B seasonal worker approach...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me just stop you right there because it sounds like you've just made a little bit of news.

You're saying now basically you want to do what the House of Representatives has done: pass an enforcement and security bill now, no guest worker provision, no pass toward citizenship for illegals here, and then maybe revisit that many years down the road. But you're saying now enforcement and security only?

ALLEN: The one thing we have a consensus on in this country right now is that the United States government has been neglecting its responsibility to secure the border.

In the event that this had been passed several years ago, I think we'd be much further along on what to do in devising a good temporary worker program.

Insofar as the issues and how different amendments will be presented in the upcoming week, I do agree mostly with the Cornyn-Kyl approach, which over a period of time if somebody wants to become a legal citizen they're going to have to return to their home country, and it may be over the next three, four, five years, but then they're going to have to enter legally...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But didn't you just say...

ALLEN: ... Otherwise, George, think of what's going to happen. Look at history: 20 years ago amnesty was given. Here we are 20 some odd years later, there's estimates of anything from 5 million to 15 million in here illegally.

Is this country long-term going to have to go through this exercise every year -- every 20 years with a quandary over, O.K., what do we do with all those who've come in illegally because the message that is sent is that illegal behavior ultimately will be rewarded.
STEPHANOPOULOS: Excuse me, I just want to get a yes or no here because I think you're saying it, but you're not quite willing to say yes or no. You're saying right now pass border security enforcement only this year, push off the guest worker and other proposals for subsequent years. That means you're taking on the president. He says he wants comprehensive reform now.

ALLEN: Well, unless the comprehensive reform and any of this so- called temporary worker, guest worker, unless that does not reward illegal behavior, I don't think we ought to be passing anything that rewards illegal behavior or amnesty.

Is that different than the president's position? Apparently so, but I'm going to stick to the principle: first and foremost we need to secure our borders. We are a country of immigrants, but we're also a country of laws, and we do need to enforce the rule of law.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me ask you about the Cornyn-Kyl approach you just mentioned, sending either guest workers or illegals back home before they can be put on a path...

ALLEN: You don't actually send them back. They're going to have to go back...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They go back.

ALLEN: ... This whole approach that gosh, you're going to round up 10 million people and send them back, that's not the approach. The approach is that if they want to stay in this country legally they're going to have to go back to their home country.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, a lot of your colleagues think, one, rounding them up is impractical but also they're not going to go back on their own.

Here's what Senator McCain had to say about it.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN (R-AZ): You've got to tell me how you do that. George Will said Sunday you have to line up 200,000 buses from San Diego to Alaska. Someone's going to have to explain to us how you do that. It's not possible. And of course what's the cost involved?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: So what's the answer to Senator McCain?

ALLEN: The answer to Senator McCain is you enforce the rule of law in this country. And it's not that we're going to be rounding up. I said that before you showed his piece, and that's the argument of those who are in favor of amnesty or rewarding illegal...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But people aren't going to go back on their own. ALLEN: Well, in the event that you have a workable temporary worker system, say the seasonal worker approach, it's H2B, and employers can hire those from another country where they can't find Americans to fill those job. If you have a good legal guest worker system or temporary worker system, employers will choose that approach.

Ultimately, of course, the main point is enforce the law. Right now it is illegal to hire those who are illegally. And if there is a good way, a workable, efficient, practical way of hiring legal workers in this country, employers will do that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: As you know, the president...

ALLEN: And then those who are here illegally, by the way, will see that they can't find work in this country and they're going to have to leave.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I was just going to say the president and his allies are worried that your party is going to be cast as the anti- immigrant party. And I was talking to a top Republican strategist close to the president this week who says that the enforcement-only approach, for example, is perhaps good short-term politics for some of you in the midterms, but in the long-run is going to alienate the Republican Party from the fastest voter group in America -- fastest growing voter group in America: Hispanics.

Are you worried about that?

ALLEN: I think it's very important that we're respectful in the midst of our discussions of all these issues. You call it enforcement only. I look at it and characterize it as securing our borders.

A country that cannot secure its own borders and control its own borders cannot control its own destiny. Immigration policy in this country ought to be considered and thoughtful and determine how many more people can we allow in every year so -- to be absorbed and assimilated into our society.

And I think this is something that has been, throughout the history of this country, very important.

My mother, as you said in the outset, came to this country after World War II from Tunisia. And your parents, undoubtedly, or grandparents came...

STEPHANOPOULOS: My dad came from Greece.

ALLEN: ... from Greece. And came in legally. And it's also a message that we send, whether it's to our children or to people all around the world that if you do something illegal, you should not be rewarded for it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: If I listen to you and Senator Obama, I put the two interviews together, I say it sure looks like the Senate's not going to pass a bill this week. Do you agree?

ALLEN: That's hard to say. They may have enough votes for the approach that Senator McCain and Senator Specter and Senator Kennedy are in favor of. Obviously, I'm for securing our borders, and I will support...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Would you filibuster that kind of an approach?

ALLEN: I don't like the concept of filibustering. I think this needs to addressed. I am glad the Senate is finally taking up this issue. How it results, I can't predict right now.

But I do want to make sure that we do have opportunities to put in amendments that, for example, Senator Cornyn or Senator Kyl or others that I've co-sponsored, for example, saying that if somebody is a felon in this country that they should not be afforded all these benefits that Senator McCain and Senator Kennedy are proposing in this whether you want to call it amnesty or rewarding illegal behavior.

We'll have a vote on that, and there'll be other amendments that I think can improve this measure, and I think everyone ought to have a fair shot at it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You're looking at a run for the White House. I know you haven't made a final decision yet. You're also up for re- election this year in November, and you've drawn an interesting opponent. President Reagan's former Navy secretary, James Webb, a former Republican. He has switched over to the Democratic Party, mostly on the issue of Iraq, but he also had this to say to his local affiliate recently.

He said: 'The Republican Party of George W. Bush is not the Republican Party of Ronald Reagan. I think it has moved toward the extreme on social issues. I think it has made a lot of mileage out of that in terms of attempting to keep a voter base.
Bush's spending has put the nation in debt and betrayed conservative economic principles,' Webb said, 'and foreign policy under Bush is something Reagan would have forsaken.'

He's referring specifically there to Iraq. Are you worried that he's going to turn your re-election into a referendum on Iraq?

ALLEN: Well, Mr. Webb or Mr. Miller -- there's actually two Democrats running, and I don't know who will qualify for it, but regardless, Mr. Webb obviously doesn't like President Bush very much. And I'm one who very much loves Ronald Reagan. He's the one who motivated me to get involved in organized politics back in 1976.

I think President Bush has provided strong leadership for this country. When we were hit on 9/11, I think he rallied the country. I also think that he's taking the war to the terrorists, rather than sitting back and waiting to be hit. Our economy is actually doing very well.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you're willing to run on Iraq.

ALLEN: I'm running on my issues and ideas. I think that we have three key missions that we need to unify this country behind. Number one is securing our freedom. Part of that is the perseverance and resolve to win the war on terror.

Secondly, we need to make sure this is the land of opportunity for all people. Make it the world capital of innovation, with more competitive tax and regulatory policies. And third, we need to preserve our values, and that means judges who do not legislate from the bench.

Insofar as Iraq, Iraq's part of that battlefield in the war on terror. You might also look back to Ronald Reagan and how he changed the dynamics of the Cold War, one of appeasement and co-existence to the advancement of freedom. And there are hundreds of millions of people from the Baltics to the Black Sea that were once behind the Iron Curtain that are now tasting that sweet nectar of liberty. They're allies. They're friends. And we need to try to advance freedom where practical and also bring other countries into the coalition.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You got your Ronald Reagan speech in there. Senator Allen, thanks very much.

ALLEN: Great to you with you, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The roundtable is next with George Will, Robert Reich and Martha Raddatz. Later, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) CONAN O'BRIEN, HOST, LATE NIGHT WITH CONAN O'BRIEN : President Bush told the Iraqi people to -- this is a quote -- get governing. Then the president introduced his new speechwriter, Larry the Cable Guy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our Voice this week, Jimmy Rollins. After a white-hot 2005...

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ANNOUNCER: ...36-game hitting streak.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... the Phillies shortstop is closing in on the longest streak in baseball: Joe DiMaggio's 56 straight games with a hit. Rollins gets his next chance at bat tomorrow, opening day at Citizen's Bank Park in Philadelphia, where George Will found him unfazed by the pressure.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

WILL: You've hit in 36 games. You're heading for 56, DiMaggio's record. Do you ever have a feeling, look around, say, what is a little guy like me from Oakland, California doing chasing this?

ROLLINS: I never really thought of it that way. You know, I just want to come to the ballpark, truthfully, every day and do something to help the team win.

WILL: You've been telling your brother for years you can break DiMaggio's record. Where'd you get that confidence?

ROLLINS: Ooh. That's something I think I was born with, or should I say was ingrained in me as a young boy, just a little shorty.

My mother, she never let us -- or my father for that reason -- they never let us settle for second best. The word almost wasn't accepted in my house. It was like if it was almost, well, why didn't you do it? What kept you back?

WILL: You're trying to set a very important record at a difficult moment in baseball history, when a lot of fans think a lot of records are tainted.

Baseball, now, has the toughest steroid penalties of any professional sport. Are you confident the steroid era is over?

ROLLINS: Oh, yes. I'm very confident. If you're still doing steroids at this moment, you're running a real good risk that you'll not be playing baseball again. And I think that's the best threat that you can have is saying that, if you get caught cheating, you're going to get kicked out the game.

And as you understand, this is our livelihood. This is how we make money. This is how we feed our families. Without baseball, a lot of us would be up in the air, not knowing what to do. And I'm definitely one of them.

And just with that strict policy, three strikes and you're out, that's (inaudible).

WILL: I guess one of the advantages of being 175 pounds is no one thinks you're on steroids.

ROLLINS: Right. Right.

WILL: Or if you did, you weren't getting your money's worth.

ROLLINS: No, I definitely wasn't.

WILL: Do you ever look around baseball nowadays and say where have the African-American ball players gone?

Let me give you some numbers. In 1975, 27 percent of all major league players were African-American's. In 1979, the Pirates win the World Series with a team that's 40 percent African-American. As recently as the 95 All-Star game, all six starting outfielders were African-American.

Fast forward to 2005, the Detroit All-Star game, 64 roster slots, five African-Americans. How do you explain this?

ROLLINS: I think personally a lot of it is baseball fields in inner cities aren't worth playing on. You go out there, the grass is three feet tall. No one's come to drag the field or even tried to break up the cement that the dirt has become.

And plus, you need equipment. You know, in basketball, you get a basketball and you can go find a hoop. Football, same thing, you go get a football and just find a field or even a parking lot.

But baseball, you need bats, you need gloves, you need cleats, you need a ball. And then you actually need a big place to play. And those places especially with development are being taken away.

WILL: About 25 percent of all the people on big league rosters this spring are from outside North America. Fifty percent of all those in baseball, from rookie ball up, are from outside North America. It's a good thing for the game, isn't it?

ROLLINS: It's definitely good thing to see baseball expanding. But nevertheless, you still want to keep it an American game. And in my eyes, you just can't go out there and say, well, we have all of these players that have been great.

For example, in Japan or in Korea, or in the Dominican league or the Venezuelan league and forget about what's going on at home because kids will get discouraged. It's like, well, they're not drafting us. They're going out trying to find talent everywhere else.

WILL: Bases loaded, bottom of the ninth, tie game, three and two count on Jimmy Rollins. Pitcher throws a ball right off the plate, it's your last at bat. You walk in the winning run and you don't break the record, which would you do?

ROLLINS: I'd walk in the winning run, but I'd probably try to foul it off if it was that close. If it was that close, I'd really try to foul it off, but if it's a pitch that I know I can't get to, hopefully the empire sees it the same way I do.

WILL: Well, Jimmy Rollins, the baseball world will be watching on opening day and for as long after that as you keep going.

ROLLINS: Yes.

ROLLINS: Get to 57.

ROLLINS: Thank you very much. I'm definitely going to try.

WILL: Nice to see you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: George Will rooting for Jimmy Rollins. For more baseball talk click on our Voices Plus feature at thisweek.abcnews.com. And now, The Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LENO: And according to Time magazine, global warming is 33 percent worse than we thought. You know what that means? Al Gore is 1/3 more annoying than we thought.

(LAUGHTER)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STEWART: So burning cars -- violent clashes with police. That's how the French protest a new law. Well here in the States new legislation is also sparking protests. Congress is considering a tough new anti-immigration bill. The crowd sentiment was perhaps best expressed by this man.

(UNKNOWN): We've been part of this country for years, and we should remain part of the country. We are not foreigners.

STEWART: Sir, no offense but your attempts to assimilate...

(LAUGHTER)

STEWART: ... a little ham-handed.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COLBERT: I knew this was a problem, but I had no idea the scope of it until I watched the Sunday shows. Look at what Arlen Specter said at 10:03 on Sunday morning.

U.S. SENATOR ARLEN SPECTER (R-PA): We have approximately 11 million undocumented aliens here.

COLBERT: Now look at what Ted Kennedy said at 10:33.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA): There are 12 million individuals that are here in the United States.

COLBERT: One million illegals snuck into this country in a half an hour.

(LAUGHTER)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, at least he's watching.

That's it for today, but tune in next Sunday, when my guest will be new House Majority Leader John Boehner. Thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us. We'll see you next week.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. Secretary of State Rice, on a surprise trip to Iraq, pressures officials to form a government, next on Fox News Sunday. A call to censure a wartime president over the terrorist surveillance program. We'll talk with the man behind that move, Democratic Senator Russ Feingold, in a Sunday exclusive.

The immigration debate divides the nation and splits the GOP. Can Congress work out a compromise? We'll find out from a key senator, Republican Lindsey Graham.

A top White House insider is replaced. But has anything really changed in the Bush administration? We'll tackle that with our Sunday regulars, Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol, and Juan Williams. And our Power Player of the Week. It's his job to think like the enemy. All right now on Fox News Sunday.

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. We trust you remembered to set your clock ahead one hour for daylight saving time, or you wouldn't be watching us now. Let's start with a quick check of the latest headlines.

Secretary of State Rice and Britain's Foreign Secretary Jack Straw flew to Baghdad Sunday to push Iraqi leaders to form a new government. The two diplomats bluntly told Iraq's interim officials the almost four-month long negotiations need to be wrapped up soon. Freed hostage Jill Carroll now on her way home to the U.S. said she made anti-American comments only because she was threatened. In a statement issued Saturday, Carroll said her captors were criminals who kidnap and murder civilians.

And in Poland and Rome, ceremonies and Masses and being held to honor Pope John Paul II, who died one year ago today.

We turn now to Democratic Senator Russ Feingold, who has introduced a resolution to censure President Bush for allegedly breaking the law with his NSA warrantless wiretap program. Senator Feingold joins us from his home state of Wisconsin, and Senator, welcome to Fox News Sunday.

FEINGOLD: Good morning. It's good to be on the show, Chris.

WALLACE: Senator, in a hearing this week, you said that the president's wiretap program is, and I quote, one of the greatest attempts to dismantle our system of government in history. And you called John Dean as a witness, who said that this is worse than Watergate. Senator, do you really believe there is any comparison?
FEINGOLD: Actually, I do think this is worse. Not in terms of personal misconduct. Our greatest priority in this country is fighting the terrorist elements that attacked us on 9/11. But when the president breaks the law and doesn't admit that he's broken the law, and then advances theories about being able to override the law on torture, and having a preemptive doctrine of war, what he's trying to do is change the nature of our government.

He's trying to turn our presidency into an imperial presidency. So this is one of the greatest challenges in our history, to Congress to stand up and make sure we still have the rule of law and checks and balances. That's actually why it's more significant than the very serious events that occurred at Watergate.

WALLACE: Well, Senator, let me explore that comparison with you if I can. Did President Nixon brief members of Congress more than a dozen times before and during Watergate?

FEINGOLD: Certainly not, and that's not the point. In fact, President Bush broke the law when he did not brief the entire Intelligence Committee...

WALLACE: But wait, wait, wait. That's not -- but Senator, I mean the fact is, President Bush briefed the congressional leaders, both House and Senate, Republican and Democrat, also the leaders of the Intelligence Committee, Republican and Democrat, both House and Senate, more than a dozen times before and during this NSA wiretap program. Isn't that a big difference?

FEINGOLD: Chris, Chris, where I come from here in Wisconsin, if you break the law and you go tell people you're breaking the law, that doesn't make it OK. If you're breaking the law, you're breaking the law. In this case, the president does not have a legal leg to stand on.

And we have this problem of one-party rule in our system of government right now, where the Republicans in the House and the Senate are not standing up like some Republicans did during Watergate and saying, look, we need to stand together and say that the president needs to return to the law. We all support wiretapping terrorists. But the what the president is doing here is a frightful assault on our system of government, and he has to be called on it.

I could have proposed something more severe. A censure resolution is, in my view, a modest way to acknowledge the illegality and cause the president to return to the law.

WALLACE: Let me explore that Watergate comparison a little bit more. Has President Bush created an enemies list? Has he used the federal government to punish his political opponents? Has he authorized break-ins of his political enemies?

FEINGOLD: Well, again, Chris, this is not a criticism of the president as some sort of criminal law, day-to-day problem, like President Nixon had. This is really a much bigger deal. As George Will has said, this was the very reason for the revolution that we had in this country, is that we did not want a monarchical president. So I think these days, we look at the Nixon impeachment and the Clinton impeachment, we forget what the real reason for high crimes and misdemeanors was, to make sure that the president doesn't cause himself to be involved in personal misconduct, but that he doesn't try to achieve a power that is like King George III. So this is actually, even though in terms of the president's personal conduct not as serious, much more dangerous to our system of government, to our republic, and frankly, Chris, it weakens us in the fight against terrorism, to have a president who's thumbing his nose at the laws of this country. It isn't good for us.

WALLACE: Senator, I want to go back to the briefing of congressional leaders, because, as I say, he did brief congressional leaders of both parties more than a dozen times. It has been reported that when he set up the program, before he had actually started it, that the White House suggested perhaps there should be some legal changes made to the program, and the congressional leaders said no, because if so, the program will be late (ph). In that sense, aren't the congressional leaders complicit in the lawbreaking?

FEINGOLD: Well, of course they're limited in terms of what they can say about it, because of the rules in terms of the members of the gang of eight of the Intelligence Committee people. And I want to remind you that the president broke the statute from 1947 by not fully informing the entire Intelligence Committees. So he didn't even achieve the legal basis there. That's not the main point, but to somehow suggest that the president of the United States gets off the hook because he briefed a few members who couldn't talk about it is to miss the point.

The point is that the president is making bogus arguments about somehow when we authorized the Afghanistan invasion, we agreed to this. You know, that's -- that's been laughed at in the halls of Congress. It's a very sad moment when the president can't admit, look -- he can say he did it with good faith, he can say he was trying to do the right thing, but he has to admit he went too far here, and he can do what he needs to do under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. We all support that, we just need him to return to the idea of the law and not really create a very divisive situation in our country that weakens us in the fight against terrorism internationally.

WALLACE: Senator, let's talk about what's at the basis of all this, which is the NSA warrantless wiretap program that the president authorized. Have you been briefed on the program?

FEINGOLD: I have been briefed to some degree, but certainly not completely. I am on the Senate Intelligence Committee, and we got somewhat more information than other senators get, but then the full briefing is only being given to a sub-portion of the Intelligence Committee, and that's one of the reasons I decided it was time for the censure resolution, because it became clear that there was not going to be the kind of investigation that had to happen to find out exactly what this program is all about.

WALLACE: Do you know how the NSA decides whom to wiretap? Do you have any evidence that the civil liberties of any innocent Americans have been violated?

FEINGOLD: I know some things about it, but I'm not able to talk about it. What I can tell you is this: Is that I am absolutely convinced, after five hearings, three in the Judiciary Committee, two in the Intelligence Committee, that there is no legal basis for this. I may not know all the details, but it's clear from everything we've heard that you can't sort of create a new law or a new statute or a new constitutional provision.

The president has admitted publicly that he did this outside of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. They have basically been laughed out of the room when they say that the Afghanistan invasion resolution allows this. And all we have left is this idea that somehow the president has inherent power to make up whatever laws he wants. And you know what? That would be the opposite of our system of government.

So we know what we need to know to know that this conduct is illegal, but there's much more to be known about the program, and I think at least all members of the Intelligence Committee, and hopefully more members of Congress, would be carefully briefed on this, because how are we supposed to insert legislation that the president might want here or senators might want if we don't know what this program precisely is.

WALLACE: Well, let me ask you about that, Senator, because almost two dozen members of Congress have been briefed in detail about the program, members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committee. None of them, after those detailed briefings, have criticized the program in public, and I want to put up the comments of two Democrats who have been briefed. Senator Dianne Feinstein said: I think it's a very impressive program. Congresswoman Jane Harman, the top Democrat on House Intelligence, said:

I believe the program is essential to U.S. national security.

Senator, it seems that the people who are criticizing this program are the ones who know the least about it.

FEINGOLD: Of course it's essential to national security. All we have to do is bring it within the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and I know that Congresswoman Harman has said specifically that she does not believe we need to change the law in this area, but it can be done within the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. So the very member of Congress that you cited has said we all think this program is important, but it can be done within the law. That's the point. The White House keeps acting as if we don't want them to be able to do this. Of course we do; we just need a court check and balance. That's what the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act is all about, to make sure that the White House doesn't run amuck, or somebody doing this doesn't abuse the law.

So there is no dispute about whether we should have it. And those very senators, including Senator Levin himself, have certainly not said publicly that it's essential that we go outside of the law to do this. I've heard none of them say this, and none of them will say that.

WALLACE: But none of them have talked about censure. So if you change the law, why not just change the law? Why do you have to call for censuring a president during the middle of wartime?

FEINGOLD: Well, how -- are we going to have a system, Chris, where whenever the president wants to make up his own law, he goes ahead and does it, and we say, gee, Mr. President, you broke the law, that's too bad. Let's make a law to make what you're doing legal. What kind of a government is that? What kind of a system is that? And what kind of a message to our kids? If you don't like the law, just make up whatever you want to do and keep going. Frankly, it's outrageous. And if there isn't some accountability, apart from the need to possibly look at legislation, if there isn't some statement that the president can't just make up his own laws, what have we come to? Who are we? It's an outrage, and every member of Congress and every American should say to the president, Mr. President, we respect your commitment in the fight against terrorism, but you've got to return to the law. You've got to return to the way we do things in this system.

WALLACE: Senator, you talk about other members of Congress. Let me ask you about other Democrats, who you have accused of cowering before the president. In fact, when you held this hearing at the Senate Judiciary Committee on Friday -- and let's put up some pictures, if we can here. Among the Democrats who didn't show up for your hearing, Ted Kennedy, Joe Biden, Dianne Feinstein, Chuck Schumer, Dick Durbin.

Democratic Senator Mark Dayton said about you recently, It's an overreaching step by someone who is grandstanding and running for president at the expense of his own party and his own country.

Senator, are all of those other Democrats cowering?

FEINGOLD: Look, you know, this was one of the best attended hearings I've ever seen on a Friday. You know as well as I do, Chris, that senators take off after there are no more votes in the House, and we had seven or eight senators at this hearing. I think you're forgetting to mention that Senator Patrick Leahy came and said that he is inclined to support censure. So support for this is growing.

WALLACE: ... Kennedy, Durbin, Feinstein, Biden, all of them.

(CROSSTALK)

FEINGOLD: Well, Chris, you know very well that people often don't show up for hearings even during the week, and a lot of them took off because the votes were over. Senator Specter knew exactly what he was doing when he scheduled on a Friday.

But here's the main point. Chris, you know very well that I was the only senator to vote, the only Democratic senator to vote to hear the evidence in the Clinton impeachment trial. That I was the only -- the first Democratic senator to call for a special counsel when it came to campaign finance violations of President Clinton.

I am one of the least partisan members of the United States Senate by all accounts. I call them as I see them. And if this were a Democratic president, I think you know and everybody else knows I'd be doing the very same thing. This has nothing to do with political ambition. Believe it or not, it's because I believe in my heart that this is a threat to our system of government, and I will say that on a Bible.

WALLACE: And now that you've had your hearing, are you going to give up this idea of censure, or are you going to push for a vote?

FEINGOLD: Well, of course I want a vote. The president has broken the law. The president has misled the American people in advance, and has thumbed his nose at the law afterward. I'm not talking about impeachment, although this may be an impeachable offense.

I'm talking about some accountability. We should have accountability, and if we don't get it right away in this Republican Congress, maybe we can pass a censure resolution in a Democratic Congress, which would be a little more balanced and be better for our country.

We have a terrible problem that we have a Republican president and two houses of Congress run by the Republicans, who are intimidated by this White House, even to the point of not standing up for the right of Congress...

WALLACE: But Senator, and we're running out of time... (CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: ... you make that sound like it's a coup. I mean, that's the result of the election. Elections have implications.

FEINGOLD: Well, there's nothing wrong with it from the point of view it was inappropriate. It's just that maybe the country wants to turn this here to a little more balanced government, where you have at least one house of Congress saying, Mr. President, you can't just make up the law.

You can't just create whatever laws you want. We have to go through the system of government we've always had. You know, the Bill of Rights and the Constitution were not repealed on 9/11, and we all are unified in fighting the terrorists. But we're not going to give the terrorists the victory of destroying our own system of government in order to satisfy a White House that has very grandiose views of the extent of their powers.

WALLACE: Senator Feingold, I want to thank you so much for joining us today. Please come back, sir.

FEINGOLD: I enjoyed it. Thank you.

WALLACE: Up next, the battle over immigration. Can Republicans resolve their differences and pass some type of reform? We'll ask Senator Lindsey Graham right after this break.

WALLACE: Joining us now to talk about immigration, Iraq and more, Republican Senator Lindsey Graham, who comes to us from his home state of South Carolina. Senator, welcome back to Fox News Sunday.

GRAHAM: Thank you for having me yet again.

WALLACE: Let's start with Senator Feingold's censure motion. You have expressed doubts about the legal basis for the president's NSA wiretap program. Senator Feingold says that if Congress doesn't stand up for itself, you become complicit in the lawbreaking.

GRAHAM: Well, I think to censure the program is to kill the program, and I don't want to kill it because I think it's going to help make us safe. The goal of the program is to find out what the enemy is up to, a foreign enemy intent on killing Americans, get as much information so we can strike them before they strike us.

I disagree with two theories being pushed by the president that would say you don't need a warrant. But it's a robust debate, it's an honest debate. And to bring up the ghost of Watergate and compare Watergate to this is just absurd. Watergate was about Richard Nixon's White House trying to abuse and punish domestic critics, people who were against the president, domestic enemies. This program is trying to find out what a foreign enemy, designed to kill Americans, is up to, and we can have a healthy debate about when you need a warrant and when you don't. But if Congress starts censuring presidents every time they have a legal difference with the president, you only weaken the president. This is a very bad idea. Russ Feingold is a very good man. The reason nobody is jumping on board is because it's just an overreaction to a real and honest debate.

WALLACE: Well, what about the argument that Feingold makes that listen, this fellow broke the law, the president broke the law, and Congress has to stand up against it?

GRAHAM: I think this is one of the most unsettled areas of the law in America. When does the power of the president begin and end in a time of war? Could the Congress have passed a statute telling Truman you've got to rehire MacArthur? Could we tell the president send over the target list over before you bomb anybody? I think these kinds of questions are very subject to legal debate. The courts have had two or three different views of it. The FISA court was first created in 1978. In 2002, the court of appeals, the FISA court itself said the inherent authority of the president in a time of war may make FISA moot.

So these are honest, open questions. Censure is a political stunt that's going to take us on the wrong road, divide America. And that's why nobody is jumping on board. It will weaken the presidency. And to bring up the ghost of Watergate here is really absurd.

WALLACE: Let's turn if we can, Senator, to immigration. You support the Senate Judiciary Committee bill, which would create a path to citizenship for the 11 million immigrants who are now there. It may take them 11 years to do it. They may have to pay several fines. But in the sense that they eventually benefit from breaking the law, doesn't this amount to amnesty?

GRAHAM: Well, in my opinion, amnesty is the current program. The current system is a complete failure. I don't know of anybody being prosecuted for hiring illegal aliens in an effective manner. I don't know of anybody being sent back in large numbers in an effective manner. So if you want amnesty, do nothing.

The judiciary bill is a comprehensive approach. And I believe there is a shift in politics going on in the Senate and the Republican Party away from a border security-only bill to a comprehensive approach being advocated by the president.

That approach has two facets to it. Secure the borders. Don't talk about it, but do it. Have a legal system that would punish employers for illegally hiring people, and change our legal system so it would work and not be a joke. And third, to honestly deal with the 11 million people who are already in the country who are working and adding value.

We're not going to put 11 million people in jail. We don't have the jails to do that. But we're not going to send them back. Look how hard it was to get Houston evacuated when people wanted to leave. So the Senate bill, which the president is moving towards, says not amnesty, but how about a pardon, a probationary sentence. What we'll do is we'll allow you to come out of the shadows from an illegal status to a legal work status, and you'll be on probation for 11 years.

And here's what you'll have to do. You'll have to pay a fine for your violation of the law. And you'll have to continually work. And if you don't, you get deported. You'll have to take a proficiency exam in English, and if you fail it, you can get deported.

If you commit a crime during that 11-year period, you get deported. To me, the solution is recognizing the behavior's illegal, but given an appropriate punishment and an appropriate pathway forward, and if after 11 years you've fulfilled this probationary period to avoid deportation, not only should you not be deported, you should be welcomed as a functioning value-added product to America. WALLACE: Now, Senate Majority Leader Frist says that even if all 45 Democrats vote for your bill, the bill that you're supporting, that you're not going to be able to get the 15 Republicans to break a filibuster of the comprehensive package. A couple of questions here. Do you think the Senate will pass an immigration bill, and if so, what kind?

GRAHAM: I think it will be a comprehensive bill similar to what the president's been advocating. I think it would be political suicide for our party to filibuster a comprehensive solution to a real problem facing America. It would be political suicide to ignore there's 11 million people, illegally undocumented, who are trying to work and add value to our country.

If we adopt the approach of going to a Hispanic soldier in Iraq and a Hispanic Marine in Iraq and telling them the Republican Party's position is that we're going to make your grandparents felons and deport them, we will lose power as a party. If we're going to charitable organizations, religious institutions who are providing assistance to abused women and children, and say if you help somebody who's undocumented, we're going to make you a felon, we will lose our majority.

That's not the way to go. The president has said that's not the way to go. We need a comprehensive solution that allows people to earn their citizenship by going through gates over an 11-year period of time showing they're good citizens and they've worked their way out of this problem.

WALLACE: You say you think it would be political suicide. In fact, do you think that you have 15 Republican votes to break a filibuster?

GRAHAM: I feel very good that the idea of a comprehensive approach, solving the problem now because it only gets worse later, is going to prevail. The president has provided great leadership. I urge the president to continue to talk about this problem in a comprehensive fashion, in a fashion where not only are we going to have the respect for the rule of law, but we're going to have a just outcome.

The president has done a wonderful job putting a good, kind, firm face on this problem for our party. This is a defining moment for the Republican Party. If our answer to the fastest growing demographic in this country is that we want to make felons of your grandparents and we want to put people in jail who are helping your neighbors and people related to you, then we're going to suffer mightily. Let's don't filibuster; let's solve the problem in a comprehensive way -- firm, fair pathway to citizenship.

WALLACE: Senator, finally, I want to talk to you about Iraq. Last June, you were talking at a Senate hearing with Defense Secretary Rumsfeld about public opinion in your home state of South Carolina towards the war.

GRAHAM: Yes.

WALLACE: Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GRAHAM: And I'm here to tell you, sir, in the most patriotic state I can imagine, people are beginning to question. And I don't think it's a blip on the radar screen.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator, it's almost nine months later, 598 Americans have been killed over in Iraq since then. How do people in your home state of South Carolina feel about the war now?

GRAHAM: I think people understand that we're better off without Saddam Hussein. But I'll be honest with you, there is an erosion here at home of support for the idea we can't leave until the Iraqis have had a chance to put up their functioning -- to stand up a functioning democracy. You lose the war by losing public support here at home. You win the war by getting moderate forces in the Mideast to come together to put a democracy in place where they can live together. Right now, we're at a tipping point. The way that we can lose the war in Iraq is to have the institutions like the army and the police force fail. If the police force is seen by Iraqis in general as rewarding one side over the other, supporting the Shias and not the Sunnis, then we're going to fail.

The test of Iraq, to me, is will an army unit made up of Sunnis in a Shia area protect the Shias? Will a police force in a Sunni area take care of a Shia family? If the answer is yes, we can still win. If the institutions fail in Iraq, no political solution is ever going to prevail. The Iraqi people have got to want to take care of each other and put these differences aside, and I hope the American people will give them the opportunity to do so.

WALLACE: Secretary Rice, as I mentioned, Senator, has made a surprise trip to Iraq today. There's growing frustration with the failure of Iraqi politicians to come together and create a national government. It's been more than three and a half months since the elections there, and U.S. officials have reportedly been telling the Iraqi politicians that they would like the interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, to step down, because they see him as a force for division, not a force for coming together. How tough should the U.S. get with Jaafari and the Iraqi politicians to get their act together?

GRAHAM: I think they should be really tough with the Iraqi politicians to act on the mandate they've been given by their people. But we need to understand, it took us 11 years to write our Constitution. And democracy is hard. But we need to push the political forces in Iraq to come together with a coalition government.

But I am not so worried about that. Here's what I think we need to watch as a nation. Are the institutions of government developing in the proper way in Iraq? Do we have a national army, or do we have a regional army? Do we have a police force that would enforce the law fairly for everybody, regardless of ethnic or religious differences? If you can get those two institutions right, the politicians will take care of themselves. No political compromise will work unless the institutions, the law courts, the police force and the army buy into protecting everybody fairly. To me, that is the goal, is to get these institutions built up in a way that they can sustain themselves, and that's going to take time.

WALLACE: Senator Graham, we're going to have to leave it there. We want to thank you for joining us again, and always a pleasure to have you with us.

GRAHAM: Thank you, my friend.

WALLACE: Coming up, Andy Card steps down as White House chief of staff; Josh Bolten steps up. A panel of Sunday regulars will tell us what it all means for the Bush presidency. Back in a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ANDY CARD, FORMER WHITE HOUSE CHIEF OF STAFF: I'm grateful for the White House staff that has served you so well and helped me do a better job. But it is a different season, and Josh Bolten is the right person for that season.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was outgoing White House chief of staff, Andy Card, setting the scene for what many in Washington think will be a shakeup in the Bush administration. And it's panel time now for Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of FOX News, and FOX

News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of the Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams, also from National Public Radio.

Well, I'm glad to see that all of us got the memo about daylight savings time, or at least four of the five of us did, Mara.

LIASSON: I'm on here.

(CROSSTALK)

WALLACE: A little rushed, a little panicked, but you got here.

Anyway, Andy Card out, after more than five years as White House chief of staff. Josh Bolten in, and is apparently planning more changes in the Bush administration. How important for the fortunes of the Bush presidency?

HUME: Well, the departure of Andy Card by itself is almost entirely unimportant. That's the most grueling of all of those senior jobs -- they're all grueling; that's the most grueling. He'd been in there at the crack of dawn every day, and there into the late hours every night. He was clearly somebody who was in danger of burnout, if he wasn't burned out. So his departure by itself means very little.

Now, if Josh Bolten comes in and there's going to be a major house cleaning, to include not only senior White House jobs but also members of the cabinet, that would mean a major shakeup, and that could be the kind of thing that would change the atmosphere in Washington, give the administration a sense of a new start, if that's what it wants.

I don't anticipate that, frankly. I think Andy Card's departure will be -- there will be -- they have some vacancies in the White House staff. Josh Bolten will clearly fill some of those.

WALLACE: How about to replace himself...

HUME: Exactly. And of course, that's a post that requires Senate approval, but in terms of the White House staff jobs, there are a number of those that need to be filled; he'll fill those. Whether this extends to a real shakeup I think remains to be seen, but I doubt it.

LIASSON: Yes, I think, you know, there are two kinds of shakeups in Washington. One, the kind that Brit described, which is so comprehensive and so dramatic that it actually captures the attention of the press and we cover all these confirmation hearings, and it does kind of change the atmosphere in and of itself.

Then there's the other kind, which I suspect we're about to witness, which is some players are changed, and maybe the White House starts making fewer stumbles, fewer missteps, and that could be helpful. I don't know if it undoes the damage that's already been done, but maybe its relations with Congress can be improved if you put different people in charge of that aspect. Maybe you can repair some of your relationships with the base of the Republican Party, and that could help the president going forward. But that's a much more modest thing.

WALLACE: Bill, I'm curious about Andy Card's reference, and we heard it at the beginning of this segment, to a different season, a new season. Is there a new season in the Bush White House, the Bush presidency?

KRISTOL: Yes, it's baseball season.

(CROSSTALK)

KRISTOL: It's good to have a new chief of staff with every (inaudible) cycle.

No, look, I mean, Andy Card I think served the president the way the president wanted to be served, but it was certainly time for a change.

I think there will be bigger changes than people think. I think we'll have senior, major cabinet changes at some point. I think Treasury quite soon; John Snow will leave. Someone like Phil Gramm might come in, who I think would be a much more forceful voice to defend Bush's economic policies. The most mind-boggling statistic about the Bush presidency is that we have had, what, 4 percent growth basically in the last four years, and about two-thirds of Americans think Bush has done a bad job on the economy. That can be partly fixed by a treasury secretary who can make the case for Bush's economic policies. I think we'll see a new press spokesman. It will help a bit.

So I think this could be a little bit of a bigger shakeup than most people think.

WILLIAMS: Well, I think there's pressure on Snow, but I disagree with the premise there. I don't -- I don't think it's as if the American people don't know the economic statistics, which are very good. I think the reality of their lives in terms of what they have to pay, how many jobs they have to work in order to put a kid through college and the like, it just makes for a disconnect there, and I don't know that a treasury secretary is going to make all that big a difference.

I think the real difference here, if there is to be a difference, is in policy.

And the policy, obviously, that's driving the president's poll numbers down is Iraq. So you've got to have a change in Iraq, and you've got to have a change in terms of even domestic policy, just the idea that the president is paying attention to domestic issues in this country. Immigration is part of that story.

But when it comes to Iraq, I'm just struck by this New York Times editorial this morning, The End Game in Iraq, in which it said that Iraq is becoming a country that Americans should be ashamed to support, let alone occupy. And they talk about the problems the administration is having with the Iraqi Prime Minister Jaafari.

I mean, Rice is over there pretty much saying to them, we've got to get this guy out, that we're three years after Saddam Hussein. It was great to get rid of Saddam Hussein, but we still don't have a functional government after elections, after an attempt to write a con -- we just don't have it.

And that's, you know, with that said, (inaudible) the American people are going to be stuck there. American forces are going to be stuck there, and the American people are going to continue to feel that this president doesn't have an exit strategy.

WALLACE: I don't want to get into an argument about Iraq in this segment, but Juan raises a good question, which is, are the problems the Bush administration faces now questions of personnel, problems of execution, or are they problems with basic policy?

HUME: I think they're problems of circumstance. Look, there's no problem that this president has that wouldn't be solved by a striking improvement in the situation, as Juan suggests, in Iraq. The formation of a coalition government there that could function, continued improvement in the armed forces there, both the police and the army, will unquestionably change the atmosphere on Iraq and beginning of some American troops coming home.

No sense of hasty retreat or anything of that kind. That probably will change the atmosphere enough. The problem the president has at home isn't just -- that's the core of it. It has caused a level of skittishness on Capitol Hill among Republicans that is depressing to watch because election year behavior by parties in power afraid of the voters is never a pretty sight. And we're not witnessing a very pretty situation up there. And the White House staff is getting some of the blame for that, but it was going to be like this in the sixth year, in all probability, if there was any trouble at all. And it is.

WALLACE: But don't you think, Mara, that whether it's Katrina or Harriet Miers or Dubai Ports World, that there was a growing sense of, you know, to use the Democratic word, you can use whatever you want, but incompetence.

LIASSON: Incompetence. Yeah. I think the execution is what -- look, I agree. The Iraq war, which is the one, the most important thing the president is going be judged by, presently and by history. But I think there were a lot of problems with execution. That's what you hear Republicans kind of wringing their hands about. All those things that you just listed were problems of execution. They either didn't consult Congress or couldn't explain their policies properly.

But Iraq still is the big overriding concern. And I think the problems that America is facing there are not just the simple problems of the U.S. military versus some terrorists. These are problems about forming a government, sectarian violence. The solutions to those are really up to the Iraqis, and there's not that much that the U.S. government can do now, now that it's created the situation, to steer it in the direction it wants.

WALLACE: With the time we have left in this session with the panel, I want to switch to another subject, Bill. I'm curious what you all think about this debate over censure and the comparison this week to Watergate. And Bill, I remember -- I forget whether it was last week or the week before -- you were saying how clever you thought Russ Feingold was in making this case, playing this card. Do you still feel that way?

KRISTOL: Yeah, absolutely. There was a poll, national poll of all voters, what do you think about censuring the president for his national security eavesdropping program? Thirty-eight percent approve, 45 percent disapprove. That's amazingly high number. Feingold's already got 38 percent. He's making the case. He says its illegal.

And Lindsey Graham comes on and says it's very complicated. This is really an overreach by Feingold. Among Democrats, Feingold is supported 5 to 1. It's helped his presidential ambitions. And it's one of these things where if he keeps making the argument that it's illegal, and the Republican response is, oh, well, we, we're a little uncertain, but this is a little harsh, who's going to win that argument?

If the Republicans believe that the president has done the right thing, which I believe, they should introduce a resolution commending the president for eavesdropping on terrorists and force the Democrats to (inaudible). But the Republicans are in fetal position. The Bush administration's in fetal position.

And Feingold makes the case (inaudible) to you under tough questioning, then of course Feingold's going to win that debate. (CROSSTALK)

WILLIAMS: It's good for Feingold personally is what you're saying. I don't think it's good necessarily for the Democratic Party as the Democratic Party fights this image of being weak in its ability to battle terrorists and to protect the country.

And I think that's why you see those people that Chris politely put up on the screen who didn't show up, you know, Ted Kennedy, Dick Durbin and the like. They weren't there. And their worry is that the Democratic Party gets damaged and it's going into '06, and that the Democratic Party loses its ability to challenge the administration on major issues, like are we going to intervene in Iran, which is the next big ticket on the item.

KRISTOL: Feingold has better political judgment than Ted Kennedy.

HUME: Well, he may have better political judgment in terms of what's going to appeal to a broad cross-section of a Democratic Party which is, as a whole, unserious about national security. As to whether he has better political judgment about what appeals to the country as a whole, I doubt. I think the Feingold position and the Feingold attitude toward this is politically very dangerous for Democrats.

Juan is correct. It tends to underscore the notion that Democrats, really when it gets down to it, are very persnickety about what America does in the world, but not much concern about America's enemies.

WALLACE: Time out, panel. We need to take a break here. But coming up, are some Republican House members saving the country from illegal immigrants or jeopardizing their party's chance for success in November? Our panel takes on the fight over immigration when we come back.

U.S. REP. PETER KING (R-NY): Anybody that votes for an amnesty bill, deserves to be branded with a scarlet letter A for amnesty.

U.S. SENATOR ARLEN SPECTER (R-PA): There's an effort far and wide to try to degrade the committee bill by the smear of amnesty. And is simply is not -- is not amnesty.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was just part of a sharp debate among Republicans this week over immigration reform. And with that now, Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

Several interesting developments this week in the immigration debate. The Senate Judiciary Committee's comprehensive bill seemed to gain at the expense of Senator Frist's enforcement only bill, and perhaps more interestingly and more importantly, the Republican speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert, opened the door to a compromise on guest workers.

Mara, when is immigration reform (inaudible)?

LIASSON: Well, I think it is -- I think the middle position, whatever you want to call it, the position supported by the president that combines border security with guest worker program and some kind of path to legalization did gain some steam this week. You do have this quite outspoken group of House Republicans -- you heard one of them -- who are quite adamant that they would vote for nothing that they consider to be amnesty. They consider any guest worker program to be amnesty, and earned legalization.

I think the Republican Party is sending two different messages: One an inclusive one from the president, and another one that's not inclusive, that some Republicans worry could cost the Republicans Party all those gains that it made with Hispanics in the last election.

Now, actually, to answer the question you posed before the segment, I don't think it's going to hurt them so much in '06. I think this is a longer-term problem. (inaudible) in 2006, it's all a couple of a dozen hard-fought House and Senate races that are in individual districts, and I think members understand which message is going to work best for them this time. Now, when you have a national election, you could get the kind of backlash against Republicans that you saw Pete Wilson suffer from with Prop 187 in California. But I think for now, the Republicans think that by sending out two messages, they can kind of thread the needle in November.

HUME: Especially, Chris, because reasonable Americans are probably having a difficult time finding anybody to root for in this debate. On the one hand, you have, you know, tens of thousands of people demonstrating, waving foreign flags, on behalf of illegal immigration and against the idea that America should enforce its own laws. What a repellent spectacle.

On the other hand, you have the behavior of some of these House Republicans, like the one you just showed on the screen, Congressman King, speaking of the guest worker program as if it were amnesty, and acting as if anybody from south of the border is unwelcome here.

First of all, the bill is not amnesty. Amnesty means turn yourself in, all is forgiven. Under these proposals, you might turn yourself in, but all would most certainly not be forgiven. You'd have to pay a fine, you'd have to recognize the illegality of what you've done. You'd be on probation and in danger of deportation for many years, and you'd be at the back of the line for citizenship, although you could get there. That's not amnesty.

So, on both sides of this debate, you have this problem. Mara suggests, and I think she may be right, that some kind of reasonable center may be emerging here, which would benefit the president. Probably would benefit the Republican Party, and as so happens, have the support of a lot of Democrats. It just might win.

WALLACE: Bill, I want to ask you about -- we got a lot of mail from viewers this last week who said we were too cavalier about this question of enforcing the borders. And, frankly, they pointed to some of your comments in particular about the legitimate need to enforce our borders and to punish those people who broke the law. How do you respond to that?

KRISTOL: I'm a liberal on immigration. I mean, I think the Bush approach is right. I think the Senate Judiciary Committee approach is right. If Congressman King thinks that it's a good idea to go around talking about branding people with the letter A for amnesty, if you (inaudible) see how, to use Brit's word, repellent that is of an image, you know, for, it's unbelievable. And the Republican Party will go down the tubes if it takes that position.

I disagree with Mara that it's threading the needle. Bush needs to step up and repudiate those House Republicans and their rhetoric, and make much more of a public case for his comprehensive immigration reform bill. Look, I'm not cavalier about illegal immigrants. I know that we need to have a serious debate about it. What damage have they done that's so great in 20 years? The anti-immigration forces said 20 years ago, there was an amnesty, which there sort of was, the Simpson- Mazzoli bill, which was pushed by the anti-immigration people, that Ronald Reagan signed.

What's happened that's so terrible in the last 20 years? Is the crime rate up in the United States in the last 20 years? Is unemployment up in the United States in the last 20 years?

(CROSSTALK)

KRISTOL: And they've been contributing to the U.S. economy and not damaging U.S. society. There have been marches with Mexican flags, which conservative talk radio is up in arms about. I mean, are these people serious? Are these people -- what, are they going to be traitors to the U.S.? An awful lot of Mexican Americans, an awful lot of sons and daughters of illegal immigrants are fighting in the U.S. Army.

(CROSSTALK) KRISTOL: I am pro-immigration, and I am even soft on illegal immigration.

WALLACE: Well, let me ask you about this, Juan, because I read the e-mails that we get, and people say, particularly in places like Arizona or California, where there is a flood of them, that, you know, we end up having to pay for them. They go to the public schools. They end up, you know, getting welfare or Medicare, Medicaid, things like that. There is a price to illegal immigrants, people who aren't citizens in this country coming over the border in large numbers.

WILLIAMS: There is a price, and there's also a benefit, which is to say they benefit the U.S. economy greatly. Now, to your point, Chris, it does put a disproportionate burden on communities where they have a strong influx of immigrants, such as Arizona and some of the border communities, Texas, into California. They have to pay more in terms of hospital costs, the schools, as you pointed out.

But you know, you reach the point where your plan -- you're not catering to fears about illegal immigration, but so much pandering to this fear and encouraging this fear. There is an anchorman on an opposing network -- I'll be polite and not mention him -- who is just way, I mean, he has gone bananas, and driving up his numbers.

And what's he talking about? Illegal immigrants bringing leprosy into the country. At that point, you think, you know what, this is not a logical debate. This is not about substance. This is not about trying to understand the impact of low-income, low-wage workers on other low-wage workers who are already in America, who do you need to protect.

No, this is about pandering to the right-wing base in such a way as to drive up either ratings or election numbers in '06.

WALLACE: We've got 30 seconds, Brit. Is it about pandering?

HUME: On the other hand, the position Bill has taken with a smile on his face that he is soft on illegal immigration, I think is a position that really won't fly and shouldn't fly. You simply can't make a case for immigration reform based on the idea that breaking American laws is OK and ought to be forgiven.

It ought not be forgiven, which is why a combination of enforcement, serious enforcement effort coupled with a guest worker program might be a way to make this work.

WALLACE: Thank you, panel. That's it for today. See you next week. Time now for some mail.

First, about the panel's heated discussion last week about immigration.

Donald Rumsky (ph) from Texas writes: Illegal immigration is a big deal. It is another form of terrorism. It is economic terrorism, and our legislators are dead wrong if they think the silent voting majority of this country is indifferent to it.

But Wade (ph) from New Mexico sees it differently: I think it should be up to the community if they want people from Mexico or not. If they contribute to the community, then let them stay.

And Maureen Bowen (ph) from Georgia had this to say about our interview with the secretary of state: Condi Rice is magnificent. Although she states she is not running for president, we need someone of her caliber. So Condi for president! Sign me up.

Be sure to let us know your thoughts by emailing us at fnsfoxnews.com.

Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: If you're a fan of the show 24, as I am, you like to think there are federal agents working around the clock to get the bad guys before they attack us. Well, we found a real-life Jack Bauer. He would hate that description. But he is the Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

MUDD: Our adversary thinks of this war in terms of sometimes decades of even centuries.

WALLACE: Philip Mudd is the number-two man at the FBI's National Security branch, a unit set up last year with more than 10,000 people to handle the bureau's national security-related operations.

MUDD: My job, I think, is to understand the adversary and think like the enemy. To look at the United States through their lens. What do they want to do? How are they evolving? What do they see as success? How do they want to attack us?

WALLACE: Mudd took us inside the super-secret Strategic Information Operations Center, or SIOC, the command center for a major criminal or a terrorist event.

If there were a real crisis happening right now, what would be going on in this room?

MUDD: You'd be gathering around the people who have pieces of that puzzle, people who are responsible for the operations in the field, making sure all those pieces work together, same place, same time, real time, and talking right across the screens here.

WALLACE: But if they end up in SIOC, in a sense, it's already too late. Mudd's job is to anticipate and uncover threats before they happen.

What is the state of al Qaeda today? Mudd argues it's been badly damaged since 9/11, losing much of its leadership. But he says its message of hate continues to spread.

MUDD: There are emerging groups and in some cases emerging individuals who believe and act as al Qaeda wants them to believe and act. The people who did Madrid, the people who attacked London, the people who want to attack us in the United States are not always al Qaeda members. Often, they are simply people who got the message from al Qaeda and are trying to act themselves.

WALLACE: In that sense, harder to put your hands on it?

MUDD: Absolutely.

WALLACE: Is intelligence a science or an art?

MUDD: I personally view it as more of an art. Where is Iran going to be in two years? There's a science to collecting that kind of information, technically, through human sources, but there's an art of saying what's important?

WALLACE: Philip Mudd graduated in 1984 with a degree in Victorian novels. His father told him the CIA was hiring, so Mudd drove to agency headquarters.

MUDD: The security officer at the front gate looked at me like I had just dropped in from the moon, and I said, well, I saw an ad, so I drove up.

WALLACE: What's followed is 22 years at the CIA and the National Security Council and now the FBI, as the top officer handling Iraq, Iran and other hot spots.

Did 9/11 change your life?

MUDD: I was evacuated on September 11th from a building next to the White House. Personal experience, wondering what happened to those children who now have to grow up without parents because an adversary decided that the killing of innocents was acceptable. I don't know how you go through that kind of experience and not emerge changed. I don't know.

WALLACE: Do the memories of 9/11 still drive you in this job?

MUDD: Absolutely. I would say virtually every day.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: Mudd says one of those jobs is to make sure there's no longer the infamous wall that existed for years between intelligence gathering and law enforcement, and he's happy to report that wall has come tumbling down.

And that's it for today. Have a great week, and we'll see you next Fox News Sunday.

CBS – FACE THE NATION

SCHIEFFER: Good morning again.

Joining us from Chicago this morning, where he'll be in place to see the world champions Chicago White Sox open the baseball season tonight, Senator Dick Durbin.

With us here in the studio, Congressman James Sensenbrenner.

And we're here to talk about the thing that Congress has been talking all week and will be talking about all next week. And there's plenty of talk around the country about the very same thing. And that is immigration. What are we going to do about it? Two men with very different points of view.

Congressmen Sensenbrenner, let me talk to you first. The bill that you have passed and that has now passed in the House really focuses on tightening the borders, on cracking down on illegal immigrants.

Among other things, this bill calls for building a 700-mile fence. Now, I've done a little calculating and 700 miles is from just down the street where we are, the Washington monument; if you go from there to the Sears Tower in Chicago, that comes out to 700 miles.

That's a pretty good-sized fence. How much would it cost to build a fence like that?

SENSENBRENNER: The estimate is about $2 billion.

However, the first thing we have to do to fix our broken system is to stop illegal immigration because if we don't stop illegal immigration by securing the border and cracking down on those employers who do hire a lot of illegal immigrants, there just will be more illegal immigrants coming across the border and flooding our schools and causing a collapse in our health care system.

Once we stop illegal immigration, then I think we should talk about what to do about the 11 million illegal immigrants that are already here.

SCHIEFFER: But let me go back to this fence. What kind of a fence would it be? I mean, this has got to be more than a couple of cowboys with some post hole diggers and a pick-up loaded with cedar posts.

SENSENBRENNER: Absolutely. There will be a physical barrier built where it's appropriate. But in other places there can be a virtual fence which includes high-tech electronic devices, drone planes and stuff like that.

I would point out, in the 38 miles south of San Diego where there is a fence that has been built, since the fence was completed, there has been not been one illegal immigrant that has jumped over the fence and entered the United States illegally.

SCHIEFFER: How many went around it?

SENSENBRENNER: Well, quite a few went around it because we've been having over half million illegal immigrants entering the country this year.

And what they do is they really distort the job market because it's always cheaper to hire an illegal immigrant than hire a citizen or a legal immigrant who has got authorization to work here.

SCHIEFFER: Would the fence be brick? Would it be a cyclone fence? What kind of a fence would it be?

SENSENBRENNER: Whatever is appropriate could be built as a physical barrier.

And the reason we've got this problem is the Mexican government has not helped at all in the problem of illegal migration.

If they had helped, we wouldn't need these types of barriers, but I think they're kind of on the other side.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let me go to Senator Durbin.

Do you think a fence like that would work? And how would you envision such a fence, Senator?

DURBIN: Well, it's hard for me to envision a fence that you couldn't go over, under or around. I think we need some fences in strategic places.

Every bill that's being considered, every immigration bill calls for more secure borders. We know the borders are out of control, as Congressman Sensenbrenner has said. And under the last five years of the Bush administration, they have just broken down completely.

And so we have got to really work together on a bipartisan basis to strengthen the number of people there, maybe coming up with something smarter than a 700-mile fence that uses the best technology, more investigators and more enforcement of the laws when it comes to employment in the United States to make sure that that demand side, the lure of coming to the United States, is diminished.

SCHIEFFER: Well now, one of the things that you're in favor of, as I take it, is some sort of a guest worker program where the people that come into the United States would be allowed to stay here legally and work.

Isn't, as Congressman Sensenbrenner I'm sure is going to say, isn't that putting an enormous load on our facilities, our public institutions, hospitals, schools, so on and so on?

DURBIN: Bob, I'm sitting here in the city of Chicago. I just went across the street for a cup of coffee. I can tell you that many of the people who are working in that restaurant are people who are undocumented. The people who are undocumented are a major part of America's economy. Twenty-nine percent of our agricultural work force in Senator -- pardon me, Congressman Sensenbrenner's state.

I'm sure he's aware of many who are working in industries like printing, for example, or meat packing. They've become an integral part of our economy, an important part. And what I believe we need to do is to really stop the illegal flow and create a legal flow of immigration. People whom we can identify, we'll know their names, where they live, where they work. That'll make us a more secure nation.

SCHIEFFER: What are you going to do with the ones that are already here? I mean, would you -- wouldn't you think it would reward people who came here illegally if you gave them all these things that you're talking about?

DURBIN: Deportation is unrealistic. To think that we could remove -- charge with a crime and remove 11 or 12 million people is unrealistic. And the concept of amnesty has been rejected by everyone, Democrats and Republicans alike. It shouldn't be something automatic where these folks go to the front of the line with a free pass. But what we've come up with on a bipartisan basis in the Senate is a sensible means to create a legal path in the United States for those who are currently undocumented.

And it won't be easy. It will take 11 years. People will have to demonstrate that they're working hard and they're paying taxes, that they have no criminal record. They're learning English. Some will be able to meet these requirements. Some will not. But it's the only way to bring people out of the shadows and have a system consistent with American values.

SCHIEFFER: Congressman.

SENSENBRENNER: The problem with what the Senate is talking about is at the end of 11 years, it is an amnesty because it gives the benefits of American citizenship to those who have been underground, illegally entered the United States, have been working illegally, and if they pay a $2,000 fine and end up doing all of the other things that Senator Durbin is talking about, they become citizens.

Now American citizenship should not be for sale. And what the Senate bill does is it says if they pay those $2,000 fines, they can end up being a citizen. I think American citizenship is priceless, and it ought to be done the legal way just like my ancestors did, and I'm certain the senator's and your ancestors, Bob, did.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you about one point that the senator raised. And that would be this: He says that, you know, it's going to help. That people need this. That this is the right thing to do. Is it really amnesty when you let people work like this to earn citizenship? It seems to me that's sort of one of the things that this country is all about.

SENSENBRENNER: Well, it what this country is all about. But most people have done it the legal way. And it's required an awful lot of patience and cutting through bureaucratic red tape. Now, I am told that somebody who is a U.S. citizen whose brother is in the Philippines has to wait 22 years in order to come to the United States legally under a visa.

Now, somebody else in the Philippines can hop to the head of the line by entering the United States illegally, and they would be a U.S. citizen 11 years ahead of the person who is trying to do it right. We should not have illegal immigrants jump to the head of the line.

And if we open the door to illegal immigration, we end up closing the door to legal immigration. And if we're a country of laws, we can be a country of laws and immigration at the same time. But that requires enforcing the law and not giving a benefit to people who have broken it.

SCHIEFFER: Well, Senator?

DURBIN: I can just tell you that the Senate bill expressly says no one can jump ahead of the line. There's no amnesty. There's nothing automatic about this. And we understand that the current system is a mess.

And I hear some of the folks supporting the house bill saying, well, we've just got to stand and honor this current immigration system. They should be in my office and listen to the people who are calling in who have been trapped by this system.

Bob, yesterday I went to Cristo Rey High School here in Chicago. And there were 25 kids up on stage. They're high school students. Many of them the best in their class who want to go to college. Some of them are already in college. One is pursuing a masters in neurobiology. And our immigration law says to these young people who came here at an early age through no choice of their own, we don't want you in this country. You're a criminal.

Under the House bill, we're going to call you not our future, but we're going to call you a felon. You should leave immediately. And a young man studying for a master's in neurobiology I think is an asset to the future of the United States.

Telling them they have to leave, they're illegal doesn't make us a stronger or a better nation.

SCHIEFFER: But that is not the person who is coming across the Mexican border. These are people who have no education, that are working at the lowest level.

Let me just ask you about this. Paul Krugman of the New York Times, a very liberal writer, who is pro-immigration says that even with all of that, and he favors immigration, what bothers him is you're bringing a large, non-voting work force, which he says is sort of the way it is in places like Dubai.

Do you worry that we might be becoming another Dubai?

DURBIN: If you're asking me, I can tell you that I'm concerned about Krugman's article. I've read it closely.

But the guest worker program that we're promoting is one that puts a cap on the number who can come in under this legal program.

Secondly, the people who hire them have to establish that there are no Americans who would fill this job. And finally they have to be paid a prevailing wage.

So it isn't as if we're creating a working underclass. What we're trying to do is to meet some real employment needs in this country.

It is likely that many of the people watching this program have their children watched in day care by undocumented workers, and their mothers and fathers cared for in nursing homes by these same people.

They're an important part of the economy doing jobs that many people don't want to do in the United States.

SCHIEFFER: Mr. Chairman?

SENSENBRENNER: First, it is always cheaper to hire an illegal immigrant than a citizen or a legal immigrant. The market will work, and as long as we have more illegal immigrants coming across the border and illegal immigrants here, they're the ones that are going to these types of low-paid jobs. And they depress the wages of people who don't have a high school diploma and who are going into entry- level jobs such as Senator Durbin has described. Again, we've got to do things one at a time. The first thing we have to do is to secure the border and turn off the job magnet for people who are hiring illegal immigrants.

If we don't do that, we can have all of the guest worker or amnesty programs that we want to have and nobody will sign up to hire these people because they'll cost more than hiring the illegal immigrants.

SCHIEFFER: Well, Mr. Sensenbrenner, what do you do with the people that are already here? As we saw after Hurricane Katrina and before Hurricane Katrina, we had a devil of a time getting several thousand people out of New Orleans. In fact we didn't get some of them out.

How are you going to get, what 11 million people who are here illegally, out of this country? I mean, just how do you do that?

SENSENBRENNER: Well, Bob, nobody is seriously proposing that because that will require a massive infiltration of law enforcement officials and will disrupt the economy.

The fact is is that we tried an amnesty program and employer sanctions program 20 years ago. And it didn't work because employer sanctions were never enforced, and as a result only a third of those who were eligible for the amnesty signed up for it because they were afraid of losing their jobs.

When you talk about a guest worker program at the same time as firming up the border, history may repeat itself because if we don't firm up the border, the guest worker program is going to actually encourage more people to enter the country illegally.

SCHIEFFER: But I thought you said that we have to address this, we have to tighten the borders and all that. Obviously you're not going to build a 700-mile fence in a matter of months.

SENSENBRENNER: No we're not, but the House-passed bill, which has been condemned across the country set up a program of verifying the accuracy of Social Security numbers in a way similar to a way a merchant verifies the accuracy of a credit card. It will be a computerized system.

And if an employer finds that the person has got a hot Social Security card, if they hire them they're going to have the boom dropped on them and they should.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let me ask both of you, what is going to happen? I know the next week both of you say is going to be crucial here. Will the Senate pass a version of this bill, Senator Durbin? Will it have a guest worker provision in it, do you believe?

DURBIN: Well, we have a good bipartisan support for an approach like this.

But let me tell you there's a chasm between the House and the Senate. Chairman Sensenbrenner has carefully avoided mentioning that his bill creates an aggravated felony, a felony charge against these 11 or 12 million undocumented, as well as the people helping them. So that a person who is a nurse or a volunteer or a person of faith providing humanitarian assistance to anyone who is an undocumented person can be charged with a felony under Chairman Sensenbrenner's bill. That is not going to be easy to resolve...

SCHIEFFER: O.K., so you don't think that the bill is going to pass the Senate. Is that your answer here, Senator Durbin?

DURBIN: I think it's conceivable it will pass, and I hope it does. But what I'm suggesting is the House approach is unacceptable.

SENSENBRENNER: Bob, let me say that I offered an amendment to reduce the felony to a misdemeanor...

SCHIEFFER: But it is in the bill.

SENSENBRENNER: ... and the Democrats in the House of Representatives voted it down.

DURBIN: We're in the minority.

SCHIEFFER: OK, well, let me just ask you, Mr. Sensenbrenner, do you think that there's a way to get this passed? Or are we just going to go through this year with no bill?

SENSENBRENNER: Well, I hope we don't, because no bill will end up being the worst of all possible worlds. What the Senate has to do is pass a bill and then send a bill to conference this week. And that way, we can set up a Senate-House conference committee and attempt to work out an agreement that will get the support of both Houses. This will be tough, and it's the toughest thing that I've done in 37 years in elective public office. But it is an important priority for our national security and our economic well-being.

SCHIEFFER: I have to end it there. I take it from both of you this is still -- a lot to be done before this gets done. Thank you both. We'll be back in a moment with our roundtable with David Brooks.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And joining us now, David Brooks, columnist for The New York Times, and I would say a proud conservative would be one way to describe you.

David, what do you make of this what we just heard here? You heard the Democratic side and one part of the Republican side, but Republicans are split on this because the president wants a guest worker program. House Republicans like Mr. Sensenbrenner don't. Where does this go from here?

BROOKS: Well, I think what you've seen in the Senate is a pretty good debate. I was up in the Senate all week. You had senators actually legislating and compromising.

I thought it was a very sensible debate. I think they have got, you know, this two-pronged approach. Toughen the borders, but give the people here some avenue to responsibly earn their way to citizenship. And that seems pretty balanced.

You go over to the House, and there's just a lot of anger there. And my concern is that those people who are incredibly angry see any form of compromise as some sort of compromise on their patriotism.

And so what I see coming out is a bill in the House, no willingness to compromise because of the anger. A bill coming out of the Senate, no willingness to compromise coming out of the House. We will be in a year where we are today, which is a mess.

SCHIEFFER: So you do not believe that by the election, that we will have any kind of an immigration bill?

BROOKS: No, I really don't. In the House, it's really hard to -- Mr. Sensenbrenner is a very responsible, intelligent man. But you've got a lot of people on his side of the debate which are -- which are just enraged, unwilling to talk reasonably.

I was up at a press conference this week where a House Republican said, you know, we've got to have some people to pick lettuce in this country. So we're not going to have immigrants, let's make the prisoners do it.

You want to hit the guy on the head with a baseball bat. We're going to take a largely minority population, forced labor, picking lettuce and cotton. Is this ringing any bells here? You're just -- you're not dealing with people who are willing to compromise, and that's why I don't think anything is going to happen.

SCHIEFFER: Is this going to hurt the Republicans?

BROOKS: There's a danger of that. There's a danger. Because a lot of Republicans are legitimately angry at the way there's no law and order. But if you look at the people who are Republicans, who are against -- who are for the tough immigration, they come largely from very Republican areas. If you look at the Republicans who are running nationally, whether it was Ronald Reagan 20 years ago, George W. Bush today, John McCain today, you look at the senators who are running in swing states -- DeWine in Ohio -- these people are moderates. So it's the hard-core people are from all Republican districts who aren't looking at the broader American populace. It's a very complicated political issue.

If you take people in a focus group and say, what do you think about immigration, the first 15 minutes of that focus group is rage.

People are upset. They're sneaking across the borders. They're in our schools; they're in our hospitals. They're upset. So that's 15 minutes.

You get beyond 15 minutes and you start saying, what are you going to do? Are we going to send them home? No. We're not going to do that. Are we going to build a fence? Obviously, we're not going to do that.

Once you get people thinking practically about this, then you've got a lot of moderation and compromise. And I think there is a sweet spot there, if we could reach it politically.

I'm just pessimistic we're going to reach that spot.

SCHIEFFER: Well, do you think the Republicans are in danger at this point of losing control of the House?

You have some other issues out there, too, not the least of which is a very unpopular war, as we're now seeing.

BROOKS: Right. There's really a torpor in the administration. They're not doing anything right now.

I think it's now likely that they will lose the House. And I think House Republicans -- privately, most do admit that. For a year they were saying, well, we've got it so sewed up with redistricting. We'll lose, but we won't lose the whole House.

I'd say, about two weeks ago, the conventional wisdom shifted and people said, we're in such trouble, we are going to lose the House.

Personally, I think it would be good for the Republican party because it would make them a little more responsive. It would be good for the Democratic party; they'd be a little more responsible.

But I think now it's likely they will lose the House. If the Democrats can't win now, when are they ever going to win?

SCHIEFFER: The president has announced he has a new chief of staff. Do you see a larger shake-up in the White House staff there? And what is this indicative of, do you think?

BROOKS: Well, I think it's indicative of a few things: first, terrible relations with Capitol Hill, which they're finally upset by.

The president was a little frustrated with Andy Card in that he wasn't getting news in time. There would be information about Katrina and other things that would go up to Andy Card, but it wouldn't reach the president's desk.

They all like Andy Card, a lovable guy. But there was a little frustration there. Josh Bolten is someone -- you know, if you divide the White House staff into automatons and people with whom it's possible to have a normal conversation, Josh Bolton is one of those people who can have a normal conversation.

He can talk to members of Congress. He's already called, I think, 30 of them to, sort of, have normal conversations, so they're not just lecturing down to people, which has been a problem.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, David Brooks, thank you very much.

I'll be back with a final word in just a minute.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And finally today: When was it -- a couple of years ago that the president said this was the century we should go to Mars?

I'd forgotten all about it, but as I got back from vacation last night and was going through last week's papers, there it was, the story that said, for the first time in 30 years, our scientists are hard at work planning a flight to the moon, not just a quick trip but to build an outpost where humans can live as they prepare for that trip to Mars.

Now, that gave me some pause. We can't figure out how to get those thousands of trailers standing empty in Arkansas down to New Orleans down to house the people who lost their homes during Katrina, but we're designing housing for the moon?

We can't seem to make those levies that broke the last time strong enough to withstand the next really bad hurricane, but, according to that story in The Washington Post, our scientists are now deep into studies on the effect of moon dust on the humans who will draw that lunar duty?

It's more than a matter of priorities, it seems to me. When you think back on how the government bungled the original response to Katrina, or the wrong intelligence that took us to Iraq, and even that crazy deal, safe or not, that had all of us unaware an Arab company was about to take control of our key ports, you have to ask, has the federal bureaucracy grown so big and so cumbersome that no one really knows what it's doing at any particular point in time?

That leads me to the harder question: If we really had to go to the moon, could we still find a way to get there?

That's it for us. We'll see you next week, right here on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11:00 a.m. in Washington, 8:00 a.m. in Los Angeles, 10:00 a.m. in Mexico City, 7:00 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition."

We'll get to our guests in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Sophia.

We begin in Iraq where the U.S. secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, and her British counterpart, the foreign secretary, Jack Straw, made a surprise visit today.

Our senior international correspondent, Nic Robertson, is following the story. He's joining us live from Baghdad. Nic?

NIC ROBERTSON, CNN SR. INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: Wolf, it's been a round of meetings with top politicians here. They met first with Jalal Talabani, the president of Iraq. The meeting there, congratulating him on all his efforts to get a new government formed in Iraq.

They said, and they stressed, both Jack Straw and Condoleezza Rice stressed that a new Iraqi leader must be somebody who can bring all Iraqis into the fold.

They went on to meetings then with the current prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari. Now, Mr. Jaafari is widely viewed as the principal stumbling block in forming that new government. His United Iraqi Alliance, the big Shia coalition, has nominated him. There are objections from Sunni politicians, from secular politicians and from the Kurds. They didn't directly tell him that he needs to step down. Diplomacy doesn't allow for that. But the message was there that Iraqis -- Iraq's politicians need now to form a new government very quickly for the sake of their people and for the sake of stopping the violence here, Wolf.

BLITZER: Nic, there have been a bunch of incidents, more incidents today in Iraq even as these desperate efforts to form a new government of national unity continue with direct intervention now of the British and U.S. foreign ministers in effect.

What happened with that U.S. Military helicopter that apparently went down?

ROBERTSON: An Apache Longbow helicopter operating south of Baghdad about 5:30 in the evening yesterday, about 15 miles south of Baghdad. It went down in combat operations, we're told. At the moment the two pilots are missing. It's not clear exactly what has happened to them, but they were shot down in combat operations. And the investigation, the search for them and to find out exactly what happened, is still ongoing, Wolf.

BLITZER: Nic Robertson reporting for us in Baghdad. Nic, thanks very much.

And as we now know, the American journalist, Jill Carroll, is about to land back in the United States. Her plane scheduled to land soon in Boston, having survived a three-month hostage ordeal in Iraq.

But the deadly insurgency, the sectarian violence, continues. There's still no new Iraqi government. Just a short while ago I spoke with Iraq's foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, in Baghdad.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Foreign Minister, thank you very much for joining us. Welcome back to "Late Edition."

You had two surprise visitors today, at least surprise to the rest of the world, maybe not to you, the Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

What was their basic message to the government of Iraq?

HOSHYAR ZEBARI, IRAQI FOREIGN MINISTER: Thank you, Wolf.

In fact, I've just come from meeting out two guests in Baghdad: Dr. Rice and Mr. Straw, Secretary Straw. And the message they are bringing is of two parts. One, there is a sense of urgency to form this new Iraqi national unity government. And second is, there is a sense of impatience back in Washington and London about the delay in the formation of this government. And they were urging us and all the other Iraqi leaders to accelerate efforts to form this government.

BLITZER: What about Ibrahim al-Jaafari? Is he the man that you have confidence in, who should be the next prime minister of Iraq?

ZEBARI: Well, this is one of the challenges, actually, to form this new government. There are a number of parliamentary blocs who raised questions about him leading the next full-term government for four years.

And all the main parliamentary blocs have written to the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shia bloc, to reconsider his nomination. But still, there is a deadlock on this, and the only way to break that stalemate, in my view, is to go to the parliament, to convene the House of Representatives of 275 persons, and then to resolve this issue, whether it would be him or somebody else, or to nominate some other people from the United Iraqi Alliance. I think this is how the thinking is about resolving this issue of the nomination of the prime minister.

BLITZER: Even one of the Shiite leaders yesterday, Qasim Dawood, said, "I call on Jaafari to take a courageous step and set a fine example by stepping down. We have stood behind him for 50 days, and today we have reached the conclusion that there should be a prime minister for all Iraqis, not just one group."

Is that the Kurdish position as well? You're a leading Kurdish political figure.

ZEBARI: Well, the Kurdish Alliance also has written to the Shia bloc, or the United Iraqi Alliance bloc, to reconsider the nomination of Dr. Jaafari, and to give more than one option, or one candidate. What Mr. Qasim Dawood said, actually, he's a member of the alliance, he's a new joiner, and that was his personal -- his view, actually, about Jaafari's nomination.

But I think this issue, Wolf, to be honest and frank, is not an easy one. Up to now, the Shia, or the United Iraqi Alliance still support Jaafari as their main candidate, and they haven't changed views and opinion on him, and they believe that if Jaafari goes, they go. That's why it's not an easy issue, this.

We tried over the last few weeks to resolve this issue amicably, by consensus, but it seems that the issue will not be resolved, and it will go to the parliament to be settled there.

BLITZER: This is what Ibrahim al-Jaafari was quoted in "The New York Times" as saying on Friday. He said: "There's concern among the Iraqi people that the democratic process is being threatened. The source of this is that some American figures have made statements that interfere with the results of the democratic process."

There seems to be growing unease, at least among some of the Iraqi Shiite leaders, as far as the U.S. ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad in Baghdad, is concerned.

Do you see him as a source of a solution to this crisis or a source of the problem?

ZEBARI: Well, the U.S. ambassador, Dr. Khalilzad, has played a very important, prominent role since his appointment here, and we've been working very closely with him. And really, he's admired, he's respected by all the communities.

But because of the sensitivity of this situation, you will hear some criticism from this side or the other side. I think the main criticism is -- from the Shia bloc has been really, you should not be too upfront.

The United States has a great deal of influence to exercise on all the political leaders. There are different ways to use that.

But I think he still enjoys the respect and the -- of all the Iraqi leaders, including Shia leaders from the United Iraqi Alliance. And I think Iraq is blessed to have such an ambassador with such political skills, to help all the parties to reach consensus.

BLITZER: One quote that stuck out from Ambassador Khalilzad recently -- he said this. He said: "More Iraqis in Baghdad are dying if you look at the recent period of two, three weeks from the militia attacks than from the terrorist car bombings."

These militias seem to be out of control right now in terms of the revenge, the killings that are going on. How bad is the situation?

ZEBARI: Well, I don't want to underestimate the seriousness or the gravity of the situation, but really, it's not a situation close or near to sectarian war, an all-out sectarian war, or civil war, as some of the commentators have indicated.

The country is not dragging into a civil war, or even a sectarian war. There are violence, but this violence is localized in certain areas. It's not nationwide.

Secondly, the political will of the Iraqi leaders had not been shaken. They stood against that scenario. The presence of the multinational force on the ground also serves as a deterrent against the breakout of an all-out sectarian war, as well as we have a political process.

We are making some modest achievements, but everybody is on track; everybody is talking; everybody is compromising.

The main problem is one of time. We are losing a great deal of time. And unless this government is formed to be up and running definitely, I believe, seriously, that there would be more killing and more Iraqi blood shed in vain.

BLITZER: Foreign Minister, it was kind of you to spend some time with us here on "Late Edition" during this hectic schedule you have. Thanks very much.

ZEBARI: My pleasure. My pleasure.

BLITZER: And just ahead, the immigration battle here in the United States.

We're going to go live to Mexico, talk with that country's president, Vicente Fox. This is an exclusive interview that you will see only here on CNN.

Then we'll get the view on this heated debate from two key U.S. senators, Chuck Hagel and Evan Bayh. They're standing by live.

Plus, the nuclear standoff with Iran. Will that country's government reconsider its position? My exclusive interview with the top Iranian nuclear official. Stay with us.

BLITZER: Welcome back. This week's summit in Mexico on illegal immigration ended with promises of greater cooperation from all parties. But the issue remains a volatile one, especially here in the United States.

Joining us now from Mexico with his perspective is the country's president, Vicente Fox.

Mr. President, welcome back to "Late Edition." Thanks very much for joining us.

Help us understand what, if anything, was accomplished in Cancun on this very sensitive subject of illegal immigration into the United States.

PRES. VICENTE FOX, MEXICO: Wolf, how are you? Good to be in your program.

This meeting in Cancun was extraordinary. It held a lot of accomplishments; to begin with, to get the friendship and the personal relationship stronger, especially with the visit of the prime minister from Canada, Stephen, because at Chichen Itza and the meetings gave us the opportunity to really exchange about different subjects.

On the subject of migration, a bilateral subject among United States and Mexico, we had the opportunity to review where is the issue right now, where is the debate.

And it's clear that the issue is on U.S. Congress, so the ball now is there. And we fully respect the sovereignty of the U.S. Congress. And I know they will take the most appropriate decision for both, for the betterment of the United States and for Mexico.

We understand the issue of migration as a responsibility that we share, both countries, but we have to deal with it until we can have a flow of migrants or the situation of migration in United States handled with an orderly manner, with a legal manner, secure manner.

And we are here to cooperate and do our part of the job and exercise our clear responsibilities that we have on the issue, which is building up opportunities for our people in Mexico.

That is what we want at the very end. And we're trying hard. We're working on this, bringing in new jobs, granting new opportunities to people in their communities. So this is the situation right now.

BLITZER: Listen to what the president said because he clearly wants your government to do a lot more to stop some of the migrants from coming into the United States. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Border security is not just one country's prerogative. It's the prerogative and duty of both countries. And we spent time talking about how to work together to continue to strengthen that cooperation necessary to do our duty.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: The president, Mr. President, the president of the United States -- he wants you to take more aggressive steps to stop the illegal immigration into the United States.

Are you planning on taking any steps along your northern border with the United States to do that?

FOX: Absolutely, yes. Number one, by creating opportunities in Mexico. Right now, on the border there's 100,000 spaces available for jobs on the Mexican side. So we work hard on the opportunities.

Number two, we work hard on the enforcement of the law and the security on the border. We work very closely together, associated with the Homeland Security Department in the States, with Mr. Chertoff.

We work on an everyday basis to make that border secure, to make sure that we comply with human rights respect, and we're doing the same actions and programs on the southern border. Because today, we have a strong migration coming from Central America into Mexico illegally, and then trying to move up to the United States.

Now, for instance, last year we withheld 240,000 Central Americans, and we sent them back to their communities, to their nations. So we're working on all aspects. First, our obligation is to grant opportunities to our people in Mexico. Number two is to do our part of the responsibility in complying with the law and yes, trying to retain our people here in Mexico.

BLITZER: The legislation that passed the House of Representatives, and now different legislation is being considered in the U.S. Senate. The House version would make the illegal immigration a felony, would require employers to verify workers' status.

It would place serious fines for hiring illegal immigrants. It would build a 700-mile fence along part of the U.S.-Mexican border. It would not allow any guest worker program. The president of the United States wants a guest worker program. What do you think of this 700- mile fence that so many members of the U.S. House of Representatives and some in the Senate would like to build?

FOX: Wolf, the specifics are hard to meet at this point of time. But let me tell you that I fully agree that it has to be a comprehensive resolution that, first of all, has to do with security, has to do with a border that really is sufficient but also has to do with the jobs that these people is doing in United States.

They are being hired by somebody. U.S. economy needs this energy, needs this working force. At the same time, we know that we have to do the part of our responsibility that has to do with building up opportunities in Mexico. Now, how we manage the border, it has to be number one with security. And migration should be under the rules of a legal situation, has to be with order the flow of migrants and has to be secure, respecting their human rights.

And if we reach that situation, that desired situation, then there's no need for walls or there's no need for other actions now.

We are not just going to sit down here in Mexico and say, oh, very good, we have now the opportunity to send people there. No way. We understand our responsibility. And our responsibility is to work...

BLITZER: Unfortunately, it looks like we just lost our transmission from Mexico. We're going to try to repair that and get back to the president of Mexico, Vicente Fox, in a moment. The satellite just went down. We'll take a quick break.

Much more of my conversation with the president of Mexico, Vicente Fox, right after this. Stay with us.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We're joined once again, live, by the president of Mexico, Vicente Fox.

Mr. President, did you know there's serious criticism that elements of your government have actually encouraged illegal immigration from Mexico into the southern part of the United States for whatever economic or social reasons?

What do you say to those critics?

FOX: I deny that. That's not true. We work hard on the opposite, in trying to build up opportunities here in Mexico.

As a matter of fact, our people don't want to be there as long as they have opportunities here. And so basically, that had...

BLITZER: Well, that's unfortunate. We just had another satellite collapse there. We apologize to the President of Mexico, Vicente Fox. We'll try to regroup. We'll try to fix that.

In the meantime we'll take another break.

We'll stand by and speak with two U.S. senators, Republican Chuck Hagel, Democrat Evan Bayh. They're standing by. We'll get to them right after this short break.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I expect the debate to bring dignity to America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Welcome back. President Bush at this week's summit in Cancun, Mexico, talking about the hot-button issue of immigration reform.

Welcome back to "Late Edition."

Here to talk about that and more two guests, Republican Senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. He's a member of the Senate Select Intelligence Committee as well as the Foreign Relations Committee.

And Democratic Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana. He also serves on the Intelligence Committee as well as the Armed Services Committee.

Senators, welcome back to "Late Edition."

We're going to speak hopefully with President Vicente Fox. We'll bring him into this conversation as soon as we get that technical problem resolved.

But let's talk a little bit about this whole immigration battle.

Do you agree with the president, Senator Hagel, that there must be a guest worker program that would put these illegal immigrants right now on a track over many years toward citizenship?

SEN. CHUCK HAGEL (R), NEBRASKA: Yes, I do agree with the president. I think immigration reform is just as President Fox and President Bush have said, is more than just border security. That's an element, of course.

But we have today 11 million, 12 million illegal immigrants in this country. That's not in our interest national security wise, economically, socially.

And I think any type of immigration reform we pass must include some pathway to a legal status.

Now, different ways to do that. And there are other dynamics here too. We've got visa issues and -- so I would hope and expect that the United States Senate is going to have a legitimate debate on this. I hope that we can pass a bill that in fact addresses these issues. So I think the president's right.

BLITZER: So you totally disagree with those in the Republican party, the so-called base, the conservative base -- Tom Tancredo, and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, James Sensenbrenner, and others -- who say that this guest worker program is nothing more than amnesty and rewarding those who jumped ahead of the line and didn't play by the rules?

HAGEL: No, I was the first to introduce comprehensive immigration reform legislation, bipartisan three years ago with Tom Daschle.

I know amnesty when I see it. And amnesty was what Jimmy Carter gave those who fled this country and decided not to fight in Vietnam. That's amnesty: unconditional, come back, all is forgiven. That's amnesty.

The bill that I have, the bills that have been introduced, what came out of the Judiciary Committee, that's not amnesty. This is criteria that they have to comply with.

And the other question I would ask back to that group: how are you going to address this? You realistically think that you are going to get 12 million illegal immigrants to come out of the shadows? Many have been here over five years, now well into the fabric of communities, paying taxes, raising families, going to church on Sunday.

And you think they're going to load up on a bus and go home? Come on. Let's get real with this.

They don't have an answer. And we've got to understand what our options are in the interests of our country.

So yes, I do disagree with them because I don't think they're enhancing the debate. I don't think they're providing any solutions. And we're looking here at solutions.

BLITZER: I suspect, Senator Bayh, you pretty much agree with Senator Hagel on all of this, but correct me if I'm wrong.

SEN. EVAN BAYH (D), INDIANA: No, I do agree, Wolf. I think we'd be a lot better off if we had more Chuck Hagels and Dick Lugars involved in this debate.

We've got to be both honest and practical with the American people. And it is true that we have a security problem along our border. It is not right for our country to have hundreds of thousands of undocumented people coming and going. We've got to do more to secure those borders.

BLITZER: Should there be a wall, a fence, a 700-mile fence, as the House passed?

BAYH: Well, I said both true and practical, Wolf. I don't know (inaudible) a wall's going to work. So we have to do things to secure the border, to stem that flow but in a more practical way.

And dealing with the guest worker issue, I think Chuck is exactly right. We've got about 12 million people. That's close to double the population of my state: every man, woman, and child.

We couldn't track these people down and expel them from the country if we wanted to.

So we have to find a way, without rewarding violating the law, to bring them out of the shadows, impose fines, criminal background checks, paying back taxes, learning English, those kinds of things. Make them go to the back of the line.

But then have some kind of regular status here because the truth is that's in our national security interest, too.

BLITZER: Let's switch gears and talk about Iraq. The secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, made a surprise visit there today with Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary. Clearly, they're trying to get a government of national unity in place.

The sense is that Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the man selected by the Shiite majority, is not the guy to do it. How forceful should the U.S. be, the Bush administration specifically, Senator Hagel, in trying to get this new government of national unity in Iraq off the ground?

HAGEL: Well, there's no question that the future of Iraq will be decided by the Iraqi people. This election took place almost four months ago, and we still do not have a government. Yes, we would want to see -- hope to see, and I think it really is dependent on whether the Iraqis can form a national unity government.

But to your question, we have limited influence. You can't have it both ways. We have been in fact the de facto government of Iraq the last three years. We've put into position all those who have essentially governed the Iraqis. We took great pride four months ago as the president and others have said the Iraqis have had a free, fair election, a constitutionally based election, they have elected 275 members of a national assembly, they will choose their own prime minister and their cabinet.

And so we have to accept the end product of that. If in fact we really believe in democracy.

So to go in now and to try to forge a different outcome from where the 275 members are is going to be difficult. There's a backlash we're seeing right now in Iraq for that.

And we cannot be seen as again trying to insert a puppet government or however way that's perceived. Just the fact that we had to have the secretary of state and British foreign minister make essentially an emergency visit to Baghdad tells us an awful lot.

BLITZER: How concerned are you, Senator Bayh, and you're privy to the most sensitive information, that this country is on the verge of a civil war?

BAYH: Well, I'm very concerned, Wolf. One or two more atrocities like the bombing of that mosque, and we could have something like a civil war there. And it's very violent as it is today.

We have to put the pressure on them not to choose who we want as their leader but to get their own political act together, to form a unity government where the Shia will not just seek to have payback against the Sunnis.

The Sunnis will reconcile themselves to the future, not attempt to go back to the past, and the Kurds will realize they can have some autonomy but not a quasi-independent state. If they get their act together, Wolf, we can help them. If they don't, if they're not willing to make the tough compromises to live in one country together, no matter what we do, this is not going to work out and a civil war may be likely.

So picking their prime minister? No. But telling them, look, the time for decision making is now? Yes, that's absolutely what we should do.

BLITZER: We've re-established contact with the President of Mexico, Vicente Fox. I want to bring him in.

Mr. President, once again, our apologies for some of those satellite problems that have occurred. Two senators, prominent Senators Evan Bayh and Chuck Hagel, are here in our Washington studios with us. We're talking about Iraq. I want to get back to immigration in a moment. But any regrets that you have that you didn't support President Bush when he asked for your support on the war in Iraq three years ago?

FOX: I think they are completely two different subjects that have different considerations. What we have on our agenda today is several bilateral issues, specifically and most importantly the migration issue, which we're working out together. We have worked hard for five years, listening, getting the facts, understanding the problem and coming up with proposals or solutions.

And basically, there are two that are key. One --

BLITZER: Unfortunately, there he goes again. We apologize to the President of Mexico, Vicente Fox. We're going to try to fix that and bring him back on "Late Edition" on another occasion.

But once again, we're sorry for those technical problems.

BAYH: Let him know it happens to us too, Wolf.

BLITZER: It's nothing anti-Mexican. I can assure our viewers. These things happen in live television.

Let's continue this conversation about Iraq. Senator Hagel, you said, and correct me if I'm wrong, you think the country's in worse shape now than it was three years ago. I'm paraphrasing. But what did you mean by that?

HAGEL: Well, I think if you look at the measurement of progress and where we are today in Iraq versus three years ago, whether it's oil production, whether it's corruption, whether it's government, whether it's just the basic needs of the people, more illegality, illegal acts, murders, criminality, when you look at the scope of where we are as you measure progress in any country, I think it is worse off, Iraq, today than it was three years ago.

And I would add to that, the region. I've always believed that you can't deal with Iraq in an isolated test tube. It is part of a regional dynamic. Is the Middle East more stable...
BLITZER: So what I hear you saying -- let me interrupt for a moment. What I hear you saying is it was a huge mistake to go in and get rid of Saddam Hussein, the U.S. should have just left him there, tried to contain him, continue that status quo, with hindsight you believe it was a mistake?

HAGEL: Well, you know what I've said about this over the last three years, and I've questioned it every step of the way.

History will decide whether it was a mistake or not.

But the fact is where we are today I think the Middle East is more unstable, more complicated, more dangerous than it was three years ago.

Now, historians will figure out whether we made a mistake or not.

But certainly every tactical, every strategic decision right from the beginning was a mistake in my opinion. Try to invade a country the size of Iraq with 130,000 troops and occupy it? That was insane. The chief of staff of the army, General Shinseki, said it was. He said it would take hundreds of thousands of troops. Secretary Rumsfeld and others said, well, that was just fantasy.

So, yes, I think we are in worse shape today than we were three years ago.

BLITZER: Senator Bayh, you agree?

BAYH: We're nowhere near where we need to be, Wolf, that's for sure. And the level of incompetence that has characterized this venture has been tragic and breathtaking.

As Chuck mentioned, never enough troops, no plan for the aftermath, complete de-Baathification, that policy was described to me in Baghdad this last January by one of the administration's top people there as, quote, "insane."

So this whole thing has been just a tragedy from the beginning in terms of the incompetence...

BLITZER: So what do you do at this point?

BAYH: Two things. Number one, one of our to be generals told me in our last visit, there's no military answer to this; there can only be a political answer to this. So keep the pressure on the Iraqis to reach the tough decisions they have to make to make a political go of it. Then there may be some possibility for extricating ourselves in a reasonable way.

If they don't make those tough decisions, then this is never going to work out, and we should leave sooner rather than later.

The final thing, though, is then security. Benchmarks for progress, a timeline for reaching those benchmarks, accountability for making them. One final point, Wolf, it's not helpful when the president says, "Well, this is going to be for my successor to decide. We're there for at least three more years."

That's not the way you keep the pressure on the Iraqis to make the hard decisions they have to make...

BLITZER: He said future presidents would have to decide on the extent of the U.S. deployment in Iraq.

HAGEL: Wolf, if I could add one thing to Evan's list of things we have to do. We must recognize this in a regional security way. We must bring in the countries of that region in some established regional security format, concept, because this is a regional issue.

And the only way you do that is you've got to buy them in over there. And to let Iraq flap around out there, as has been the case the last three years, is going to produce a very unstable and dangerous world.

And that has to be done. To regionalize this in some security mechanism, whether it's a regional NATO or whatever it is, as soon as this government is formed that has to happen, it seems to me.

BLITZER: Senator Bayh, listen to what Secretary Rice said on Friday and then her subsequent clarification on Saturday.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, SECRETARY OF STATE: I know we've made tactical errors, thousands of them, I'm sure. This could have gone that way or that could have gone that way. But when you look back in history, what will be judged is did you make the right strategic decisions.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: I meant it figuratively, not literally. All right? Let me be very clear about that. I wasn't sitting around counting. I also said a little later on that I've done this a thousand times. That probably was also figurative.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: When she said that the U.S. has made thousands of tactical errors looking back, she didn't mean it literally. But she is acknowledging that there were a lot of mistakes that were made.

BAYH: It sounds, Wolf, like they were for candor before they decided to be against candor. I mean, finally -- and I think the American people will understand that mistakes have been made.

What they don't understand is the inability to learn from those mistakes, to do better, to move on and get to the place where we need to be. So I think it was -- I think she should have stuck with her first admission, which was look, mistakes have been made. Now we need to learn from them and go on and bring this to a better conclusion.

BLITZER: Senator Hagel, you served in Vietnam. You're a combat veteran. A lot of parents of troops, men and women, are serving in Iraq right now. When they look at the current situation, should these young men and women be in harm's way, as they clearly are, it's a very dangerous situation, knowing what you know right now? Or should the U.S. simply declare a victory, if you will, and get out?

HAGEL: Well, our brave young men and women who have put their lives on the line for this country are there because they're committed to a cause greater than their own self-interest. And the cohesion of that commitment to our country, to our policy, must stay strong.

And yes, the human dynamic of this as parents look at their children, is that worth it? Is my son or daughter's life worth what's going on over there?

Again, I think we can't in these particular times get bogged down with that one question because this is a large concept of a policy. We're trying to deal with not only terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, our national security, but the fact is we do overlook and we did overlook at the beginning that human dynamic. Somebody has to fight these wars. Somebody dies in these wars and is maimed. And somehow we tend to disconnect that from the policy.

BLITZER: Because -- I ask you these questions because both of you have widely been considered potential presidential candidates.

And I'm going to take a break, but I want to ask both of you before we do, if you were president, could you look an American parent in the eye and say I want to send your son or daughter over to Iraq right now because this is critical to the American national security?

HAGEL: Well, I would never say that because I never believed it when we went in. I said before we went in that we are in a situation in Iraq that Iraq does not present an imminent danger to the United States of America.

Now, we can't have thousands of presidents and secretaries of state and other senior officials. We have one president. We have one Congress. And they make the policy for this country.

But no, I would not have said that because I didn't believe it. I would never send a troop anywhere in the world unless I believed, and the president I'm sure believed and still does, his policy is the right policy.

And I'm not questioning the -- or impugning his motives. But I don't agree.

BLITZER: You want to just quickly respond?

BAYH: Two things, Wolf. I think it is right when we stand for freedom, it is right when we stand for democracy, and it is right when we stand against dictators like Saddam.

Knowing what we know today, we wouldn't have made the same decisions that we've made. We would have tried to displace him using other means.

But we are where we are, and it is in the national security interests of the United States of America to try and keep this from devolving into a civil war that will destabilize the region and come back to hurt us.

If the Iraqis get their act together, we have a chance to prevent that. If they don't, then we should leave much sooner rather than later because there is nothing we can do for them if they are not willing or capable of doing for themselves.

BLITZER: All right, Senators, stand by.

We'll take a quick break.

Much more of our conversation with Senators Hagel and Bayh right after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're talking with Nebraska Republican Senator Chuck Hagel -- he's a member of the Senate Intelligence and Foreign Relations Committees -- and Indiana Democratic Senator Evan Bayh. He's also a member of the Intelligence Committee as well as the Armed Services Committee.

There was a front page headline, Senator Hagel, in the Washington Post that said this, "Attacking Iran May Trigger Terrorism: U.S. Experts Wary of Military Action Over Nuclear Program."

Should the U.S., assuming diplomacy fails, try to militarily take out the Iranian nuclear facilities?

HAGEL: Well, first of all, I think we have to recognize that this Iranian issue does represent a real threat to the United States.

BLITZER: Unlike Iraq, you mean.

HAGEL: Unlike Iraq. This is a real legitimate issue.

And I think, before we charge off in going off to another war -- we're in two of them now, in Afghanistan and Iraq -- we'd better think through this one carefully and clearly. I think it's going to require an engagement directly with the Iranians.

BLITZER: You mean direct conversation?

HAGEL: I think the United States, not just on Iraq, but an entire package of interests -- I don't know how you conduct diplomacy; I don't know how you deal with these great complicated, dangerous issues of our time unless you talk to people.

We really do not have good intelligence on what's going on there. That story in the Washington Post, I think, is quite accurate.

BLITZER: The story, Senator Bayh, was that if the U.S. were to take military action, the Iranians would respond through Hezbollah or Islamic Jihad with worldwide terror attacks against Americans.

BAYH: Wolf, they probably would. They would probably also try and disrupt our petroleum supply from the Persian Gulf. So there are all sorts of practical and adverse consequences to using military force.

But the consequences of a nuclear armed Iran, the foremost sponsor of terrorism in the world, are just, if not more grave.

So what we need to do today, Wolf, is very much like John Kennedy did with Cuba when there was an attempt to put nuclear weapons there: seek to make Iran a pariah state with an economic, financial, political embargo of that country, summoning all the other nations that have the capability of doing that to let them know that there are adverse consequences to continuing to pursue this nuclear path.

That, really, at this juncture is our best hope of avoiding two unacceptable alternatives, a nuclear powered Iran or using military force against them, which has very difficult consequences.

BLITZER: We only have a little time left, but very quickly, if you could give me your quick response. Senator Feingold's motion to censure the president because of the warrantless domestic surveillance; do you think that's a good idea?

BAYH: Look, I understand the frustration and the anger at the direction this country has taken the last five years. Those are emotions that I share as well.

But we owe it to this country to do more than just vent our frustrations or to engage in symbolic actions. We have to change our course.

That means rewriting the FISA statute and ultimately winning November's elections so that we can have more checks and balances. I just don't see how that helps us get to either of those outcomes.

BLITZER: What do you think?

HAGEL: I'm opposed to it. I don't think it's a wise course of action.

I disagree with the president on his interpretation of FISA and his authority to wiretap without warrants. But the best way to handle that is the way we're doing it now.

I was one of the four Republicans who rewrote that bill, introduced that bill. That's the way to do it. I don't think the president lied to America. I don't happen to agree with his interpretation. But I think his interests were right and his motives were clear.

So to say we ought to censure him because we disagree with him -- I don't think that's the correct way to approach it.

BLITZER: Do you want to be president of the United States?

HAGEL: Well, I'll make a decision on my political future after the election this year.

We need a lot of good people like Senator Bayh and others in this business. And I think we do have a lot of great people who are going to come forward for the 2008 election. America needs them, both Democrats and Republicans.

BLITZER: What's your answer? Do you want to be president of the United States?

BAYH: I want to help lead this country in a better direction, Wolf. We need that. What capacity that will mean, I haven't decided yet. I hope it won't harm our friendship if I don't announce that on your show here today.

BLITZER: It won't harm our friendship. Thanks to both of you. Appreciate it very much.

HAGEL: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: And there's much more ahead on "late Edition," including the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. We'll ask him about his proposal to address the uproar over illegal immigration. "Late Edition" continues, right at the top of the hour.

BLITZER: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We are a nation of laws, and, therefore, must enforce our laws. And that includes enforcing the laws of people coming into our country illegally.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: From the immigration battle to the war in Iraq, President Bush goes on the offensive, but is the U.S. public buying his message and how worried are Republicans in Congress about slumping poll numbers?

We'll ask Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: It is not the international community that is isolating Iran. It is the Iranian regime that is isolating Iran.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Iran gets a new warning about its nuclear program. Will the country defy the world? Iran's representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, speaks out in an exclusive interview.

Welcome back. We'll speak with the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist in just a moment.

First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Sophia.

In Iraq a bit of diplomatic muscle today, the U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her British counterpart, the Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, made a surprise visit to Baghdad.

Our senior international correspondent, Nic Robertson, is in the Iraqi capital. He's joining us now with the latest details. Nic?

ROBERTSON: Well, Wolf, they met with a lot of politicians here today. But the first one they met with, the president of Iraq, Jalal Talabani, thanking him for his efforts in trying to form a new Iraqi government for holding meetings. And they stressed to him the importance that whoever leads the new Iraqi government needs to be someone who can bring Iraqis into the fold.

They then met with Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the current prime minister in Iraq, the man who is widely seen here as a stumbling block to forming that new government. He wants to be the next prime minister of Iraq.

Sunni politicians, secular politicians, Kurdish politicians all oppose his nomination by the dominant, large Shia political bloc.

The discussions there very diplomatic, but the message coming across loud and clear to Iraqi politicians from both Jack Straw and Condoleezza Rice, that the Iraqis need to form that new government quickly. The reason they need to do it quickly is because the vacuum is allowing the insurgency, is allowing the sectarian violence to really get a hold here in Iraq, Wolf.

BLITZER: Nic Robertson on the scene for us in Baghdad. Thank you very much.

Back here in the United States, Iraq certainly a high issue as is the immigration reform debate. And it's drawing some unusual battle lines with members of the president's own party opposing key parts of his proposal for reform.

Joining us now to talk about immigration, Iraq, lots of other issues, the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Senator, thanks very much for joining us.

SEN. BILL FRIST (R-TN), MAJORITY LEADER: Wolf, nice to be with you today.

BLITZER: Let's talk about Iraq, first and foremost. This is an issue that hovers over this presidency over these past three years. It will define, I think most experts agree, the Bush presidency.

How concerned are you right now that this whole adventure in Iraq may turn out to be a waste, if you will, or it may turn out to be nothing that really justified the enormous cost in lives and treasure?

FRIST: Well, I'm not concerned about the justification because I believe that we were justified initially, we're justified today with the war on terror being a war that it is incumbent upon us to address aggressively. That's what we're doing in Iraq, Afghanistan, indeed around the world.

I do think it's going to be a critical week this week. The president has laid out a very clear plan for Iraq in a political sense, in an economic sense and in a security sense. We've made security progress, we've made political progress last year with the three free elections with a turnout greater than here in the United States.

Economically growth there is around 3 1/2 percent to 4 percent, projected to be 9 percent.

The focus this week will be on that civil society, government, political end of things that we have to have a government that is broadly supported in Iraq. Right now the focus will be on al-Jaafari and the prime minister over the next week. And I'm sure that's what the secretary is talking about today.

BLITZER: She and the British foreign secretary clearly trying to get the Iraqis, shake them up, if you will, and try to get them to form this government of national unity.

Let me read to from you the editorial in today's New York Times, one paragraph: "Iraq is becoming a country that America should be ashamed to support, let alone occupy. The nation as a whole is sliding closer to open civil war. In its capital, thugs kidnap and torture innocent civilians with impunity, then murder them for their religious beliefs. The rights of women are evaporating. The head of the government is the ally of a radical anti-American cleric who leads a powerful private militia that is behind much of the sectarian terror."

The editorial goes on to say, "Unfortunately after three years of policy blunders in Iraq, Washington may no longer have the political or military capital to prevail."

That's about as gloomy as I've read as far as an assessment of the current situation in Iraq is concerned.

FRIST: It is a gloomy and it is pessimistic, and I just disagree with it wholeheartedly.

If you look on the security front, the tremendous progress that has been made with now 100 Iraqi battalions, have stood up. The fact that we have over 225,000 security forces that weren't there, Iraqi security forces. The fact that there is economic growth and the Iraqi people, as we have all seen as we traveled around Iraq on our repeated trips, are industrious people who do want to focus on their family's lives, their small businesses and grow that economic development.

And now politically the tremendous progress that has been made in the elections I just talked about last year.

BLITZER: But these murders -- the dozens of bodies turning up, tortured. It really does not necessarily bode well, the sectarian violence that we see.

FRIST: And I'm as concerned about the sectarian violence, the regional violence that we've seen...

BLITZER: Do you see any effort on the part of the Iraqi political leadership, whether Shia, Kurd or Sunni, to rein in these militias that are running out there independent of the Iraqi international military?

FRIST: You know, Wolf, I think that's exactly why it is so important. I'm sure that's why Secretary Rice is there in part today, why our United States senators who go there and come back will reflect the importance of putting pressure on the Iraqi government today, which has been duly elected, to come together to formulate specifically behind the prime minister and with a cabinet in the next several weeks. If so, I'm confident coupled with the security and standing up the Iraqi forces and the economic growth, which will be allowed with that security, that if we can just finish this last component with a government that's representative, that is open, that is transparent, broadly representative and broadly supported, that we will see the success that we all had a goal to achieve and we can achieve.

BLITZER: It seems like a lot of American officials, from the president on down, have lost confidence in Ibrahim al-Jaafari in part because his alliance with Muqtada al Sadr, this anti-American cleric leader. Have you lost confidence in this man?

FRIST: It's up to Iraqi people. And it's one thing that we shouldn't come in and dictate. But our force, our power, our authority should be to say, you need to decide as the Iraqi people.

The government should be broadly representative, it should take into account the Kurds, the Sunnis as well as the Shiite, but it is up to you to choose the person. Let's get on with it, let's get on with it, let's give that structure, and if so we can achieve that goal of a nation under law operating under the rule of law, a good neighbor and a people that is respective of the human rights in that country.

BLITZER: We just heard your Republican colleague from Nebraska, Senator Hagel, say that unlike Iraq, where he doesn't think the U.S. really had national security interests in going in to begin with, he sees a real national security interest in dealing with Iran right now and its potential nuclear capability. There was a very disturbing story in The Washington Post today saying if the U.S. were to take military action to deal with Iran's nuclear facilities, Iran would respond with terror attacks against Americans all over the world using Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and other groups.

How concerned are you as the Senate leader on this -- as a result of this suggestion in the Washington Post?

FRIST: Yes, well, a couple things. First of all, I respectfully disagree with Chuck in that I think, whether it was Afghanistan or Iraq or now focusing our attention on Iran, it is absolutely important, critical, that wherever there is a threat to security of a region that is important to us here at home that we need to address those issues.

I do agree that Iran is a huge threat to the United States today. I think we need to address it in a diplomatic way, using political sanctions, using diplomatic sanctions, using economic sanctions if necessary and also keeping on the table the military option. And it is a threat that we need to address and I believe we are addressing.

BLITZER: Does Iran have that capability to launch such a worldwide terror assault against Americans?

FRIST: Well, it's why I go back and say the region is important. The war on terror isn't against one person, against one state but it is against an entity that can appear anywhere in the world.

And that's why, when you hear us in the United States arguing to have a strong Patriot Act here, to have a strong terrorist surveillance program here, which applies anywhere in the world so that we have those tools wherever it arises to fight and fight aggressively.

BLITZER: Let's talk about immigration reform. You've been outspoken in recent days and weeks on this issue.

Listen to what the president said this week. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: My judgment is you cannot enforce the border without having a temporary guest worker program. The two go hand in hand.

There are people doing jobs Americans will not do. Many people who have come into our country are helping our economy grow. It's just a fact of life.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The president says any immigration reform legislation must include a guest worker program. You disagree.

FRIST: No. Let me tell you right where we are, what my beliefs are. First of all, we are a rich nation of immigrants. And we know that; we need to show respect to that in terms of our culture, in terms of our economic growth.

Secondly and equally as importantly, we're a nation of laws and that law must be upheld.

I don't think we should give amnesty where the law has been broken. But the only way to address an immigration system which is flat out broken -- our entire immigration system, and we see it today -- is to have this three-legged stool addressed.

Number one, border security -- we've got to have that border tight, strongly enforced. That second leg of the stool has got to be the interior enforcement, employer enforcement.

And third has to be a guest worker program in the sense of a temporary worker program here that looks to the future, people coming here to work legally, and, secondly, addresses the real challenge out there and that's the 12 million illegal immigrants who are here today.

BLITZER: Well, should those 12 million or 11 million, 10 million, whatever that number is, should they be able to stay in the United States and apply for guest worker status, enabling them to get documents, stay as legal workers in the United States and eventually, as the Senate Judiciary Committee recommended, let them apply for citizenship?

FRIST: Wolf, that will be the fundamental question over the next six days on the floor of the Senate.

BLITZER: You support that?

FRIST: And let me tell you right where it is and I'll answer your question specifically. I am opposed to amnesty. Now, that word is thrown around here all the time.

BLITZER: Everybody says they're opposed to it. So the question is guest workers...

FRIST: Let me tell you what my definition of amnesty is. Amnesty is where you give somebody who has broken the law, entered this country illegally, a leg up in applying for citizenship in this country.

You put them ahead of three million people who are outside our borders today who legally are waiting for citizenship today. And to me that is amnesty. And I'm opposed to that.

I don't think that we should legislate a track that gives a privileged status to people who have broken the law.

BLITZER: So you disagree with Senator Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee?

FRIST: I do because that bill, the way it is written at the floor -- again we need a strong temporary worker program that addresses the twelve million people -- but that bill specifically gives a privileged path to citizenship for people who have broken the law.

BLITZER: Listen to Senator Specter. I want to play this sound bite from him. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR ARLEN SPECTER (R-PA): It is not amnesty because the undocumented aliens will have to pay a fine. They will have to pay back taxes. They will undergo a thorough background investigation. They will have to learn English. They will have to work for six years. And they will have to earn the status of staying in the country and the status of moving toward citizenship.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: What's wrong with that?

FRIST: Well, I think that list is good, but that's just common sense. It's what we expect of everybody in this town, everybody in America today.

So it still goes back to the fact that people came to this country illegally and that, if you give them a privileged path to a Green Card into citizenship that is ahead of the three million people who are waiting today outside of our borders in a legal way, that is amnesty.

Now, what I think will happen is that we'll address border security. Right now, a sovereign nation has as its first responsibility to a secure border. Everybody agrees.

We will have the interior enforcement, the work site enforcement. We need to give our employers the tools they need to enforce the laws that we put on the book.

And then thirdly, with this temporary worker, the 12 million workers who are out there -- and the debate has matured. We don't have to give them amnesty, but a period of time here.

And we're going to have to compromise and recognize that that 12 million people is not a monolithic group. It's not a uniform group. Some have been here ten years; they're assimilated to our society and they may have a road to a green card.

But some of those 12 million people here -- in fact, 40 percent -- have been here for less than five years, need to be dealt in a different fashion.

BLITZER: So you would kick them out?

FRIST: Well, I think we'll have to work with that. That will be the debate on the floor. If somebody is here and they're a felon or multiple misdemeanors or somebody who is not working, someone who has been here for a year, somebody who has intentions other than staying here, yes, I think they'd have to go back home.

Right now, if we give them -- amnesty is not the answer. Right now, to have them all go back home is literally impossible today.

So it is incumbent upon us in the Senate to compromise in a way that is fair, that is equitable, that recognizes this 12 million is not one monolithic uniform group.

BLITZER: So do you believe -- and you're the leader of the Republicans in Senate -- do you believe there will be legislation, work done in the Senate and then a compromise worked out with the House, that will allow immigration reform to go forward, a piece of legislation the president will be able to sign into law?

FRIST: Wolf, I do. And it will be comprehensive in the sense that it will address each of the components I mentioned, strong border security, interior enforcement...

How long will that take? When do you think that will happen?

Well, I believe that the United States Senate, and I laid this out in October, that we would address comprehensive reform starting with strong border security up front, that we would finish it over this two-week period.

So I hope, by Friday, that we will have a bill on the floor that is comprehensive that addresses the issues we've been talking about.

BLITZER: And then you'll try to work out in the joint House/Senate Conference Committee because the House version is dramatically different than the Senate version.

FRIST: It is. And I'm very hopeful -- and one of the reasons I've driven it as leader, this whole issue is because there are three million people every year coming across our borders illegally, three million.

We don't know who they are; we don't know what their intentions are. And it's growing. That problem is growing at a rate of 25 percent a year. So yes, it is incumbent. We absolutely must address it.

And the only way to effectively address it is looking at all three of those legs of the stool. Anything short of that is simply not going to work. We saw that in 1996.

BLITZER: Time Magazine columnist Joe Klein has a very devastating piece about you that's in the new issue -- just came out.

Let me read a paragraph from there: "Frist will leave the Senate at the end of the year and start his presidential campaign. Quote, 'He'll disappear,' said a Republican consultant. 'He's not built for heavy weather. He's just not an instinctive politician. And when you're a light candidate, every maneuver seems naked and tactical. With Frist, it's been college Republican sort of stuff.'"

Those are tough words. I don't know who this unnamed Republican consultant is -- clearly someone who doesn't like you.

(LAUGHTER)

FRIST: No, no. Listen, I think all the political pundit are going to be trying to frame everything that's done over the next eight months in 2008 -- the framework.

I came here as a citizen legislator, 20 years in the healing profession of medicine, 12 years as a United States senator.

My commitment and my focus is on governing, trying to move this country to a stronger, more prosperous, a healthier nation.

And that's where I'm going to stay focused. And that's why we take on the tough issues like immigration, a real problem out there that America cares about, that Washington in many ways says, let's don't focus on it at all; let's move on.

But that's why, as a leader, I'm bringing it to the floor to address it. It will make us safer; it will make us healthier; it will make us more secure.

BLITZER: You want to run for president?

FRIST: I don't know. I'll decide when I get back home to Nashville, to live in the home that I grew up in in 2007. My focus, 100 percent, right now, is on help leading this country and this Senate in a way that makes us more prosperous and healthier and safer.

BLITZER: What's the status of that stock investigation, your company, your family company. Where does that stand right now? Because it seems to be a shadow that's following you.

FRIST: Well, I don't know. It's an inquiry that I participated in and given all the information itself. I'm very confident of the outcome. I acted properly at every step along the way.

BLITZER: And where does it stand? Has anyone from the SEC or any federal investigators asked you to do things you don't want to do?

FRIST: No.

Not at all. And you know, all the information has been provided. I acted properly every step along the way. So I'm confident in the outcome.

That's why I think that all the focus us on the sort of issues that are important to this country, securing America's borders, making this country safer and making a healthier and a more productive country.

And that's where my focus is and that's where the focus should be.

BLITZER: Senator Frist, it was kind of you to come into our studio. Thanks for joining us on "Late Edition."

FRIST: Great to be with you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Thank you very much, the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

And coming up next:

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ALI ASGHAR SOLTANIEH, IRAN'S AMBASSADOR TO THE IAEA: The Iranian nation will be threatened and any harm will come to the Iranian nation, then we will defend it to the last moment.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Iran defiant over its nuclear program. My exclusive interview with the country's representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh. That's coming up.

And in case you missed it, our highlights of the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States. "Late Edition" continues right after this.

BLITZER: There's still time for to you weigh in on our web question of the week: Should illegal immigrants have a right to apply for U.S. citizenship? You can cast your vote, go to cnn.com/lateedition.

Straight ahead, Iran tests a new ballistic missile. Is the move threatening world security? We'll hear directly from a top Iranian nuclear official.

You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: You're looking at a live picture of this Lufthansa aircraft that has just landed at Boston's Logan Airport. Jill Carroll, the American hostage has spent three months in captivity in Iraq, is on that plane. She's going to be walking off that plane momentarily to freedom, to meet her loved ones here in the United States.

It's been a long ordeal for Jill Carroll. We'll watch this story for you to see if Jill Carroll makes any statement. But this is the Lufthansa flight from Frankfurt that has brought Jill Carroll back to the United States, home, after being held hostage for three months.

Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. Now to the tensions between the Iranian government and the Bush administration over Iran's nuclear program. So far both sides are refusing to back down.

I spoke with Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, about his government's nuclear intentions.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Mr. Ambassador, welcome to "Late Edition." Thanks very much for joining us.

Even as we speak, there are reports now that Iran has test-fired a new ballistic missile that has stealth capabilities to avoid radar and can hit multiple targets. Can you confirm those reports?

SOLTANIEH: Yes, it was confirmed by one of the military officials in Tehran.

BLITZER: How worried should the world be that you've developed this capability?

SOLTANIEH: The world should not worry because any country has its own self-defense, conventional military activities.

BLITZER: Can these new missiles carry a nuclear warhead?

SOLTANIEH: No, that is not right.

BLITZER: When you say that, that means the missiles are not theoretically capable of carrying a nuclear warhead? Is that what you're saying?

SOLTANIEH: Well, I said no, to the best of my knowledge, that is not the case. But of course I'm not in position to do it because this is not my field and responsibility.

I was assuming that we are going to talk about the latest development regarding the nuclear activities and the IAEA matters. That is what I'm responsible for.

BLITZER: Well, that's what we're about to talk about, but I wanted to ask you about that news involving this missile.

The United Nations Security Council has now issued a unanimously- approved statement urging Iran to stop enriching uranium, and saying the clock is ticking, you have 30 days to comply. Will your government comply with that Security Council request?

SOLTANIEH: Well, this is the first reaction, I can say is that we express our regret for such a hasty decision because the wisest decision was no action.

The best action of United Nations Security Council is no action, merely just to take note of the documents which have been sent to United Nations Security Council and let the IAEA to do its own job because the IAEA is the only pertinent technical international organization to do its responsibility. The more U.N. -- United Nations Security Council is engaged and involved, the situation will be further deteriorated. And we have to prevent confrontation.

BLITZER: So does that mean you won't comply with that request from the Security Council? Is that your response?

SOLTANIEH: If the request is to continue our cooperation with the IAEA, the response is affirmative.

If the question and expectation is not to withdraw from NPT, we are not going to withdraw from the NPT, and we are going to continue our obligation under the NPT safeguard. Since last resolution of the board of governors, the inspectors have continued their activities in Iran.

And for you information also, next week there will be another group visiting Iran and enrichment facilities. Therefore, that which will be in direction of our obligation under the NPT safeguard, that will be affirmative, and we will have to continue our cooperation with the IAEA, and we will do so.

But if it is beyond our legal obligation, and if your expectation, which could not be applied, and it is forcing Iran to take measures beyond its legal obligation and discriminative approach, that will not be acceptable, of course.

BLITZER: I want you to listen, Mr. Ambassador, to what the vice president of the United States, Dick Cheney, said on March 7th. Listen to this:

(BEGIN AUDIO CLIP)

DICK CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The United States is keeping all options on the table in addressing the irresponsible conduct of the regime.

(APPLAUSE)

And we join other nations in sending that regime a clear message: We will not allow Iran to have a nuclear weapon.

(END AUDIO CLIP)

BLITZER: That's a very forceful statement from the vice president, Dick Cheney. What's your response to that threat?

SOLTANIEH: The response is, first of all, Iranian great nation cannot bow to, and will not bow to, any threat or intimidation. Second point is, the notion of nuclear weapon is a wrong notion. We are in nuclear activities, we continue to be. It is more than 40 years that we are in this field and we will continue, and we will not stop our activities, in the nuclear activities.

But at the same time, I want also through you, to pass this message to the American nation that it is enough that the present administration are threatening different countries with military aggression, and thousands of American young people have been killed in Iraq and other parts of the world.

Enough is enough. Let's work for peace, rather than confrontation.

BLITZER: Here's what the president said the other day, as well. Listen to President Bush:

(BEGIN AUDIO CLIP)

BUSH: The Iranian president has stated his desire to destroy our ally, Israel. So when you start listening to what he has said, their desire to develop a nuclear weapon, then you begin to see an issue of grave national security concern.

(END AUDIO CLIP)

BLITZER: When the president of the United States says, "This is an issue of grave national security concern," the vice president makes that direct threat -- you must be worried, given the U.S. behavior, given the U.S. support for what has been described as "preemptive strikes" against potential threats.

SOLTANIEH: Well, I have to draw your kind attention to the fact that there have been a selective, usually, reflection of the statement and position of my country.

The supreme leader of the Islamic Republic of Iran has announced, more than two years, and few cases, the Western media have reflected to public of the world, that if the divine religions -- followers of the divine religions, Jews, Christians and Muslims, in that area follow a referendum, democratic referendum, and are one (ph) with homeless Palestinians, Iranian government and Iranian people would respect their decision.

Therefore, these are fabricated news that they are threatening and using this as an excuse for the military aggression or the aggressive policy.

I just want to say that, regarding the nuclear installation, this is of course a serious concern from my country, and of course we have tabled these continued threats by United States in the United Nations.

And I want to draw the kind attention of your viewers to the fact that, in the IAEA in 1990, the resolution has been passed which indicates and says it will, any military activities against nuclear installations, constitute violation of United Nations charter, the statute of the IAEA international law and will immediately call for the United Nations Security Council to act immediately afterward.

Therefore, this will be violation of all international laws, and it is better, rather than using the language of threat, to talk about the peaceful settlement of all issues, including the nuclear issue.

We have always invited our European friends and others to come to the negotiating table, rather than pushing the issue to the confrontation and battlefield.

BLITZER: Your colleague, though, at the IAEA, Javad Vaeedi, said on March 8 -- and let me read to you what he said.

He said, "The United States may have the power to cause harm and pain, but it is also susceptible to harm and pain. So if the United States wishes to choose that path, let the ball roll." That sounds like a direct threat from your government.

SOLTANIEH: Well, I have to ask you to read it again, and then you will notice that this was a matter of a policy of defense, as any nation has. It means that if Iranian nation will be threatened and any harm will come to the Iranian nation, then we will defend it to the last moment. And therefore we will not tolerate any threat or any aggression.

That happened during the eight-year war of imposed war by Saddam, which was fully supported by United States and Europeans and killing over 100,000 of Iranian innocent people with chemical weapons and shameful silence of United Nations Security Council, as well as the Western countries, that they were witnessing this disastrous situation and yet continued supporting Saddam. And they were keeping silent.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Still ahead, more of my interview with Ali Asghar Soltanieh. I'll ask the Iranian ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency about allegations that Iran is playing a direct role in the violence engulfing its next-door neighbor, Iraq.

Also coming up, we'll have a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the former hostage, Jill Carroll. She's now back in the United States.

This is a live picture you're seeing from Logan Airport in Boston. This Lufthansa airliner brought Jill Carroll, the 28-year-old American journalist, back to the United States.

Much more of our coverage right after this.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

I spoke with Iran's representative to the IAEA, Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, about his country's nuclear program and more. Here's part two about that exclusive interview.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: The president of the United States is also accusing Iran of helping the insurgents by providing sophisticated technology to improve their improvised explosive devices, which have killed so many U.S. and coalition forces, as well as Iranian troops.

Listen to what the president said:

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: Tehran has been responsible for at least some of the increasing lethality of the anti-coalition attacks, by providing Shia militia with the capabilities to build improvised explosive devices in Iraq. Coalition forces have seized IEDs and components that were clearly produced in Iran.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is that true?

SOLTANIEH: With due respect, I requested you to confine your question and this issue that we have to discuss within the IAEA matters and nuclear issue because this is my own responsibility.

But, however, I have to draw your kind attention, and your viewers, to the fact that Iran has made tremendous effort, cooperating in order to have a stability in the region, particularly in Iraq, and we have received admiration from the whole world.

It is a pity United States will not and is not listening to the whole world how much Iran has contributed for the peace in this region.

This is a regretful assessment. It happened also in the case of Afghanistan -- despite of all cooperation that Iran made for a stabilizing democratic government in Afghanistan and combating the Taliban regime, after that, Iran was called a member of "axis of evil."

This immature, unjust announcement deteriorated the situation, and I'm sure the international community will condemn this kind of aggressive statement and reiterated statement by United States administration.

They have to correct and reconsider that this kind of language and methodology is not acceptable. And being in the civilized world, I think that this is a pity that the administration is not correcting their approach.

BLITZER: I have to wrap this up, but I want to get your response to this issue of Israel because it's become such a prominent issue in this whole discussion over nuclear plans that Iran may or may not have. This is what the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said on October 26 at that World Without Zionism conference.

He said, "Israel must be wiped off the map of the world, and god willing, with the force of god behind it, we shall soon experience a world without the United States and Zionists."

You understand why people in the West, especially here in the United States, are so concerned about your program, your nuclear program, given those kinds of direct threats against Israel, which happens to be a strong ally of the United States. SOLTANIEH: I want to very briefly remind you that the policy of Islamic Republic of Iran and according to spirit and letter of our constitution is against any sort of school of thought or regime such as apartheid, Zionism, racism, and this is a matter of principle.

Therefore, what you are talking about as apartheid was disappeared and it could not be accepted by civilized world, this Zionism and aggression of racism is also condemned.

That is the message, and I'm sure that we are -- this message is shared with all the international community and peace-loving people of the whole world.

And as regarding nuclear activities, I have to say that we are determined to continue our full cooperation with IAEA for peaceful activities. We are well prepared to remove any ambiguities of our nuclear activities to prove that it will be exclusively for peaceful purposes. And we spare no effort to invite other countries, European and Western countries, Russia and China, to come to the negotiating table and to find a solution.

Therefore, I advise that United Nations Security Council will not do any action, and leave this issue to the IAEA, and let this nuclear dossier of Iran, which has been taken as a hostage by American unilateral policy, to come back to the multilateral atmosphere and environment, and to be settled on.

And I assure the whole world that Iran is for peaceful activities and will try to continue it, and we spare no effort to assure that these activities will be peaceful and will not threaten any country, and we want peace in the Middle East and the whole world.

BLITZER: Does your support for the removal of Zionism mean you want to see Israel destroyed?

SOLTANIEH: I have already explained to you and reflected to you the policy echoed by our supreme leader.

It means that if in that region, the divine religion followers of the Jews, Christians and Muslims, that all three are very respectful -- and we have Jews in Iran, which are peacefully living and they are represented in our parliament, they are fully respected -- if they come with the Palestinians, homeless Palestinians, to come and through following the democratic process will decide on a government and live in peace as they were living a thousand years of coexistence of these divine religions, Iran will support because we are looking for and we support peaceful settlement of the whole issue and peaceful coexistence of these divine religions in the Middle East. Let's hope for the peace.

BLITZER: But should there be a state of Israel?

SOLTANIEH: I think I've already answered to you. If Israel is a synonym and will give the indication of Zionism mentality, no.

But if you are going to conclude that we have said the people there have to be removed or we they have to be massacred or so, this is fabricated, unfortunate selective approach to what the mentality and policy of Islamic Republic of Iran is. I have to correct, and I did so.

BLITZER: Mr. Ambassador, thank you for spending some time with us, giving Iran's position to our viewers in the United States and around the world. Thanks very much for joining us on "Late Edition."

SOLTANIEH: I wish you all the best, and hope for the peace in the region, strategic region, of the Middle East, and in the whole world. Thank you very much.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up next, in case you missed it, "Late Edition's" Sunday morning talk show roundup.

We'll be right back.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

On CBS's "Face the Nation," the Republican chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, James Sensenbrenner, said enforcement has to be the top priority for immigration reform.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. JAMES SENSENBRENNER (R-WI), JUDICIARY COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN: The first thing we have to do to fix our broken system is to stop illegal immigration because if we don't stop illegal immigration by securing the border and cracking down on those employers that do hire a lot of illegal immigrants, there just will be more illegal immigrants coming across the border and flooding our schools and causing a collapse in our health care system.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: But on ABC's "This Week," Democratic Senator Barack Obama had a very different view.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SEN. BARACK OBAMA (D) ILLINOIS: The notion that somehow these 12 million people are going to get on a bus and go back across the border just isn't realistic. And I think that what we have to acknowledge is that these are people who came to this country for the same reason that most of our parents, grandparents, great-grandparents came to this country, in search of a better life.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On NBC's "Meet the Press," the former head of the U.S. military's Central Command, retired U.S. Marine Corps General Anthony Zinni, offered a tough assessment of the current situation in Iraq.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEN. ANTHONY ZINNI (RET.): This is classic insurgency. They need either fear, apathy or support, sympathy.

If they get a combination of those three -- and right now they have a combination -- if there's a viable government, there's an opportunity for jobs, if there's a program that shows hope for the future for their children, they're going to turn against these people. We haven't given them that in three years.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

Up next, the results of our Web question of the week, "Should illegal immigrants have the right to apply for U.S. citizenship?" We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Our "Late Edition" Web question of the week asked this, "Should illegal immigrants have the right to apply for U.S. citizenship?"

Here's how you voted. Check this out: 45 percent of you said yes; 55 percent said no. Remember, though, this is not a scientific poll.

And that's your "Late Edition" for Sunday, April 2. Please be sure to join us again next Sunday and every Sunday at 11:00 a.m. Eastern for the last word in Sunday talk.

I'm also in "The Situation Room" Monday through Friday, 4:00 to 6:00 p.m. Eastern, as well as 7:00 to 8:00 p.m. Eastern. Until tomorrow, thanks very much for watching. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. For our North American viewers, "On the Story" is next.

Burton, Faith

From: Burton, Faith
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:07 PM
To: McAtamney, James A; Metzger, C. Michael; Vargas, Omar; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Augustine, Donald P.; Talamona, Gina; Smith, Edward (USMS); Lee, Jeanarta C (JMD)
Cc: Snelson, William (USMS); Wojtowicz, John (USMS); Braynon, Keith (USMS); Allen, Michael (JMD); Allen, Michael (JMD); Bouchard, Michael R.; Bradbury, Steve; Carter, Judy (USPC); Conley, Joyce; Ferber, Alan L; Gillis, John; Gorsuch, Neil M; Hagy, David; Hart, Rosemary; Jezierski, Crystal; McIntosh, Brent; McManamon, Michael J; Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Palma, Josephine; Roderick, Art Jr. (USMS); Rubin, Jim (ENRD); Rybicki, James E; Schmitz, Fran (CTS); Schofield, Regina; Scolinos, Tasia; Snelson, William (USMS); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Trono, Robert (USMS); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Vanyur, John; Vasaio, Tony; Wulf, David M.
Subject: RE: Katrina Planning -- URGENT

I'm the POC for OLA. Faith

From: McAtamney, James A
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 1:06 PM
To: Metzger, C. Michael; Vargas, Omar; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Augustine, Donald P.; Talamona, Gina; Smith, Edward (USMS); Lee, Jeanarta C (JMD)
Cc: Snelson, William (USMS); Wojtowicz, John (USMS); Braynon, Keith (USMS); Allen, Michael (JMD); Allen, Michael (JMD); Bouchard, Michael R.; Bradbury, Steve; Burton, Faith; Carter, Judy (USPC); Conley, Joyce; Ferber, Alan L; Gillis, John; Gorsuch, Neil M; Hagy, David; Hart, Rosemary; Jezierski, Crystal; McIntosh, Brent; McManamon, Michael J; Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Palma, Josephine; Roderick, Art Jr. (USMS); Rubin, Jim (ENRD); Rybicki, James E; Schmitz, Fran (CTS); Schofield, Regina; Scolinos, Tasia; Snelson, William (USMS); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Trono, Robert (USMS); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Vanyur, John; Vasaio, Tony; Wulf, David M.
Subject: Katrina Planning -- URGENT
Importance: High

To those on the "to" list --

I'm advised by your components that you're the designated reps for implementation planning.

To most of you on the "cc" list --

I haven't received any indication who your POC is. Please assign responsibility immediately and, provide me that info. In so doing, please copy all addressees above to avoid my having to do a near-simultaneous electronic English-to-English translation.

Thanks,

Mac
James A. McAtamney
Senior Counsel for National Security Affairs
Office of the Deputy Attorney General

Department of Justice
950 Constitution Ave., NW
Washington, DC 20530
Phone: (202) 514-6907
Fax:: (202) 307-0097
Unclassified e-mail: james.a.mcatamney@usdoj.gov
Secure e-mail:
SIPRNet: james.mcatamney@usdoj.sgov.gov
JWICS: jmcatamney@doj.ic.gov

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 3, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc
Attachments: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

Lily Fu Swenson

ATR
CIV (except Commercial & Cobell)
OIP
Executive Office of US Trustees

Gordon Todd

COPS
CRS
CRT
OJP (except Statistics)
OVC
OVW
TAX

Jeff Senger

ENRD
Office of Dispute Resolution
Foreign Claims Settlement Comm'n
Cobell
Commercial Branch, CIV
Statistics Project

Senger, Jeffrey M

From: Senger, Jeffrey M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 4:39 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

The following should be added to my list: legislative/interagency clearance, weekly and quarterly reporting, tobacco-related litigation. Also, I have the Office of Consumer Litigation in the Civil Division (not the Commercial branch).

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

<< File: OASG Assignments.doc >>

Swenson, Lily F

From: Swenson, Lily F
Sent: Monday, April 3, 2006 4:54 PM
To: Senger, Jeffrey M; Gorsuch, Neil M; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

I've been handling commercial but I thought maybe Jeff wanted it. Whatever, it's all good with me.

From: Senger, Jeffrey M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 4:39 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

The following should be added to my list: legislative/interagency clearance, weekly and quarterly reporting, tobacco-related litigation. Also, I have the Office of Consumer Litigation in the Civil Division (not the Commercial branch).

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

<< File: OASG Assignments.doc >>

Todd, Gordon (SMO)

From: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 5:47 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc
Attachments: OASG Portfolios.doc

I do have BJS. Jeff just has the tort reform stats project. Here's the updated doc. I can send upwards, but it might be more appropriate going from you to Mike & Kyle or Monica.

I notice Jeff does interagency & testimony clearance. I've asked him before to bring to my attention anything significant falling under one of my components but he never has. I don't want to cause waves unnecessarily but I don't think that's an unreasonable request. In fact, I think it's essential to us doing a good job. Thoughts?

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

<< File: OASG Assignments.doc >>

Office of the Associate Attorney General
Portfolios - 4/1/2006

Lily Fu Swenson

ATR
CIV (except Consumer Lit., Cobell and Tobacco)
OIP
Executive Office of US Trustees

Gordon Todd

CRT
CRS
TAX
OJP
COPS
OVW
OVC

Jeff Senger

ENRD
Office of Dispute Resolution
Foreign Claims Settlement Commission
CIV (Consumer Lit., Cobell and Tobacco)
Legislative/Interagency Clearance
Weekly & Monthly Reports

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 7:37 PM
To: McAtamney, James A; Metzger, C. Michael; Vargas, Omar; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Augustine, Donald P.; Talamona, Gina; Smith, Edward (USMS); Lee, Jeanarta C (JMD); Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Cc: Snelson, William (USMS); Wojtowicz, John (USMS); Braynon, Keith (USMS); Allen, Michael (JMD); Allen, Michael (JMD); Bouchard, Michael R.; Bradbury, Steve; Burton, Faith; Carter, Judy (USPC); Conley, Joyce; Ferber, Alan L; Gillis, John; Hagy, David; Hart, Rosemary; Jezierski, Crystal; McIntosh, Brent; McManamon, Michael J; Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Palma, Josephine; Roderick, Art Jr. (USMS); Rubin, Jim (ENRD); Rybicki, James E; Schmitz, Fran (CTS); Schofield, Regina; Scolinos, Tasia; Snelson, William (USMS); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Trono, Robert (USMS); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Vanyur, John; Vasaio, Tony; Wulf, David M.
Subject: RE: Katrina Planning -- URGENT

Gordon Todd handles the OJP docket for this office and so is our logical candidate.

From: McAtamney, James A
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 1:06 PM
To: Metzger, C. Michael; Vargas, Omar; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Augustine, Donald P.; Talamona, Gina; Smith, Edward (USMS); Lee, Jeanarta C (JMD)
Cc: Snelson, William (USMS); Wojtowicz, John (USMS); Braynon, Keith (USMS); Allen, Michael (JMD); Allen, Michael (JMD); Bouchard, Michael R.; Bradbury, Steve; Burton, Faith; Carter, Judy (USPC); Conley, Joyce; Ferber, Alan L; Gillis, John; Gorsuch, Neil M; Hagy, David; Hart, Rosemary; Jezierski, Crystal; McIntosh, Brent; McManamon, Michael J; Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Palma, Josephine; Roderick, Art Jr. (USMS); Rubin, Jim (ENRD); Rybicki, James E; Schmitz, Fran (CTS); Schofield, Regina; Scolinos, Tasia; Snelson, William (USMS); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Trono, Robert (USMS); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Vanyur, John; Vasaio, Tony; Wulf, David M.
Subject: Katrina Planning -- URGENT
Importance: High

To those on the "to" list --

I'm advised by your components that you're the designated reps for implementation planning.

To most of you on the "cc" list --

I haven't received any indication who your POC is. Please assign responsibility immediately and, provide me that info. In so doing, please copy all addressees above to avoid my having to do a near-simultaneous electronic English-to-English translation.

Thanks,

Mac
James A. McAtamney
Senior Counsel for National Security Affairs
Office of the Deputy Attorney General

Department of Justice
950 Constitution Ave., NW
Washington, DC 20530
Phone: (202) 514-6907
Fax:: (202) 307-0097
Unclassified e-mail: james.a.mcatamney@usdoj.gov
Secure e-mail:
SIPRNet: james.mcatamney@usdoj.sgov.gov
JWICS: jmcatamney@doj.ic.gov

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, April 04, 2006 8:20 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, April 04, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060404.pdf; agnb060404.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, APRIL 4, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Jurors Find Moussaoui Eligible For Death Penalty....4
Supreme Court Declines To Hear Padilla Appeal....5
Hayat Case Seen As Example Of DOJ Overreach On Terror Allegations....6
Pakistani Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Stinger Missile Plot....6
9/11 Detainee Testifies About Alleged Use Of Dogs At New Jersey Jail....6

Patriot Act:

Patriot Act Used In Baby Formula Criminal Case....7

Homeland Response:

IG Report Says FBI-Coast Guard Dispute Impedes Maritime Terror Attack Response....7
Justice Department IG Says US Ports "Largely At Risk."....7
GAO Says NRC Weakened Security Regulations After Consulting With Industry....7
International Student Admissions Rebounding From Post-9/11 Decline....8
DHS Official's Testimony On DC Preparedness Criticized....8
FBI Interviewing Workers, Contractors At Florida Nuclear Plant....8
Minnesota Domestic Terror Plot Foiled....8
Cohen Says Hole At Ground Zero Is Bush's Legacy....9
FEMA's Post-Katrina Report Said To Highlight Old Problems....9
Race Seen As Dominant Issue In New Orleans Mayoral Primary....9

War News:

Rice, Straw Press Iraqis To Form Government....10
Wehner Says War Critics Have Offered No Alternative To Bush "Freedom Agenda."....11
Zarqawi Reportedly Replaced As Head Of Al Qaeda In Iraq....11
US Troops In Iraq Try To Bring Iraqi Forces Up To Speed....11
Iraqi Civilians Attempt To Provide Own Security....12
Thirteen US Troops Killed In Iraq Over Weekend....12
CSMonitor Editor Thanks FBI, Military For Work To Free Carroll....12
New Documents Slow Australian Oil-For-Food Probe....12
Skeptics Question Fugitive Kurdish Writer's Plight....12
Allen Advocates Boykin For Special Operations Command....13

DOJ:

Card, Gonzales, Other Top Bush Aides Spotted At DC Restaurant....13
DOJ Privacy Officer To Launch Panel....13

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Defense Begins To Present Case....13
Former Westar Executives Sentenced....14
Refco Shareholders Consolidate Suits....14
HealthSouth Pays Out Hefty Legal Fees....15

Criminal Law:

Capitol Police Seek Arrest Warrant For McKinney....15
Director Charged In Pellicano Probe....16
Jury Hears Closing Arguments In "Mafia Cops" Trial....17
California Men Plead Guilty To Operating Massive Music, Software Piracy Ring....17
Former Nevada Commissioner, Exotic Dancers Testify About Alleged Bribes....17
Judge Rejects Plea Agreement In Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Probe....18
Connecticut Mob Boss Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison....18
Mexican Police Arrest Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer....18
Virginia Executives Sentenced To Prison, Fines For Contract Fraud....18
Teenage Girl Charged In Shooting Of Baltimore Officer....19

Civil Law:

Sikorsky Sues DOD To Keep Records Sealed....19
Philip Morris Makes Payment To States As RJR Balks....19

FEC Ruling On Internet Activity Called "Classic Compromise." 20

Civil Rights:

DOJ Lawsuit Alleges Discrimination Against Mississippi White Voters 20
DOJ Reaches Settlement With Virginia Beach Over Police Entrance Exam 20
American-Statesman Urges DOJ Probe Of Austin Police Beating 20
DOJ Checks Michigan Court For ADA Compliance 21
ACLU: "Operation Meth Merchant" Targeted South Asian Store Owners In Georgia 21
Recommendations Offered To Curb Anti-Semitism On College Campuses 21
Yale Wins Anti-Political Correctness Award 22

Antitrust:

Alcatel, Lucent Seek CFIUS Support For Proposed Merger 22
GM Sells Financing Arm Stake For $7.4 Billion 22
Novartis Raises Bid For Chiron 23
Continental AG To Purchase Motorola Automotive Unit 23
Maytag Chairman To Step Down 23
Approval Of Boeing-Lockheed Rocket Deal Expected This Month 24
EU To Charge Countries Over Energy Reform Delays 24
Key Washingtonians Lobbying To Boost Patent Protections 24

Environment:

EPA Regional Offices Opposed To Emissions Rule 24
Obama Hits Bush "Stubborn Refusal" To Address Climate Change 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Air Marshals Plead Guilty To Cocaine Smuggling 25
Missouri Woman Sentenced For Meth Conspiracy 25
Illinois Man Gets 20-Year Sentence For Dealing Crack 26
Maryland, DC Seen As "Magnets" For Meth Dealers 26
Louisiana Jailer Faces Drug Distribution Charges 26
California County Supervisor Seeks To Ban Marijuana-Flavored Candy 26
Canada's Prime Minister Scraps Legislation Decriminalizing Marijuana 26
US Seeks To Shut Down California Gun Dealer 26

Immigration:

Senators Seek Compromise On Immigration Bill 27

Tax:

Bidder Protests Could Delay Tax Collection Outsourcing 30
USA Today Urges Tighter Rules On Taxpayer Privacy 30
Congressional Report Highlights Tax Preparation Firms' Frequent Mistakes 30
WSJournal Criticizes Perry's Proposed Tax On Business Receipts 31

Congress-Administration:

More White House Staff Changes Expected 31
DeLay Won't Run For Reelection, Will Resign From House Seat 31
Thirteen House Republicans Returning Rudy Contributions 32
"New, Edgier" Lott Said To Be "Merciless" When It Comes To Bush, Frist 32
House Vote On 527s Could Be Very Close 33
GOP Unity Strained Again Over Budget Plan 33
Democrats Evoke "Do Nothing Congress" Nickname 33
Bush, Senate At Impasse Over Social Security, Medicare Trustees 33
Firms Try To Save Conflict Of Interest Changes In Pension Bill 34
51 Federal Agencies Have Offered Cash Buyouts Since 2002 34
Stem Cell Research Spreads Despite Federal Funding Limits 34
Bush Throws First Pitch On Opening Day In Cincinnati 34
Book Challenges Allegation First Lady Used Drugs 35

Other News:

Manufacturing Activity Declined In March 35
Some In Hollywood Critical Of Hillary Clinton 35
Bill Clinton To Help DNC Effort To Boost State Parties 36
Frist Team Reaches Out To Washington "Chattering Class." 36
Allen's 2006 Challenger Is Friend Of McCain 36
MoveOn Criticizes NBC For Refusing To Run Its Ads 36
O'Connor To Join Board Of Rockefeller Foundation 37
Deal May Be Close For Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News 37
USAF Cargo Plane Crashes, Nobody Killed 37
Speech Patterns Seen As Key Influence In Presidential Vote 37
Blix Says Iran Years Away From Nuclear Weapon 37
Rice's Wednesday Hill Testimony On India Nuclear Deal Previewed 38
Venezuela Takes Control Of Oil Fields Operated By Foreign Companies 38
UN Human Rights Envoy Protests His Exclusion From Sudan 39
Taylor Enters Not Guilty Plea 39

DOJ_NMG_0025031

Russia Hopes To Weaken Western Influence In Former Soviet States 39
EU Resents Polish Push For Strong US Ties 39
US-China Trade To Take Center Stage 39
Berlusconi And Prodi Clash In Debate 39
Thai PM Hails Vote 39
London Mayor Demands US Ambassador Pay Traffic Congestion Charge 40
Pakistan Criticized For Seeking To Silence Women's Advocate 40
Schroder Criticized For Gazprom Deal, Gag Order 40
Treasury Department Praised For Branding Hezbollah TV Station 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 41

DOJ_NMG_0025032

TERRORISM NEWS:

Jurors Find Moussaoui Eligible For Death Penalty. Jurors yesterday found Zacaria Moussaoui eligible for the death penalty. The story received extensive coverage on network news broadcasts and cable news last night and in newspapers today. It was the lead on ABC and CBS, and was second in NBC's story lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (4/3, lead story, 3:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Those who suffered the most in the attacks, the victims and their families, will now confront Moussaoui in court, and make their case that he deserves to die." ABC (Thomas) added, "Family members of the 9/11 victims were overjoyed." In the "next phase of the trial, the prosecution will show the photographs of all the nearly 3,000 victims. 45 members of their family will testify about what that day did to their lives."

The CBS Evening News (4/3, lead story, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted Moussaoui's "court-appointed lawyers had urged him not to testify, but he insisted. He insulted the jurors, he disavowed the lawyers and he cursed America." CBS (Stewart) added, "Moussaoui apparently couldn't have cared less" about yesterday's decision. "When the jury left, he yelled, 'You'll never get my blood. God curse you all.' It was a total victory for the government." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 2, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) also reported that the decision "is a big victory…for the federal government…in a case that almost got derailed." NBC (P. Williams) added that former federal prosecutor Andrew McBride "says today's verdict makes it more likely Moussaoui will ultimately be sentenced to die."

USA Today (4/4, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) adds, "The jury's decision elated several 9/11 victims' relatives. Abraham Scott, whose wife, Janice Marie, was killed in the Pentagon when it was hit by a hijacked American Airlines jet, likened Moussaoui to a dog with rabies.' Rosemary Dillard, whose husband, Eddie, was on the jet that hit the Pentagon, pumped her fist as she left the courthouse. … 'This man has no soul; he has no conscience.'" However, The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 2, 2:30, Roberts, 7.66M) reported Al and Maureen Santora, parents of a 9/11 victim, "have been going to a courthouse in New York City to watch the Zacarias Moussaoui trial on closed circuit television." Yesterday's decision "brought no satisfying answers for the Santoras." The trial, "they say, exposed the failure of the government's intelligence network.

The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) notes that "legal specialists said the emotional nature of the coming evidence is a major advantage for the government. They said prosecutors have survived their most difficult hurdle." DOJ spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos "said prosecutors 'are pleased with the jury's ruling in this important case. Our efforts on behalf of the victims of 9/11 will continue as we pursue the next phase of this trial.'"

The New York Times (4/4, Lewis, 1.19M) reports that "the second phase of the complicated federal death penalty law is more mathematical. The jury will be asked first to consider whether the aggravating factors of his crime outweighed any mitigating factors." Although "Moussaoui's lawyers have suggested in court papers that they may introduce testimony from a psychologist showing that Mr. Moussaoui suffers mental impairment as a result of anti-Muslim bigotry he faced growing up in France," that testimony "may well be outweighed by the deaths of Sept. 11."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Serrano, 958K) recalls that during the trial, prosecutors "urged the jury to concentrate on what they said was their proof that Moussaoui's lies to FBI agents in Minnesota cost the government the chance to locate the Sept. 11 plotters and stop the hijackings." But Moussaoui lawyer Edward MacMahon "argued…that Moussaoui was never groomed for a Sept. 11 role," and that "the FBI and CIA were not cooperating with each other enough in the summer of 2001 to find the hijackers, even with Moussaoui's help."

Bloomberg (4/4, Arthur) reports, "The jury deliberated for about 17 hours over four days. In the second part of the sentencing trial, which will begin April 6, the jury will consider factors weighing for and against capital punishment to decide whether to sentence Moussaoui to death. A verdict of death must be unanimous. … 'We are pleased with the jury's ruling in this important case,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. 'Our efforts on behalf of the victims of 9/11 will continue as we pursue the next phase of this trial.'"

AFP (4/4) reports, "The US government, which saw its failure to stop the attacks exposed in a catalogue of bungles, missteps and mistakes highlighted by defense lawyers, was left to savour a legal victory in the war on terror. … The jury decision means they accepted the government's theory that Moussaoui's lies 'with lethal intent' in jail, after his arrest in August 2001, directly resulted in the deaths of at least one person on September 11. … Had he told about his knowledge of the plot, authorities would have been able to unroll a massive prevention operation, and would have stood a chance of stopping the attacks, the government claimed."

DOJ_NMG_0025033

Scripps Howard (4/4, Gordon) reports, "After the 10-minute hearing adjourned, the bearded would-be terrorist shouted 'You'll never get my blood! God curse you all!' as he left the courtroom. … Yet experts said Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts a year ago, may have sunk himself. He gave prosecutors another big helping hand in the first phase of the sentencing trial. He insisted on testifying over his lawyers' objections and then further incriminated himself by admitting that he was part of the Sept. 11 operation, that he planned to fly a fifth plane into the White House and that he lied upon his arrest so the suicide hijackings could go forward."

The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) and AP (4/4, Barakat) also report on the jury's decision.

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Padilla Appeal. Fox News' Special Report (4/3, Hume) reported, "The Supreme Court today declined to take the case of terror suspect Jose Padilla, who sued to challenge the legality of his prior detention as an enemy combatant. However, the separate case involving criminal charges involving Padilla will still go forward in Miami." USA Today (4/4, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the justices "voted 6-3 to spurn" Padilla's appeal.

The Washington Post (4/4, A6, Lane, 744K) says the "potential showdown between the Supreme Court and the Bush administration over the president's war powers was averted yesterday when the court declined to hear" the case. The court "granted the administration's request not to review the case…because the administration last November met Padilla's demand to be indicted in a civilian court and transferred from a Navy brig to a civilian jail." The decision "is a victory for the administration because it leaves intact an appeals court ruling that upheld the president's authority to detain Padilla as an 'enemy combatant.'" But "the win was possible only because the administration had already made its tactical retreat in the face of negative public reaction and uncertain prospects at the high court, legal analysts said." The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Richey, 61K) makes a similar case in a story headlined "Bush Team Wins On Power To Detain, For Now," and the Washington Times (4/4, Taylor, 90K) says the court's move was equivalent to "sidestepping" the issue. Donna R. Newman, a defense attorney for Padilla, "said the high court's rejection of the case was not a complete loss. She said the court 'put the government on a very short leash.'"

The New York Times (4/4, Greenhouse, 1.19M) notes Padilla "fell one vote short on Monday of persuading the Supreme Court to take his case. Four votes are necessary for the court to take a case, and Mr. Padilla's appeal received only three." The outcome "was not the unalloyed victory for the Bush administration that it might have appeared to be." Three justices who voted not to hear the case, Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and John Paul Stevens, along with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., "filed an unusual opinion explaining their position. They noted that Mr. Padilla, who is now out of military custody and awaiting trial in federal district court in Miami on terrorism-related charges, was entitled to a criminal defendant's full range of protections, including the right to a speedy trial." The Times adds, "Most significant, the three justices warned the administration that the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, stood ready to intervene 'were the government to seek to change the status or conditions of Padilla's custody.'"

The AP (4/3, Holland) reports, "The former Chicago gang member and convert to Islam was held in a military prison as an alleged enemy combatant for three and a half years, part of that time without access to lawyers. … His supporters wanted the Supreme Court to use his case to declare that Americans cannot be arrested on U.S. soil and held incommunicado. … Justices appeared poised to do that last fall, but with Padilla's appeal pending the government abruptly changed its strategy. Prosecutors brought criminal charges in Florida, and now Padilla has what his lawyers sought all along, traditional legal rights as part of the federal court system." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said it was pleased by the outcome of Padilla's appeal. … 'Fighting the war on terrorism requires the use of numerous tools and tactics which have been viewed as lawful by the courts, and we are pleased that Mr. Padilla's case will be pursued through the criminal justice system,' Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said."

The Legal Times (4/3, Mauro) reports, "In an unusual statement explaining the Court's denial of review, Justice Anthony Kennedy said 'strong prudential considerations' argued against the Court taking up the case. If the Court did review Padilla's case, Kennedy said, its ruling on the enemy-combatant issue would not affect his current custody status. Given that the government has detained Padilla for nearly four years, Kennedy said 'it must be acknowledged' that he has a 'continuing concern' that he could be reclassified as an enemy combatant. … If that happens, Kennedy said, Padilla could challenge the detention again in several ways, including a habeas petition to the Supreme Court. Kennedy put the government on notice that the courts would be open for further appeals if Padilla's status changes again, 'to ensure that the offices and purposes of the writ of habeas corpus are not compromised.'"

DOJ_NMG_0025034

CNN.com (4/3, Mears) reports, "In a brief dissent, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, 'Nothing the government has yet done purports to retract the assertion of executive power Padilla protests.' Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer also would have accepted the case for review."

Voice of America (4/4, Malone) reports, "The administration has said it had the power to detain Padilla since his arrest in 2002 as part of its overall legal strategy in fighting the war on terror. … 'We are dealing with a new kind of threat, a new kind of enemy and that has required new thinking and new strategies by the administration,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said."

More Commentary. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Supreme Court ducked its duty yesterday," but "fortunately…did not hand a total victory to the administration. Justice Kennedy made it clear that the case raises 'fundamental issues respecting the separation of powers,' and strongly signaled that the court would be ready to step in quickly if the government returned Mr. Padilla to military custody, or his basic rights were denied in his civilian trial. We trust Justice Kennedy and his colleagues to stay true to that pledge."

The Washington Post (4/4, A22, 744K) editorializes that the ruling "seems initially to be a victory for the Bush administration and its aggressive legal approach to the war on terrorism. Beneath the surface, however, the court's action is less an endorsement of the administration's approach than face-saving permission for the government's backing down."

Pentagon Releases Guatanamo Detainee Names. The Washington Post (4/4, A6, 744K) reports, "The Pentagon yesterday released the names and nationalities of a group of detainees at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the second batch of documents made public by the Defense Department in the past 30 days after four years of resistance." The Post adds, "The combined 7,600 pages represent the most complete list of detainee names, ages and nationalities to date. Yesterday's documents were published voluntarily, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said." The Defense Department "still holds about 490 people at Guantanamo Bay, the vast majority without charges."

Hayat Case Seen As Example Of DOJ Overreach On Terror Allegations. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/4, Maykuth, 423K) reports, "The FBI's discovery last summer of an alleged al-Qaeda cell among the Pakistani immigrants in" Lodi "sent a shiver through California's heartland." But now, "the much-ballyhooed case appears enfeebled. Some experts say it fits a pattern of the government overstating the importance of post-9/11 terrorism cases." Lodi City Councilman John Beckman said, "Our confidence in the FBI has been severely shaken. When we look at the totality of the case, a lot of folks here are wondering, Is that all the FBI has?" The Inquirer adds, "Experts say the Lodi case is not unusual. While the Justice Department alleges that 401 people have been charged in 'terrorism-related offenses' since Sept. 11, and 212 have been convicted, analysts say only a handful were proven hard-core terrorists. … But others say it is impossible to measure the deterrent effect of the government's aggressive action against suspects for what appear to be petty offenses such as immigration violations."

Pakistani Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Stinger Missile Plot. The AP (4/4) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a Pakistani man Monday to nearly five years in prison for his admitted role in a drugs-for-weapons plot to sell Stinger anti-aircraft missiles to the Taliban and al-Qaida." Muhamed Abid Afridi "pleaded guilty in March 2004 to one count of conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and one count of conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish." Afridi and codefendants Syed Mustajab Shah and Ilyas Ali – who have pleaded to the charges and still face sentencing – were arrested in 2002 "by police in Hong Kong who received a tip from the FBI. The three were secretly videotaped in meetings days earlier with undercover FBI agents at a Hong Kong hotel."

9/11 Detainee Testifies About Alleged Use Of Dogs At New Jersey Jail. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/4, Duff-Brown) reports, "A Canadian detained in the U.S. with hundreds of Arab or Muslim men after" 9/11 "testified Monday that he was jailed in New Jersey in harsh conditions and terrorized by snarling dogs before being cleared of terrorist links." Akil Sachveda "is one of seven Arab or Muslim men named in the class-action federal lawsuit…against senior U.S. officials, including FBI Director Robert Mueller and former Attorney General John Ashcroft." However, "The Passaic County Sheriff's Department, which runs the jail, said the lawsuit was unjustified and that dogs are only used to sniff out contraband or maintain security." The Canadian Press (4/4) notes Center for Constitutional Rights lawyer Shane Kadidal said, "There's similarities to the systematic abuse at Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib."

DOJ_NMG_0025035

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Used In Baby Formula Criminal Case. In a lengthy, front-page story, The Wall Street Journal (4/4, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports under the headline "How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man In Baby-Food Ring" about the use of FISA warrants in the investigation and prosecution of Arizona grocery wholesaler Samih Jammal, who was convicted of operating a baby formula theft ring. The Journal notes that Jammal, a "U.S. citizen born in Lebanon, was never charged with any offense related to terrorism. … His case sits on the fine line between the government's responsibility to go all-out to prevent terrorism and its duty to protect the constitutional rights of American citizens accused of crimes. It's a line that has blurred considerably since 9/11 and the 2001 passage of the Patriot Act." Jammal "is appealing, contending that FISA evidence used against him was illegally obtained and crippled his defense. … 'It's baby formula of mass destruction here,' he said at one pretrial hearing."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

IG Report Says FBI-Coast Guard Dispute Impedes Maritime Terror Attack Response. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/4, Sherman) reports an analysis by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine released yesterday finds that "squabbling between the Coast Guard and the FBI could lead to confused and potentially disastrous responses to terrorism incidents at sea." The AP notes, "The bickering came to a head in last year's weeklong anti-terrorism drill, TOPOFF 3," when "the FBI wanted to limit the assault to its elite Hostage Rescue Team," but "the Coast Guard ultimately changed the scenario to circumvent the FBI's role as the lead agency, Fine said. A plan released in October that was intended to address the problem does not sufficiently clarify the agencies' roles, Fine said."

The New York Times (4/4, Lipton, 1.19M) notes that the Fine report declares, "The F.B.I. and the Coast Guard both want the ability to respond to terrorist threats in the maritime area. Unless such differences over roles and authorities are resolved, the response to a maritime incident could be confused and potentially disastrous." FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said, "There is no room for failure. We will resolve this." However, an unnamed "Homeland Security official" said that "the new report might sharpen the disagreement. 'It was written to bolster the F.B.I. argument that they should remain in charge,' the official said."

The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports Fine found that "the FBI has failed to rank U.S. seaports based on the likelihood of terrorist attacks, nor does it always use that basis when assigning agents who specialize in maritime security." Fine "said one FBI field office with six significant seaports in its territory has one maritime liaison agent, while another FBI field office with no strategic ports has five maritime liaison agents. … 'In addition, we found that the FBI database used to collect information on terrorist threats and suspicious incidents at seaports cannot be easily searched to identify trends in maritime-related suspicious activities or threats,' he said. The report, however, praised the FBI's decision to name maritime liaison agents in most of the bureau's 56 field offices to coordinate seaport security with other federal agencies."

Justice Department IG Says US Ports "Largely At Risk." The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports Justice Department IG Glenn A. Fine released a report yesterday, which found that "seaports remain largely at risk" following 9/11. Fine said the FBI failed "to conduct a threat assessment" for US seaports, hampering its "ability to make informed decisions about resource allocation." He "also said the FBI and the U.S. Coast Guard have not resolved issues regarding their overlapping responsibilities, jurisdictions and capabilities to handle a maritime terrorism incident."

GAO Says NRC Weakened Security Regulations After Consulting With Industry.

DOJ_NMG_0025036

The New York Times (4/4, Wald, 1.19M) reports a GAO report to be released today says that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission "weakened security regulations it had proposed for reactors" after it consulted with the industry. The report says it "created the appearance that the changes were made based on what the industry considered reasonable and feasible to defend against rather than an assessment of the terrorist threat itself," but "stopped short of saying that the commission had made changes 'based solely on industry views.'" Rep. Christopher Shays, who requested the study, said the "findings paint a decidedly mixed picture of nuclear power security today."

In an article that also cites the GAO report, the Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Marks, 61K) reports that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants "are little safer from air attack" than they were before 9/11, according to critics. "And squabbling has set in over what the security standards should be." While some experts say "the current criteria do not require nuclear plants to be protected against a threat equal to the one posed by the 9/11 hijackers," industry "officials counter that nuclear power plants are already the nation's best-protected critical infrastructure." Meanwhile, they are "relying on the Transportation Security Administration" to protect against an aerial attack.

International Student Admissions Rebounding From Post-9/11 Decline. The Des Moines Register (4/3, Livermore, 166K) reported, "More international students are likely to apply to attend graduate school in Iowa and nationwide this year, following a two-year, post-Sept. 11 slump, according to new data from four-year universities." University of Iowa international student office director Scott King "said the shift occurred after university presidents lobbied the federal government to make it easier for foreign students to study in the United States." Iowa State University President Gregory Geoffroy "was among the 15 university presidents who joined the National Security Higher Education Advisory Board, which the FBI said was meant to 'foster cooperation and understanding' between the agency and higher education." Geoffroy said in an interview that the importance of international student admissions "was a major topic we talked about there." He added, "Any time leaders in federal government hear university presidents, particularly with the passion they talk about this issue, it probably has impact collectively when you put it together."

DHS Official's Testimony On DC Preparedness Criticized. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post's Eric M. Weiss (4/4, A21) writes that the written testimony of DHS' director for national capital region coordination, Thomas J. Lockwood, "last week stands out for its abstruseness." Prepared for "a Senate panel annoyed that there is still no comprehensive strategic plan to protect the region," Lockwood's testimony said emergency response partners "plan to invest in maturing…45 initiatives, focusing on the development of performance measures and timelines to ensure the effective implementation of these initiatives." Weiss continues, "Oh, so is that why, five years after Sept. 11, 2001, Prince George's County emergency officials still do not have radios compatible with the rest of the region? Perhaps it will take more time to mature that initiative."

FBI Interviewing Workers, Contractors At Florida Nuclear Plant. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (4/4, Gardiner, 249K) reports, "FBI agents are interviewing workers and contractors at the Turkey Point power plant this week to figure out who drilled a small hole in a pipe that's part of the cooling system of a nuclear reactor." Florida Power & Light spokeswoman Rachel Scott "said there was no reason for anyone to be working on the drilled pipe. Workers were, however, making repairs in the general area, including jobs like affixing sheet metal that would have required drilling, she said." The Sun-Sentinel adds FBI Special Agent Michael D. Leverock "said it doesn't appear that an outsider breached the power plant's security and gained access inside."

Minnesota Domestic Terror Plot Foiled. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/4, Egerstrom, Hawley) reports, "Authorities have foiled a 'domestic terrorism' plan, recovering a cache of weapons and bomb-making equipment, the Rice County Sheriff's Office said today. … Rice County public officials and buildings were the presumed targets." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The multi-unit South Central Drug Investigation Unit said Allen Weatherford, 44, was arrested Friday on charges of attempted first-degree arson, possession of explosive devices and for being a felon in possession of firearms. … His brother, Mark Weatherford, was already in jail for failing to make a court appearance." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Investigating officers reported finding more than 50 firearms, including a 50-caliber machine gun, in the brothers' rural farm home. They also found propane tanks with a mixture of fuel oil and fertilizer along with detonation devices. … The investigation began last November when authorities in Goodhue County stopped a car and discovered weapons and drugs. That led to a search warrant being issued for a rural Rice County farmstead where Allan Weatherford lived, according to Meredith Erickson, senior assistant county attorney for Rice County. … The Rice County Sheriff's Office said the investigation included the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, the FBI, ATF, Goodhue County and Dodge County sheriff's offices, and Bloomington, Faribault and Northfield police departments."

DOJ_NMG_0025037

Cohen Says Hole At Ground Zero Is Bush's Legacy. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (4/4, 744K) that President Bush's legacy "is likely to be where I was Sunday: the immense gash in Lower Manhattan known as Ground Zero. More than 4 1/2 years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the hole has yet to be filled. … The failure to capture or kill bin Laden is the failure of Bush and his Pentagon team of incompetents -- Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the former commander of the Afghan and Iraq wars, Tommy Franks. One is still in office, the other is getting rich on the lecture circuit, and neither offers much of an explanation for why the mass killer of Americans still has not been caught." Cohen says the hole in lower Manhattan is, "by dint of failure, George Bush's presidential library. His proper legacy is a void."

FEMA's Post-Katrina Report Said To Highlight Old Problems. The AP (4/4, Jordan) reports, "An internal FEMA report that calls for urgent reform after Hurricane Katrina outlines old failures the disaster response agency was warned about five months before the storm struck." The Feb. 13 report says the agency "suffered from confusing leadership roles, outdated or inadequate response plans and inexperienced or under-trained staff during Katrina. It also details problems in tracking supplies to disaster sites." FEMA acting director R. David Paulison said that "all post-Katrina reports" are "helpful in rebuilding FEMA," but "acknowledged the government is often slow to revamp itself, comparing the recommendations made after Hurricane Andrew in 1992 to Katrina more than a decade later."

Wolffe Says Brown Replacement Elusive Because Administration Has "Abolished FEMA." On MSNBC's Countdown (4/3, Olbermann), Newsweek's Richard Wolffe was asked about FEMA's inability to find a permanent replacement for former director Michael Brown. Wolffe said, "They've been trying for a long time. Essentially, and the administration won't say this, but they've abolished FEMA. They want people to go through Chertoff, and anyone who's worth their salt doesn't want do that. They want to maintain the good jobs they have in their home states and they don't want to just become middle-management in the bureaucracy." Olbemann: "Well, that Homeland-FEMA dyad worked so well last Fall."

Race Seen As Dominant Issue In New Orleans Mayoral Primary. The New York Times (4/4, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that race has taken the place of reconstruction as the "dominant motif" in New Orleans' April 22 mayoral primary. "This year, the three major candidates or their supporters have aligned themselves along racial lines, with each camp hoping it has singled out the correct, and as yet unknown, demographic." Meanwhile, "Tough discussions about whether some neighborhoods should not be rebuilt or whether the city should issue far fewer building permits have been largely absent. Even contemplating such notions publicly is considered a political kiss of death."

Red Cross To Overhaul Financial Operations After Katrina Debacle. NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The American Red Cross today said it will overhaul the way it handles future disasters after criticism from its post-Katrina performance. They will funnel money to other charities when it needs to and crack down internally on waste and abuse."

Future Of New Orleans Neighborhoods Said To Depend On "Bargain Seekers." The Washington Post (4/4, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "The future of New Orleans's flood-ravaged neighborhoods may depend" on "bargain seekers to invest and renovate." Though "some blocks" are dotted with "For Sale" and "For Sale by Owner" signs, "most houses offer no clues at all to the owners' plans for the vacant properties. Still, for those with faith in the city's future and a willingness to live in largely abandoned, low-lying neighborhoods, the areas are not without appeal. They are bargains."

Indonesian Tsunami Survivors Volunteering Along Gulf Coast. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Axtman, 61K) reports on "eight Indonesian tsunami survivors and aid workers who, having witnessed international relief firsthand, are now reciprocating with some of their own" along the Gulf Coast. They "have found common ground with those they aid." Novianus Patanduka said that seeing what happened during Katrina "really affected our hearts," but added that one "can't compare the suffering of Katrina with the suffering of the tsunami. Here, even the poorest people still have cars beside their [government- provided] trailers. When you go out into the most devastated parts of Indonesia, all the people have is their own physical strength.'"

DOJ_NMG_0025038

Undocumented Workers Said To Play Vital Role In Rebuilding New Orleans. Under the headline "Migrants Find a Gold Rush in New Orleans," the Los Angeles Times (4/4, Quinones, 958K) reports that as the floodwaters receded from New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina, "Word…spread throughout the Latino immigrant diaspora in America that the city had plenty of work, construction wages had doubled to $16 an hour and no one was asking for papers." John Logan, a Brown University demographer, says "there must be 10,000 to 20,000 immigrant workers in the region by now, and the number is going to grow." The Times adds, "As the Senate debates new immigration laws and marchers demonstrate across the country, these immigrants offer another reminder of the country's reliance on undocumented labor from Latin America."

WAR NEWS:

Rice, Straw Press Iraqis To Form Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw made an unannounced visit to Baghdad over the weekend to urge squabbling Iraqi politicians to form a government of national unity. NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 5, 2:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The message was blunt, the meetings tense. They made it clear, interim leader Ibrahim al-Jafari must be replaced by a strong prime minister to control the militias who've been killing civilians." For the "first time, Rice spent the night in Iraq, even as a mortar hit nearby. Critics say more than tough talk is needed to avoid all out civil war." Tonight, "it appears that Rice's message may have gotten through. Iraq's major Shiite party may back a stronger leader."

ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 5, :10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Baghdad, today, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw ended a surprise visit by pressing Iraqi leaders to stop bickers and agree on a new government."

The AP (4/4, Gearan) reports, "The US and Britain expect Iraq to quickly restrain militias and unify around a stable government," Secretary Rice "and her British counterpart said Monday in a visit meant to resonate both in Iraq and at home. Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions over two days of unusually hard-edged diplomacy. Rice stayed overnight to make the point that security is improving despite relentless violence that has eroded public support in the US for a war now in its fourth year." The Secretary is quoted saying, "First and foremost, the purpose of this trip is to encourage and to urge the Iraqis to do what the Iraqis must do because the Iraqi people deserve it. But yes, the American people, the British people...need to know that everything is being done to keep progress moving." Rice and Straw "repeated a strong message that the next government has to curb the power of sectarian militias, which are blamed for much of the current wave of reprisal killings among Shiites and Sunnis."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Daragahi, 958K) reports that Rice and Straw "attempted to placate the fears of the country's Shiite Muslim majority in anticipation of the likely ouster of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari. … But the soothing words came amid a concerted effort on the part of the U.S. and Britain as well as Iraq's Sunni Arabs, Kurds and a growing chorus of Jafari's erstwhile Shiite allies to convince the leader to step aside."

The Washington Times (4/4, Kralev, 90K) reports that Rice and Straw "made clear in private, as well as in public, that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari should step aside to clear the way for another Shi'ite candidate who would be more acceptable to the Sunnis and Kurds."

In Diplomatic Travels, Rice And Straw "Rub Off On Each Other." In a profile piece titled "On The Road With Condi and Jack," the Washington Post (4/4, A19, Kessler, 744K) writes, "Combining hard-nosed foreign initiatives with tourism and local politicking, the diplomatic duo has bounced across Europe and the Middle East, personifying the 'special relationship' between their countries. … They are a bit of an odd couple: an elegantly dressed African American woman who grew up in the segregated South and a plain blue-suit-and-tie Englishman who carries a red wooden box as a briefcase. … Aides say they genuinely like each other and -- unlike many high-powered figures -- don't seem to get on each other's nerves. Straw is the only foreign minister Rice will regularly pick up the phone and call, rather than having the State Department operations center arrange the conversation." The Post goes on to say that Rice believes "that time spent overseas helps build personal relationships that can pay off later in diplomacy. Although the British and the Americans are close allies on many matters, they have policy disputes" including Gitmo and global warming. The Post also reports that "by the end of trip, the two would sometimes finish each other's sentences and even had begun to rub off on each other."

DOJ_NMG_0025039

WPost Says Administration Must Keep Pushing For Political Accord In Iraq. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/4, A22, 744K) says the Bush Administration has been "curiously passive" about the "evident inability of Iraqi leaders" to forge a political accord, noting, "At last, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared in the Green Zone on Sunday, five months after her previous visit, and teamed with British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw to drive home the message that, as she put it, 'if this vacuum of power continues' violence will spiral beyond all control." The Post adds that the Bush Administration "has no choice but to keep pressing for a political accord. The question remains whether other outside influence can be brought to bear. … In other crises the United States has used 'contact groups' of interested powers to apply pressure. In Iraq's circumstances such remedies are more difficult. Still, they ought to be tried."

More Commentary. In a his column today in the Washington Post (4/4, A23, 744K), Eugene Robinson writes, "Condoleezza Rice made a surprise trip to Baghdad over the weekend to advance the Fairy Tale Doctrine, pressuring Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to stop all the maneuvering and go ahead and form a government, preferably one that doesn't make it a crime to be Sunni Muslim. You see, if only the Iraqis can put together a government, everything will be just fine. Okay, she didn't quite say that all would be sweetness and light. But by jetting to Baghdad without telling anybody in advance, taking along British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw and freezing al-Jafari with her most intimidating Ice Queen faux-smile, she clearly reinforced the administration's view that cobbling together a new government is the next magic bullet that is going to rescue the Iraq adventure from an utter debacle."

DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) that as "pressure mounts on the president to explain why U.S. forces remain in Iraq as that fractured country slips deeper into civil war, Bush increasingly offers up the need to democratize the world as his raison d'être for hanging on in Iraq. In other words, Iraq is the Khyber Pass of the president's defense of America. It's the passageway through which he wants us to believe freedom must flow to the rest of the world." Wickham adds, "Democracy is no magic potion for the bad behavior of people who have little tolerance for it. That's a very painful reality that President Bush must someday face."

Wehner Says War Critics Have Offered No Alternative To Bush "Freedom Agenda." Peter Wehner, deputy assistant to the President and director of the White House's Office of Strategic Initiatives, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M), "A small group of current and former conservatives…have become harsh critics of the Iraq war," suggesting "that it is a failure and the president's effort to promote liberty in the Middle East is dead." Critics of the Iraq war "have offered no serious strategic alternative to the president's freedom agenda, which is anchored in the belief that democracy and liberal institutions are the best antidote to the pathologies plaguing the Middle East." Wehner adds, "In Iraq, we are witnessing advancements and some heartening achievements. … The process of democratic reform has begun, and now would be precisely the wrong time to lose our nerve and turn our back on the freedom agenda. It would be a geopolitical disaster and a moral calamity -- and President Bush, like President Reagan before him, will persist in his efforts to shape a more hopeful world."

Zarqawi Reportedly Replaced As Head Of Al Qaeda In Iraq. A leading Islamist says al Qaeda militant Abu Musab Zarqawi has been replaced as head of al Qaeda in Iraq in order to put an Iraqi figure at head of the group's struggle. The Washington Times (4/4, Sands, 90K) reports, "But terrorism specialists were divided on whether the move represented a demotion for the figure most closely identified with a wave of suicide bombings and beheadings or a move by Zarqawi to focus his efforts on a larger regional war." The Times adds, "Reports that Zarqawi had been shunted aside are 'nothing we can verify,' Lt. Col. Barry Johnson told reporters in Baghdad yesterday."

US Troops In Iraq Try To Bring Iraqi Forces Up To Speed. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Levinson, 61K) reports that US military efforts to train Iraqi police and military have had "mixed" results. According to the Monitor, "the Brookings Institution reports [of] a total 241,700 Iraqi enlistees, only 54,000 of those troops are considered capable of operating independently from Coalition units. The remaining soldiers must fight alongside coalition forces." The article notes that "even the smallest US transfers of authority have had discouraging results."

DOJ_NMG_0025040

Iraqi Civilians Attempt To Provide Own Security. With Iraqis being targeted at an "unprecedented rate," USA Today (4/4, Frank, 2.31M) reports that civilians, wary of "the ability of police to and soldiers to protection," are "attempting to provide their own security, relying on neighbors and family or hiring armed guards. … Convinced that Iraqi police and soldiers can do little to protect them, residents are arming and organizing, often in elaborate ways, to provide their own safety."

Thirteen US Troops Killed In Iraq Over Weekend. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 4, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Five Marines were killed and three others went missing after their truck rolled over in a flash flood. At least eight other US service members have been killed since Saturday."

The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 4, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "April is off to a costly start for US forces in Iraq. The military reports at least 13 Americans now killed this weekend, most of them yesterday in Anbar Province, which is west of Baghdad. Three Marines and a Navy sailor were killed in combat." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 4, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported the "US death toll has been heavy over the past two days."

The New York Times (4/4, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "Three marines and one sailor were killed on Sunday in the rebel assault, the military reported, offering no further information. It was the largest number of American deaths in a single attack in more than a month. In another part of Anbar on Sunday, a flash flood toppled a seven-ton truck, killing five marines riding inside it and wounding one, the military said. Two marines and one Navy corpsman in the truck were missing, officials said."

The Washington Post (4/4, A19, Finer, Fekeiki, 744K) reports, "The deaths came two days after a month in which there were 32 U.S. military fatalities, the lowest monthly figure since early 2004. At least 13 Americans have been killed already in April."

Wounded Soldiers Feel "Sense Of Unease" Upon Return To US. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Zucchino, 958K) reports. "When the wounded come home from Iraq, nothing is as it once was. They look different, of course -- pocked with shrapnel scars and surgical incisions, sore and tentative, and carrying the memory of that moment, just before the blast or bullet, when they were still whole. … Aggressive and driven in Iraq, the wounded become dependent and distracted back home. Hometowns and living rooms feel different. Friends have moved away. Children have grown. Iraq was terrifying and dangerous, but it became fulfilling and familiar. The wounded are relieved to be back with their families. Though thankful to be alive, they're burdened by a sense of unease."

CSMonitor Editor Thanks FBI, Military For Work To Free Carroll. The New York Times (4/4, Zezima, 1.19M) reports that former hostage Jill Carroll visited the Christian Science Monitor newsroom. Monitor Editor Richard Bergenheim thanked the US embassy in Baghdad for working "with a passion" to free Carroll. The Times reports that he also "thanked the FBI…and the military." An anonymous official "said the American hostage working group in Baghdad assisted with Ms. Carroll's case." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 6, 2:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported that she has "been given a staff job at the Monitor, and according to representatives from the paper, she already has several book offers." However, the CBS Evening News (4/3, story 3, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reports that Carroll "has no immediate plans to discuss her ordeal in public."

New Documents Slow Australian Oil-For-Food Probe. The New York Times (4/4, Bonner, 1.19M) reports that Australia's wheat-exporting giant AWB supplied "over six volumes of documents" to lawyers investigating whether it "paid $200 million in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein under the United Nations oil-for-food program." Hearings are now 13 weeks old. Emerging intelligence papers show "that as far back as 1998, Australian intelligence agencies had been told that [a Jordanian company receiving payments from AWB] was a front for the Iraqi government and was being used to violate United Nations sanctions against Baghdad."

Skeptics Question Fugitive Kurdish Writer's Plight. The New York Times (4/4, Worth, 1.19M) reports that a controversial Kurdish author "says he has been receiving death threats by phone since January, when his new book on sex and Islam touched off angry street demonstrations in several Kurdish cities in Iraq." However, others accuse Mariwan Halabjayi of being a "publicity hound." The Times says that "Islamist political leaders deny that they ever threatened him and say they see him as a publicity-hungry clown, not a dangerous blasphemer. Even some secular figures say Mr. Halabjayi's book…may have been a ploy to get political asylum in Europe."

DOJ_NMG_0025041

Allen Advocates Boykin For Special Operations Command. The AP (4/4, Sidoti) reports that Sen. George Allen wants "Lt. Gen. William G. (Jerry) Boykin, currently the Pentagon's deputy undersecretary for intelligence," to replace the retiring head of the US Special Operations Command. Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, stated, "This officer would not be among those whom I would recommend for this position." Gen. Boykin aroused controversy in 2003 with "speeches at evangelical Christian churches in which he painted the war on terror as a Christian fight against Satan and suggested that Muslims worship idols."

DOJ:

Card, Gonzales, Other Top Bush Aides Spotted At DC Restaurant. The New York Daily News (4/4, Grove, 729K) reports in its "Lowdown" column, "Note to former White House Chief of Staff Andy Card: Next time you and your high-powered pals want to have a private dinner at a D.C. restaurant — as you did Saturday night with Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, FBI Director Robert Mueller and former FEMA chief Joe Albaugh and your wives at the Mexican eatery Lauriol Plaza — make sure the dark-suited Secret Service guys at the next table at least order guacamole and chips. Then again, they probably won't be there next time."

DOJ Privacy Officer To Launch Panel. Government Executive (4/4, Pulliam) reports, "The Justice Department's recently arrived chief privacy officer said in an interview Monday she plans to launch an internal privacy and civil liberties board in two weeks." GE continues, "The board will be made up of director or deputy director-level officials and will address the broad range of privacy issues that confront the department, said Jane Horvath, who assumed her job as the department's first chief privacy and civil liberties officer on Feb. 21. … Horvath told Government Executive that her 'first and primary responsibility is to ensure that the department ensures the civil liberties of the American people.' … She said she is working out her relationship with the department's Inspector General's Office to determine what types of privacy complaints she will receive, adding that she anticipates she'll handle broad, issue-related problems rather than complaints from individuals. … Horvath also plans to address Justice's use of commercial data for finding terrorists and standards for and oversight of mass data collection." GE adds, "Her official duties include reviewing and overseeing the department's privacy operations, developing Justice's privacy policies and ensuring the compliance of privacy impact assessments, known as PIAs. Horvath also serves on the department's Data Integrity Board and its document committee."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defense Begins To Present Case. The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Johnson) reports, "Lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling began presenting their defense against fraud charges Monday without the lead lawyer for Lay, who was preparing for a second round of surgery to alleviate a heart condition." The Post continues, "Kicking off the 10th week of the trial, the defense teams jointly called witnesses designed to advance their argument that no fraud took place at the Houston energy company. One of the case's most anticipated witnesses, Skilling, could begin to testify as early as Thursday, lawyers said." The Post adds, "In perhaps the most powerful testimony of the day, former executive assistant Joannie Williamson said she believed that her friend, then-investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, had pleaded guilty to spare his family and reduce his prison sentence. Under questioning by defense lawyer Chip B. Lewis, Williamson recounted that Koenig called her in August 2004, hours after his plea to aiding and abetting securities fraud. … 'He said, "I'm not guilty, but in order for this to work, everyone needs to believe that,"' Williamson testified. … Defense lawyers contend that many of the 16 former Enron employees who pleaded guilty did so under pressure from law enforcement authorities and under fear of the onerous federal sentencing guidelines." The Post notes, "On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler stressed Williamson's close and ongoing relationship with both defendants. Lay, for instance, offered to pay the witness's legal fees, and Skilling socializes with her and others once a week, the prosecutor said."

DOJ_NMG_0025042

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, McWilliams) reports, "The defense in the trial of two former top Enron Corp. executives struggled on its first day, as a defense witness backed down from earlier claims and a lead defense attorney was hospitalized for the second time in two weeks." The Journal continues, "It was a modest start to the defense's case that there was no wrongdoing at the energy company, apart from thefts by a few subordinates, and underscored the central role of testimony by the two former top executives in their defense. Former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling may testify as early as tomorrow, much earlier than had been expected." The Journal notes, "In an unexpected twist on the proceedings, Mr. Lay's 65-year-old lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, is scheduled to undergo surgery today that could remove him from the defense team. Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are to evaluate a stent that was installed slightly more than a week ago. … Despite the procedure, Mr. Ramsey returned quickly to court. Now, however, there 'appears to be some difficulty with the stent,' a spokeswoman for Mr. Lay said in a statement yesterday. … Mr. Ramsey's health situation is a setback for Mr. Lay. Mr. Ramsey has long been one of the best-known criminal defense attorneys in Texas, bringing a down-home but aggressive demeanor to the courtroom that has helped him win difficult cases -- including the acquittal of a man who had been charged with murdering and dismembering a man."

The Houston Chronicle (4/4, Flood) reports, "Williamson testified that she thinks her friend Koenig succumbed to pressure, though she acknowledged on cross-examination by prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler that Koenig never said he was pressured. … This testimony follows a main defense theme — that many witnesses who testified against Skilling and Lay were coerced by the government into pleading guilty and are just saying what prosecutors wanted to hear. … Lay and Skilling argue there was no conspiracy. They say Enron was in good shape, but the lack of confidence engendered by revelations about thieving by ex-CFO Andrew Fastow and his cohorts caused a 'run on the bank.'"

Former Westar Executives Sentenced. The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Masters) reports, "The former chief executive of Westar Energy Inc. was sentenced yesterday to 18 years in prison for his role in a corporate looting case known in some circles as 'the Enron of Kansas.'" The Post continues, "David C. Wittig, 50, and the utility's onetime top dealmaker Douglas T. Lake, 55, were convicted in September of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing internal controls at the Topeka, Kan., utility. … U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson sentenced Lake to 15 years and ordered each man to pay $5 million in fines plus restitution. The two have already been ordered to forfeit more than $53 million to Westar." The Post adds, "Wittig's sentence is one of the longest handed down in a major white-collar fraud case and reflects the government's increasingly harsh reaction to corporate malfeasance. … Former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers received 25 years for his role in that telecommunications firm's massive accounting fraud, but most other fallen corporate titans have received less. … Under the federal sentencing guidelines, each man had faced as much as life in prison, but their lawyers argued that such a punishment would be unduly harsh."

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Smith) reports, "The charges stemmed from a series of transactions initiated by Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake, 55, shortly after Mr. Wittig joined Westar in 1995. Among the specific allegations were improper use of the company's aircraft and arranging for increases to his own compensation without normal board knowledge or approval. … Mr. Wittig assumed Westar's helm in 1998 to help the Topeka, Kan., utility develop a growth strategy that would enable it to take advantage of deregulation of the electric industry. But prosecutors later said, and a federal jury agreed, that Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake instead found ways to abuse their positions of trust to pad their own wallets through schemes that circumvented the normal board approval process."

Refco Shareholders Consolidate Suits. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Mollenkamp, McDonald, McKay) reports, "A consolidated lawsuit filed by Refco Inc. shareholders and bondholders claims the commodity-brokerage firm used 10 transactions totaling more than $5 billion -- far more extensive than previously thought -- to keep hundreds of millions of dollars of losses off its books." The Journal continues, "The lawsuit, a roll-up of more than a dozen shareholder actions previously brought, was filed yesterday in federal court in New York. It alleges Refco executives were so intent on launching Refco's initial public offering of stock last August that they ignored complaints about lax executive oversight. The suit also alleges negligence on the part of the collapsed company's auditor and investment bankers." The Journal adds, "As previously reported, when Refco in October revealed former Chief Executive Phillip R. Bennett had hidden about $430 million in bad debts, customers rushed to get their money back, ultimately forcing the firm to seek bankruptcy protection. … The shareholder suit seeks class-action status. When the earlier suits were filed, U.S. District Judge Gerard E. Lynch consolidated them into one and appointed lead counsel to file one complaint."

DOJ_NMG_0025043

HealthSouth Pays Out Hefty Legal Fees. The Fulton County Daily Report (4/4, Peters) reports, "HealthSouth Corp. has helped lots of lawyers become more prosperous in recent years. … The Birmingham, Ala., company expects eventually to pay a total of about $147 million in legal fees for litigation expenses incurred since 2003, according to the company's annual report, which was filed last Wednesday." The Report continues, "In March 2003, federal prosecutors launched a fraud case against the company and its founder and former CEO, Richard M. Scrushy. Since then, HealthSouth has paid to defend itself in that criminal case, as well as civil cases filed in federal and state courts by the company's shareholders, bondholders, auditors and employees. … Some Atlanta law firms got in on the action, including Alston & Bird; Parker, Hudson, Rainer & Dobbs; and the Atlanta office of Jones Day." The Report adds, "HealthSouth's legal bills are comparable to other U.S. corporations that have found themselves in trouble with federal regulators in recent years, said Ron Peppe, a vice president at the Washington-based Association of Corporate Counsel. … HealthSouth already has paid some of the $147 million total, Peppe said. It has put the rest in reserve, with the expectation that it will eventually need to pay the full amount. The final total could end up being less, but $147 million is probably a good estimate, he said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Capitol Police Seek Arrest Warrant For McKinney. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Blitzer) reported, "CNN has confirmed from Federal law enforcement officials that Capitol Police are asking Federal prosecutors to issue an arrest warrant for Democratic Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney of Georgia. They filed a complaint stemming from an incident last week between the Georgia Democrat and a Capitol police officer as she tried to enter a House office building without a lapel pin that identifies her as a member of the United States Congress." The AP (4/4, Kellman) reports "a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kenneth L. Wainstein said he was reviewing the merits of the case. 'We are working with Capitol Hill police to fully understand and appreciate the incident,' principal assistant US Attorney Channing Phillips told The Associated Press in a telephone interview."

The Washington Post (4/4, A4, Wilber, 744K) reports McKinney "expressed regret for the incident but has not apologized. She has said she expects to be exonerated once the case is fully reviewed. At a news conference last week, she said the officer touched her inappropriately. Her lawyers said McKinney, who is black, was the victim of racial profiling." Last night McKinney appeared on CNN's The Situation Room (4/3), where she said, "The bottom line on this is that it doesn't matter if you're in the United States Capitol or the Georgia Capitol, the issue is racial profiling." Asked if the allegation that she struck a Capitol Police officer are true, McKinney said that "if you would look, you would find that even inside the Capitol Hill Police Department there are problems inside with the treatment of -- or the respect for diversity, let me say."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/4, Kemper, Reid, 430K) says "a security video shows McKinney entering the building and moving around the metal detector and X-ray machine." However, it does not show her encounter with the police officer, according to officials familiar with it." But Fox News' Special Report (4/3, Wilson) reported "Capitol Hill law enforcement officials with knowledge of the investigation say they have built, quote, a very solid case against McKinney. A highly placed source tells Fox News numerous witnesses gave sworn statements that they saw McKinney aggressively punch the officer's badge with her cell phone after the officer asked her to stop at a House office building security check point and produce identification. Officials were close to dismissing the matter after McKinney initially offered regret for the incident but reconsidered late Friday after she held a press conference with high profile activist Danny Glover and Harry Belafonte."

The Hill (4/4, Hearn) says the "bizarre scuffle" between McKinney "and an unnamed US Capitol Police officer is winning the spirited congresswoman few new friends in her caucus. In fact, some Democrats are trying to distance themselves from her." McKinney "has been aggressively publicizing the incident, calling press conferences on each of the past two business days and even attracting a mention on the front page of The New York Times, something that the dozens of House and Senate Democrats combined couldn't match when they unveiled their homeland-security plan last week." Now, "with McKinney facing a possible arrest warrant, the media frenzy is set only to escalate. … All of the attention has some Democrats concerned that McKinney is drawing the limelight away from their policy goals and Republicans' ethical missteps to focus on a momentary, disputed encounter in a Capitol Hill hallway."

DOJ_NMG_0025044

USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) and Roll Call (4/4, McArdle), among other sources, run similar accounts this morning. The New York Times (4/4, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports McKinney "has raised the issue of racial bias in the past. In her first term in Congress in 1993, she publicly complained about a confrontation with an elevator operator who she said initially assumed she could not be a member of Congress because of her appearance and race. (Ms. McKinney acknowledges that her attire is unusual, especially her gold cowboy boots and running shoes.)" In her 1996 campaign for reelection, she "called her opponents 'a rag-tag group of neo-Confederates.' She has also said she complained to President Bill Clinton of 'disparate treatment' at two White House events during his administration because of her race."

McKinney Used Taxpayer Funds To Fly Singer To Georgia. Roll Call (4/4, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) has admitted to breaking government rules by using taxpayer money to fly singer Isaac Hayes to Georgia to help dedicate a new office, according to a report Monday afternoon by Channel 2 Action News in Atlanta. McKinney's office, according to the report, says it will reimburse the Congressional fund for the cost of Hayes' flight and hotel room."

Director Charged In Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Krikorian) reports, "Top Hollywood movie director John McTiernan has been charged with lying to FBI investigators about his relationship with a private detective charged with illegal wiretapping, officials announced today." The Times continues, "McTiernan directed Arnold Schwarzenegger in the 1987 movie "Predator," which was nominated for an Academy Award for special effects. McTiernan is by far the most prominent entertainment figure to be criminally charged in the ongoing investigation into the tactics used by Anthony Pellicano, the private detective employed by many Hollywood figures before he was convicted of possessing an explosive device. He is now awaiting trial on illegal wiretapping charges. … McTiernan, 55, also directed 'Die Hard,' 'The Last Action Hero,' 'The Hunt for Red October,' and 'Rollerball.' McTiernan's alleged crime occurred on Feb. 13 during an interview with FBI agents, according to the charges filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles. … 'McTiernan claimed that he had no knowledge of any wiretapping conducted by Anthony Pellicano and had never discussed wiretapping with Anthony Pellicano, when in fact, as defendant McTiernan knew, he had hired and paid Anthony Pellicano to conduct a wiretap,' according to the charges."

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Marr) reports, "Mr. McTiernan is charged with making a false, fictitious and fraudulent material statement. The accusation of lying in an FBI interview could rattle nerves in Hollywood, where numerous lawyers and executives have been questioned by the FBI or appeared before a federal grand jury in regards to the investigation of Mr. Pellicano. … The investigation into Mr. Pellicano kicked off in 2002 when the FBI raided his Sunset Boulevard offices and found explosives and grenades, which led to a 30-month prison sentence. … The FBI also confiscated numerous computer files that provided a web of leads in their investigation into Mr. Pellicano's tactics as Hollywood's top private detective, according to court documents."

Viacom Chiefs Back Grey As Pellicano Probe Widens. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Eller, Hofmeister) reports, "Viacom Inc.'s top brass gave Brad Grey, chief executive of Paramount Motion Picture Group, a vote of confidence Monday despite the unwanted attention the studio is getting from his links to indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The times continues, "In their first interview on the subject, Viacom Chairman Sumner Redstone and CEO Tom Freston said Grey's ties to Pellicano were fully examined by the company before he joined the studio more than a year ago. They said they remained comfortable with their decision to tap the former talent manager to turn around the lagging studio. … Freston, who personally selected Grey for the job, said that before he was hired, Grey was 'totally upfront' about his involvement with Pellicano. Grey's attorney, Bertram Fields, had hired the investigator to work on two high-profile lawsuits brought against Grey by his former client Garry Shandling and 'Scary Movie' executive producer Bo Zenga.

DOJ_NMG_0025045

… Grey informed his prospective bosses that he had testified twice before the grand jury as a witness in the Pellicano matter and had been questioned by the FBI. … In addition, Freston said, Viacom did its homework, largely through conversations between Viacom General Counsel Michael Fricklas and Grey's personal attorney, Ron Olson."

Jury Hears Closing Arguments In "Mafia Cops" Trial. The AP (4/4) reports, "Two ex-police detectives betrayed their badges by becoming hired guns for the Mafia, a prosecutor said Monday during closing arguments at their federal racketeering trial." The AP continues, "Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa 'led double lives,' helping unleash a wave of violence that left eight people dead, prosecutor Daniel Wenner told the jury. … 'They gathered and sold information to the mob. They kidnapped for the mob. They murdered for the mob,' Wenner said. … The prosecutor described the case as 'the bloodiest, most violent betrayal of the badge this city has ever seen.'" The AP notes, "Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, countered by accusing the government of using the testimony of a convicted drug dealer, a gangster and an embezzler to frame an honest crime fighter. … The witnesses 'have conned people their whole lives,' he said." The AP adds, "Authorities allege Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were involved in eight slayings between 1986 and 1990 while on the payroll both of the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso."

Newsday (4/4, DeStefano) reports, "Tacitly acknowledging a five-year statute of limitations issue that could still derail the government's case, Wenner argued that the criminal conspiracy…continued almost up to the time both defendants were arrested in March 2005. Proof of that, he said, was in the fact that Eppolito and Caracappa lived across the street from each other in Las Vegas," so that "Caracappa could keep an eye on Eppolito and make sure he didn't weaken and expose their crimes, Wenner argued. He also said a drug deal they allegedly took part in during late 2004 put the case within the statute of limitations." Caracappa co-counsel Rae Koshetz "stressed the limitation period in her closing statement, saying the government tried to dress up a stale case by pulling in evidence of a small drug deal for Ecstasy that had no relationship to the conspiracy." The New York Daily News (4/4, Smith, 729K) adds that "star witness" Burton Kaplan "was billed as the man who could put the so-called Mafia Cops away for life," and Wenner said yesterday that he "lived up to his billing." The Eppolito and Caracappa lawyers "contend that Kaplan made up the whole crazy conspiracy to get out of prison before he dies of old age. But Wenner argued that Kaplan…couldn't have made up all the damning details." The New York Post (4/4, Haberman, 624K) also reports on the closing arguments under the headline "'Blood Traitors To NYPD Badge.'"

California Men Plead Guilty To Operating Massive Music, Software Piracy Ring. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/4, Estrella) reports Ye Teng Wen and Hao He of Union City, Calif., "pleaded guilty on Monday to producing 200,000 pirated copies of music and software compact discs, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. … Many of the items contained counterfeit FBI anti-piracy seals and silk-screened artwork that made them appear legitimate, according to the U.S. Attorney for Northern California." The Chronicle notes, "In October, the FBI raided 13 locations in California and Texas and seized 494,000 pirated CDs, DVDs and software in the country's largest manufacturing piracy seizure to date, according to the Recording Industry Association of America." The San Jose Mercury News (4/4, Ackerman, 268K) adds that Wen and He were arrested "as part of an undercover operation code-named 'Remaster.' … Speaking at a press conference Monday afternoon, officials said the manufacturing operation…may have produced as many as 12 million pirated CDs. They called it the largest manufacturing operation of its kind uncovered in the United States."

The AP (4/4) reports, "Wen and He admitted to mass producing nearly 200,000 pirated music and software CDs, many of which contained counterfeit anti-piracy seals from the FBI and silk screened artwork to make the merchandise appear legitimate, the U.S. Attorney said. The pirated works mainly involved Latin music artists and Symantec Corp.'s Norton anti-virus software." Bay City News Wires (4/3) also notes that "they pleaded guilty to counterfeiting the FBI's own anti-piracy seal on the counterfeit music discs."

Former Nevada Commissioner, Exotic Dancers Testify About Alleged Bribes. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/3, Allen) reports, "Seven witnesses were called to the stand Monday in the political corruption case against former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. Each told the jury the two had connections to strip club owner Mike Galardi." Former

DOJ_NMG_0025046

Commissioner Erin Kenny "told the jury Herrera was arrogant and she believed he was taking Galardi bribes. … But later, Kenny admitted while she believed both were taking bribes, she has no proof they did. Next, the prosecution called two former dancers from Galardi's strip club who testified they received money from Galardi and his associates. One received $400 to give Herrera an hour's worth of lap dances. The other received $400 to perform a sex act on Herrera."

Judge Orders Release Of FBI Surveillance Transcripts. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/3, Allen) also reports, "In response to a request from several media outlets, Judge Larry Hicks ordered transcripts of FBI wiretaps be released to the media. The actual audio recordings may not be released; federal prosecutors say developing a system to copy the wiretaps would interfere with their trial preparation."

Judge Rejects Plea Agreement In Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (4/4, Hinkelman) reports US District Judge Norma L. Shapiro "refused to accept the guilty plea yesterday of a former city hearing officer accused of fixing Philadelphia parking tickets in exchange for $200 in cash and $169 worth of concert tickets to see Prince." Molden David Faison was charged "with one count of attempted Hobbs Act extortion," but Shapiro "said she was not convinced that Faison was guilty of the charge." The person from whom Faison allegedly took the bribe "was identified in court yesterday as John Florio, who later became an FBI informant in the investigation of Faison. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Judy Smith said the FBI audio tapes 'clearly' would show that Faison believed Florio was 'acting as an agent' on behalf of the plumbing company when he gave Faison the concert tickets even though it was part of an FBI sting. But Shapiro wasn't convinced."

Mariano Surrenders City-Owned Vehicle. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/4, Schaffer, 423K) reports, "Rick Mariano won't be able to drive to prison in his city-owned car. The Philadelphia city councilman…has turned in" his official vehicle. "Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said the decision was part of the councilman's move to keep a lower profile following his fraud, bribery, and money laundering convictions." McCalla said, "This is just another step along the line which began when he relinquished his leadership positions." But he "said that line would not include Mariano's early resignation from his $102,000-per-year post."

Connecticut Mob Boss Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. The AP (4/4, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Janet Bond Arterton in New Haven, Conn., yesterday sentenced Gambino underboss Anthony Megale "to 86 months in prison. Megale admitted that from 2002 to 2004 he and others extorted $2,000 monthly payments from a Stamford strip club owner. He was caught on FBI recordings setting up the payments and predicting dire consequences if the club owner could not pay." The AP notes, "Megale was among 11 people arrested on charges stemming from an investigation in which an undercover FBI agent infiltrated the mob for three years, authorities said. Faced with a trial that would allow hours of secretly recorded FBI tapes into evidence, one defendant after another pleaded guilty."

Mexican Police Arrest Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer. The Albuquerque Tribune (4/4, Shepard) reports Mexican federal police yesterday arrested Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in New Mexico for the murders of sheriff's deputy James McGrane and Candido Ray Martinez. "More than 10 law enforcement agencies and more than 250 agents poured into the East Mountains, searching homes, woods and vehicles. … The manhunt drummed up more than 1,000 tips." On Saturday, "the reward for information leading to Astorga's capture was hiked to from $50,000 to $130,000," and he "was placed on the FBI's top 10 'Most Wanted' list." FBI Albuquerque SAC Tom McClenaghan "said his team will look into who, if anybody, deserves reward money." The AP (4/4, Mygatt) also notes Astorga "was placed on the FBI's list of Top 10 most-wanted fugitives." Bernalillo County Sheriff Darren White said, "Currently, we have a team of detectives in El Paso waiting to work with FBI agents who are also in that area to work on the extradition of Astorga." He added, "This was a true team effort."

Virginia Executives Sentenced To Prison, Fines For Contract Fraud. WVEC-TV Norfolk (3/31) reported, "Officials with two Hampton Roads companies were sentenced and fined for defrauding the government to get set-aside contracts for minority-owned companies. The presidents of ACS Environmental, Inc. of Chesapeake and Air Power Enterprises, Inc. of Portsmouth pleaded guilty last June to buying false training certificates for their employees working in the asbestos, lead abatement, and hazardous waste industries." WVEC adds, "James Schaubach, president of ACS and vice president of Air Power, was sentenced to 21 months in prison, to be followed by 3 years of supervised release and fined $1.5 million. … Nicanor Lotuaco, president of Air Power, was sentenced on Jan. 26, 2006 to five months in jail, followed by five months home detention and three years supervised release, and fined $1 million."

DOJ_NMG_0025047

Teenage Girl Charged In Shooting Of Baltimore Officer. The Baltimore Sun (4/4, Jones) reports, "A 17-year-old girl suspected of masterminding an attempted robbery-turned-shooting of a Baltimore police officer was arrested Monday and charged with helping another man set up the ambush in the Westport neighborhood, according to city prosecutors and a police source." The Sun continues, "Brittany Johnson was charged as an adult with attempted murder, armed robbery and several handgun violations, court documents say. She went before a District Court commissioner and was ordered held without bail pending a formal bail hearing that could happen Tuesday, said Margaret T. Burns, a spokeswoman for the city state's attorney's office." The Sun adds, "Johnson, of the 2400 block of Ridgely St., is accused of luring the undercover vice detective, Dante N. Hemingway, to a public housing community during his lunch break by posing as a friend of the officer, according to a high-ranking police official with knowledge of the investigation. Police are investigating a connection between the officer, Johnson and the female friend; the source said the two women share a cellular phone. … Police said they do not suspect the acquaintance was part of the attempted robbery on Thursday that ended in an afternoon shootout that left Hemingway in critical condition with bullet wounds to his neck, chest and stomach."

CIVIL LAW:

Sikorsky Sues DOD To Keep Records Sealed. Cox News Service (4/3, Carr) reports, "One of the nation's largest defense contractors is suing the Pentagon to prevent the release of Black Hawk helicopter production inspection records, saying they would reveal confidential information to its competitors. … But the Bush administration disagrees with Sikorsky Aircraft Corp., whose helicopters are heavily used by the military in Iraq, Afghanistan and missions throughout the world." Cox continues, "The administration, better known for keeping government information secret, is asking a federal judge in Washington to release the records to Alan M. Cohn, a reporter for a television station based in New Haven. … Cohn is investigating whether mechanical failures have caused Black Hawk helicopters to crash in Iraq. His quest for information began in 2003 after several Sikorsky employees told him they were worried that defective parts had caused a series of deadly crashes in Iraq that year. … Cohn believes the records would shed light on whether the Defense Department had raised concerns with Sikorsky about the quality of the helicopter's machinery." Cox notes, "The records in question — called Corrective Action Requests — are a way for the Defense Department to inform a contractor that it is not complying with the Pentagon's safety and performance standards, said Dick Finnegan, associate general counsel of the Defense Contract Management Agency. … On March 2, 2004, Cohn filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to obtain all inspection reports related to the Black Hawk dating back to 2003 and for Sikorsky's responses to the reports. The Defense Contract Management Agency denied Cohn's request two months later."

Philip Morris Makes Payment To States As RJR Balks. The AP (4/4, Stoughton) reports, "Philip Morris USA apparently has decided against playing hardball with the states over a hefty settlement payment due in April, but Reynolds American Inc.'s RJR is hanging tough." The AP continues, "On Friday, Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette maker, made its $3.4 billion payment, even though it believes that sum eventually should be reduced to reflect market losses it suffered due to its participation in the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement. … RJR, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., also made its payment Friday but decided not to pay the full amount, company spokesman David Howard said. Howard declined to provide details about the company's payment." The AP adds, "Philip Morris, RJR and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard have sought to cut $1.2 billion from the $6.5 billion due April 17. The companies say a provision in the settlement allows them to reduce payments to the 46 states if they collectively lose market share to so-called 'nonparticipating manufacturers' -- or players operating outside the pact. … But the big tobacco companies also must prove that the states did not adequately enforce statutes requiring the outsiders to place funds in escrow accounts in case of future state litigation."

DOJ_NMG_0025048

FEC Ruling On Internet Activity Called "Classic Compromise." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (4/4, A23, 744K), "Last month the Federal Election Commission issued a rule regulating political activity on the Internet. … The decision could be looked at as a classic political compromise: Campaign reformers got something they wanted (the Web would not be allowed to become the loophole that ate all campaign finance regulations), while bloggers got something they wanted (freedom to inform, opine, fulminate and enrage, i.e., to speak their minds). But the decision was better than your usual split-the-difference Washington sausage-making because it acknowledged that two serious principles are at stake and because it sought to make sure that regulations would be applied uniformly across media outlets." Dionne adds that Congress "should resist any bill that would overturn the FEC's shrewd ruling and let money slosh around freely on the Internet."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Lawsuit Alleges Discrimination Against Mississippi White Voters. USA Today (4/4, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "Lean, lanky and a fast-talking blur of perpetual motion, Noxubee County Democratic Chairman Ike Brown has roamed the political landscape of eastern Mississippi for 25 years with one clear aim: electing Democrats who are really Democrats. Brown has no time for moderate white Democrats who might get elected but who would then support Republican policies. 'To hell with 'em,' Brown says of people he calls 'Dixiecrats.'" Brown's lawyer, Wilbur Colom, "says he is simply 'a tough politician.' But the US Justice Department says Brown's take-no-prisoners brand of politics has crossed the line into discrimination against white voters and candidates." The Justice Department "has launched a landmark lawsuit against Brown -- the first time the federal government has used the 1965 Voting Rights Act to allege racial discrimination against whites. … Some legal analysts say the suit marks a striking change of focus by the Bush administration on voting rights cases, which until now have centered on discrimination against blacks and other minorities." Brown, "who the Justice Department points out served 21 months in prison in the mid-1990s on charges of income tax fraud, says his efforts to elect blacks are no different than the hardball political tactics white politicos have used in Mississippi for generations."

DOJ Reaches Settlement With Virginia Beach Over Police Entrance Exam. The AP (4/4) reports that Virginia Beach, VA, officials "have reached a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice over allegations that the math exam given to police recruits discriminates against blacks and Hispanics. … The agreement filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Norfolk said the city will change how the exam is scored." The AP continues, "The new standards require applicants to score at least 70 percent on the reading and grammar test, and score an average of at least 60 percent on all three parts of the exam, said Mark Stiles, the city's deputy attorney. … Previously, applicants had to score at least 70 percent on the math section of the National Police Officer Selection Test used to screen and select entry-level officers. Although the test is given by police departments nationally, each department can determine what it takes to pass. .. The city also will allow 124 applicants who failed the math test between 2002 and 2005 to resume participation in the hiring process. Those applicants would have passed under the new standards."

American-Statesman Urges DOJ Probe Of Austin Police Beating. The Austin American-Statesman (4/4) editorializes, "Now that a jury has weighed in, the U.S. Department of Justice should investigate whether three Austin police officers violated the civil rights of Ramon Hernandez." The A-S continues, "Last week, it took less than two hours for an all-white jury of six people to acquit officers William Bradley Heilman, 31, and Christopher Gray, 28, for beating and using their stun guns on Hernandez while he was handcuffed and facedown on the ground. Rookie officer Joel Follmer, 37, also faces criminal misdemeanor charges for official oppression in a separate case that is pending. … The jury's verdict left many people scratching their heads. Like the infamous Rodney King case, the officers had been captured on video punching, kicking and standing on Hernandez's neck. The jury sided with Heilman of Pflugerville, and Gray of Georgetown, who said their actions amounted to self-defense because they were in a life-or-death struggle with Hernandez. The officers asserted that it was necessary to use that kind of force to bring Hernandez under control. Each officer outweighed Hernandez by 70 pounds." The A-S adds, "Just as it was in the King case, it's hard to reconcile the jury's verdict in the Hernandez case with what is on the video. It's difficult to look at the video and think the officers' conduct was warranted. The six-member jury decided that the officers broke no laws. That is not the same as saying they did nothing wrong. Even so, many people — some of them officers — will interpret the verdict as meaning that the officers acted properly. That would be tragic. … The 1991 King case divided the Los Angeles community and unleashed a hostility against police that remains today. We believe that swift intervention by the Department of Justice would help avert a similar negative backlash in Austin."

DOJ_NMG_0025049

DOJ Checks Michigan Court For ADA Compliance. The Macomb (MI) Daily (4/3, Hotts) reports, "A federal prosecutor toured Eastpointe (MI)'s district court last month as part of an investigation of alleged violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, city and federal officials said." The Daily continues, "An assistant U.S. Attorney was joined by several city and court officials as she inspected the 38th District Court building on Nine Mile, west of Gratiot, on March 14. It wasn't clear whether she was compiling information for a report or merely examining the facilities. … A prosecutor with the Justice Department in Detroit confirmed the tour took place but would not comment further." The Daily adds, "City Manager Wayne O'Neal said he left the inspection feeling the prosecutor had not found any major violations. … 'The only comment she made was something to the effect that the building was constructed under the same federal guidelines that are in place today,' O'Neal said. 'I'd be surprised if we're found to be out of compliance. We know there are some minor issues that need to be addressed and we're certainly working on those.' … A complaint was filed with the Justice Department last year by Judge Norene Redmond alleging there are compliance problems with handicapped parking and ramps to a secured entrance of the court. The complaint further states there are non-compliance issues with the court's interior, including public lavatories and holding cells, which are not accessible by people using wheelchairs."

ACLU: "Operation Meth Merchant" Targeted South Asian Store Owners In Georgia. The AP (4/3, Bluestein) reports the ACLU contends in a motion to be filed this week that prosecutors and police "zeroed in on stores owned by South Asians while ignoring white-owned stores in a sweeping drug sting. The motion, which will be filed Wednesday, says authorities selectively targeted South Asians during an 18-month investigation that aimed to curb the sale of household products used to manufacture methamphetamines." The group "hopes the filing will prompt a judge to toss out the case against dozens of South Asian merchants indicted last year in Operation Meth Merchant. Beginning in early 2004, 15 undercover agents were sent to small grocery stores, tobacco shops and delis in six remote northwest Georgia counties."

Recommendations Offered To Curb Anti-Semitism On College Campuses. The US Commission on Civil Rights yesterday approved recommendations aimed at ensuring Jewish college students are protected from anti-Semitic harassment. USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) reports that the recommendations come in response to allegations that "an anti-Israel bias is rampant on college campuses." The commission "also urged university leaders to 'set a moral example by denouncing anti-Semitic and other hate speech,' and to ensure that Middle East studies departments protect the rights of all students. It recommended Monday that the Department of Education 'vigorously' enforce the federal law that bars discrimination based on 'race, color or national origin,' and that Congress clarify that 'national origin' can refer to Jewish heritage."

Professor Says Fear Of "Anti-Semitism" Label Stops All Scrutiny Of US-Israel Partnership. Mark Mazpower, a professor of history at Columbia University, writes in the Financial Times (4/4), "In their article, published last month in the London Review of Books, John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, two highly respected scholars, argued that it is the lobby's success rather than any special convergence of national interests that explains the extent of American support for Israel. What is striking is less the substance of their argument than the outraged reaction: to all intents and purposes, discussing the US-Israel special relationship still remains taboo in the US media mainstream. … If fear of being tarred as an anti-semite – and there is no more toxic charge in American politics – blocks the way, what anti-semitism actually implies in today's America is increasingly unclear." Mazpower adds, "There is no reason why the partnership between the US and Israel should not be susceptible to the same kind of cost-benefit analysis as any other area of policy. After all, no special relationship lasts forever: ask the Brits."

DOJ_NMG_0025050

Yale Wins Anti-Political Correctness Award. Yale University has been awarded the Collegiate Network's annual award to highlight the negative influence of political correctness, for enrolling a former Taliban official with a fourth grade education. The Washington Times (4/4, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports that the group said, "Yale pursued [Sayed Rahmatullah] Hashemi's admission in the name of that sacred cow, diversity, which now appears to extend not only to people of various sexes, creeds, races, ethnicities, sexual preferences and practices, but also to enemy combatants who make war upon the United States."

ANTITRUST:

Alcatel, Lucent Seek CFIUS Support For Proposed Merger. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Hitt, Silver) reports, "Alcatel SA and Lucent Technologies Inc. appear to be taking care to avoid a political backlash against their proposed merger given the heightened scrutiny of foreign investment in the U.S." The Journal continues, "The combined companies plan to create an independent U.S.-based subsidiary to handle government research projects that are of 'sensitive nature,' the firms said. Under the arrangement, all classified projects done for the U.S. government will be pulled together into a subsidiary that will be part of Lucent's Bell Labs, the company's elite research institution." The Journal adds, "The subsidiary will be overseen by a separate board made up of three U.S. citizens: former Defense Secretary William Perry; former Central Intelligence Agency Director James Woolsey; and Kenneth Minihan, past director of the National Security Agency, which is responsible for monitoring electronic communications for possible security threats. … The arrangement grew from informal consultations between the two firms and the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, a panel made up of several federal agencies that reviews possible national-security implications of foreign investments. Those conversations began well before the merger was made public, as the two firms, which hail from opposite sides of the Atlantic, worked to anticipate potential concerns, government and business officials said."

GM Sells Financing Arm Stake For $7.4 Billion. The Financial Times (4/4, MacKintosh, Beales, Simon) reports, "General Motors agreed to sell a controlling stake in its finance arm to an investment consortium led by Cerberus Capital on Monday for $7.4bn, securing the troubled carmaker a cash inflow of $14bn over the next three years." The Times continues, "GM secured the sale of 51 per cent of GM Acceptance Corp to Cerberus, Aozora, a Japanese bank owned by Cerberus, and Citigroup's private equity arm. … However, GM admitted it had sold the stake at a loss because its own financial problems meant it could not give GMAC the funding it needed to expand. The payment is equal to half the 'tangible' book value, excluding goodwill on GMAC's balance sheet. GM will take a non-cash charge of $1.1bn-$1.3bn to cover the loss. … 'We felt economically all things considered this was a better transaction for us than alternatives including keeping the business,' said Fritz Henderson, chief financial officer." The Times notes, "In addition to the $7.4bn sale price, the transaction will result in a $2.7bn payment from GMAC to the carmaker as tax assets are released. GM will retain car lease and retail loans with a net book value of $4bn, which it expects to realise over the next three years. … The surrender of GMAC control ends a fire-sale of GM's non-essential assets over the past year that includes most or all of its stakes in Fiat Auto, GMAC's commercial mortgage unit, and Japan's Fuji Heavy Industries and Suzuki. Talks are also under way about the sale of GM's 7.9 per cent stake in Isuzu, the Japanese truckmaker."

USA Today (4/4, Healey) reports, "The deal, to close in the fourth quarter, gives the money-losing automaker $7.4 billion from buyers at closing and $2.7 billion from GMAC because of a favorable change in its tax status. The rest, mainly from GMAC vehicle leases, is paid within three years. … The cash is useful if there's a strike or other cash-burning crisis. But it halves GM's share of GMAC profits at a time when GM is losing money — $10.6 billion last year."

The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Freeman) reports, "As part of the deal, the automaker said GM and GMAC will enter into a number of 10-year agreements under which GMAC will continue to support GM's automotive operations, GM said. The automaker has worked hand-in-hand with GMAC over the years when it has needed to act aggressively to discount cars and trucks to clear inventories. … Financial analysts say they don't expect the nature of that collaboration to change. GM has tried to pull back from that strategy but has had trouble making it work." The Post notes, "Last month, GM announced a sweeping buyout plan designed to clear its employment ranks of 30,000 high-wage union positions. In the past six months, GM has come up with plans to hold down ballooning costs for health care, trimmed retirement and pension benefits, and begun laying off engineers and other white-collar workers. GM also halved its stockholder dividend and cut pay for executives, including Wagoner's salary."

DOJ_NMG_0025051

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Berman, Langley) reports, "The deal carries lots of risks for the buyers, primarily the fate of GM itself. Cerberus could be pushed into a corner should the auto maker enter bankruptcy reorganization or suffer continuing market-share losses. Another risk is the residential-mortgage market, in which GMAC is a big player. It's vulnerable to a possible housing downturn. … Cerberus also could make substantial profit, thanks to the differing values of GMAC's components. The price to be paid is roughly equivalent to GMAC's tangible book value, a finance term meaning the price a thing might fetch if liquidated. But some parts, such as the residential-mortgage division, are worth perhaps 1.5 times tangible book value, according to people briefed on the deal. Should GM recover enough to buy back the auto-finance division, Cerberus would have bought the other GMAC operations for a substantial discount." The Journal notes, "Few deals better capture the dramatic changes sweeping through the financial markets than this one, putting a little-known private investment fund in partnership with an auto maker once seen as a bellwether of the entire American economy."

Novartis Raises Bid For Chiron. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Hamilton) reports, "Novartis AG boosted its cash offer for the shares of Chiron Corp. it doesn't already own, quashing a shareholder insurrection and effectively sealing its acquisition of the biotechnology pioneer." The Journal continues, "The Swiss drug giant, which owns 44% of Chiron, said it will offer shareholders $48 a share in cash, a $3 increase from a previously raised bid. That values the transaction at $5.4 billion, up from $5.1 billion. … The sweetened offer appears to have ended a shareholder revolt over the bid, which several investors considered a lowball offer for a company just recovering from problems in its vaccine business. Chiron's shares dropped precipitously in late 2004 after it pulled its influenza vaccine Fluvirin from the U.S. following alleged contamination at a production facility. Some investors and analysts argued that Chiron shares were just starting to recover when Novartis offered $40 a share for the company in September 2005. The next month, Novartis increased the bid to $45."

Continental AG To Purchase Motorola Automotive Unit. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Rauwald) reports, "German auto-parts supplier and tire maker Continental AG said it has signed an agreement to acquire the automotive-electronics business of Motorola Inc. for $1 billion, boosting its presence in the American market." The Journal continues, "Continental said the deal would be completed in the first half and is subject to approval by antitrust authorities." The Journal adds, "Car manufacturers are using increasingly advanced electronics systems. The Motorola operation, which supplies auto makers such as General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., DaimlerChrysler AG and BMW AG, focuses on the development and supply of telematics, products that enable communication from the car to external networks. For Motorola, with total sales of $36.8 billion last year, the automotive-electronics unit was a small part of its overall business. … For Continental, the deal marks part of a drive to expand through acquisitions. The German company reiterated earlier this month that it has about €4 billion, or nearly $5 billion, available for acquisitions. In the past it has signaled an interest in acquiring parts of U.S. auto-part suppliers Delphi Corp. and Dana Corp., which are operating under Chapter 11 protection."

Maytag Chairman To Step Down. Dow Jones (4/4) reports, "Ralph F. Hake, who as Maytag Corp.'s chairman and chief executive presided over the appliance maker's sale to industry leader Whirlpool Corp., announced his pending resignation Monday. … 'I will not be staying with the company - by choice - as Whirlpool already has the leadership required,' Hake said during a teleconference with Whirlpool and Maytag employees." Dow Jones continues, "Whirlpool completed its acquisition of Maytag late Friday, capping a week in which the Justice Department said it wouldn't oppose the takeover. … Hake, 56 years old as of Maytag's latest proxy statement, was recruited in 2001 by a board anxious to rejuvenate the nation's No. 3 appliance maker. … But during his tenure earnings declined, then turned into losses, eventually leading to an auction of the Newton, Iowa, company. In fiscal 2005, it reported a loss of $81.9 million on sales of $4.9 billion." Dow Jones notes, "Separately, Whirlpool said Monday its North American president, David L. Swift, would hold a news conference in Newton Tuesday. He also is expected to meet with Iowa and civic leaders about Whirlpool's intentions for Maytag's plants and employees. … A spokesman for the Benton Harbor, Mich., company, Steve Duthie, said Whirlpool plans to 'move ahead with integration (of the two companies) as quickly as possible. Within 60 days we should have a reasonable idea of the direction we're taking.' … During the Justice Department's antitrust division review of the pending acquisition, executives from the two companies were prohibited from discussing Maytag's future as part of Whirlpool, Duthie said."

DOJ_NMG_0025052

Approval Of Boeing-Lockheed Rocket Deal Expected This Month. Dow Jones (4/3) reports, "Boeing Co. and Lockheed Martin Corp. should finally win regulator approval to merge their rocket launch business this month, analysts said Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The two companies want to form the United Launch Alliance to save on back- office costs and end a messy legal battle. But the Federal Trade Commission hasn't said whether or when it will endorse the deal. Pentagon officials have been unofficially supportive. … Now the two companies are in the final stretch, said analysts who have been watching the transaction. 'They're expecting that the government will publicly disclose its approval of the transaction, with conditions, this month,' said Lexington Institute defense analyst Loren Thompson, who provides consulting services to Lockheed Martin and other contractors." Dow Jones adds, "Conditions on the deal will probably affect the joint venture's impact on the broader defense agency. Northrop Grumman Corp., which competes with Boeing and Lockheed to build government satellites, has expressed concerns about the deal, as have other companies that hope to enter the rocket launch business someday. Boeing and Lockheed Martin currently split Pentagon rocket launch contracts."

EU To Charge Countries Over Energy Reform Delays. Dow Jones (4/3) reports, "European Union regulators will Tuesday escalate efforts to cut the bloc's energy prices, charging several countries for not following energy laws agreed in 2003." Dow Jones continues, "The charges will range from failing to break up electricity and natural gas monopolies to keeping insufficient emergency oil stocks, the European Commission's energy spokesman Ferran Tarradellas said. … He declined to name the countries that will be charged, but said the regulator investigated over 100 cases where it suspected countries weren't following E.U. rules. … 'Our main problem is that it is impossible to see if our energy (regulation) is working, because many of the (laws) haven't been implemented or have not been implemented correctly,' Tarradellas said." Dow Jones adds, "Brussels regulators have been struggling to change the E.U.'s energy market, long controlled by state-owned monopolies that fix prices and force customers into long-term contracts. … Tuesday's move is unlikely to spur immediate changes, as the Commission must send countries a series of sternly worded letters before asking E.U. courts to enforce compliance. Still, the Commission has been making steady progress against recalcitrant countries. Last July, the regulator charged 11 countries for failing to include the E.U.'s 2003 policies in their national laws. At the moment, only Spain and Luxembourg still haven't complied with the Commission's demands, Tarradellas said."

Key Washingtonians Lobbying To Boost Patent Protections. In a Bulletin exclusive, US News & World Reports reports, "A 'Dream Team' of sorts has been formed to help the American Innovators Alliance, composed of Microsoft, Micron, Oracle, Apple and Intel, on key patent issues and to work on the 'eBay v. MercExchange' case before the Supreme Court. The team includes former Whitewater prosecutor Ken Starr; former Solicitor General Ted Olson; Mark Corallo, former Justice spokesman; Noam Neusner, former OMB spokesman and Bush speechwriter; and Makan Delrahim, an antitrust deputy assistant attorney general. The lobbying and communications effort they are heading is focused on pushing legislative initiatives that reform the patent system and protect high-tech innovators. Olson and Corallo have teamed before, to help the recording industry's fight against piracy."

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Regional Offices Opposed To Emissions Rule. The Washington Post (4/4, A4, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "A proposal to revise how the Environmental Protection Agency regulates airborne toxic emissions from industrial plants has sparked an outcry from the agency's regional offices, with a majority suggesting that the change would be 'detrimental to the environment.'" The proposed rule, "whose wording was disclosed yesterday by the advocacy group Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), would change the emissions standards for oil refineries, hazardous waste incinerators, chemical plants, steel mills and other plants that discharge thousands of pounds of airborne toxins such as arsenic, mercury and lead." The Post adds, "An internal EPA memo summarizing the position of eight of the agency's 10 regional offices, dated Dec. 13, contended the change could conceivably result in an increase in toxic emissions. Seven of the offices agreed that the proposal would allow polluters to 'virtually avoid regulation and greatly complicate any enforcement.'"

DOJ_NMG_0025053

The New York Times (4/4, Janofsky, 1.19M) says "officials in 9 of the agency's 10 regional offices raised their concerns in an internal memorandum to EPA officials." The memorandum, "written by Michael S. Bandrowski, chief of the air office in San Francisco, said he and his colleagues had 'varying degrees of concern' about the proposal, which he characterized as a 'drastic change in interpretation' of existing regulations under the Clean Air Act."

California Bill Would Cut Emissions Of Greenhouse Gases. The New York Times (4/4, Holusha, 1.19M) reports, "California may become the first state to impose limits on the emissions of all greenhouse gases, under legislation introduced yesterday in the State Assembly." The bill "requires that emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases linked to global warming be reduced by 145 million tons, or 25 percent less than the current forecast, by 2020. That would bring the emissions back to the 1990 level."

NYTimes Criticizes Fuel Efficiency Standards, Says They Challenge California Bill. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) editorializes on the Bush Administration's "new standards for SUV's and other light trucks," which it calls "a baby step toward President Bush's goal of reducing America's dependency on foreign oil." The Times adds, "Buried deep in the rules is one other disappointment: a reassertion of the administration's view that only the federal government has the authority to set fuel efficiency standards and that any state program that has the effect of changing these standards is illegal. This is a direct challenge to a recent California law requiring automakers to cut greenhouse gas emissions from new cars by 30 percent by 2016." The Administration "has missed another opportunity to address the twin problems of oil dependence and warming.

Obama Hits Bush "Stubborn Refusal" To Address Climate Change. At the Associated Press' annual luncheon yesterday, Sen. Barrack Obama said yesterday that Democrats should stress energy independence, education improvement and science investment in the 2008 presidential race. The AP (4/4, Espo) reports, "Obama, a first-term Democrat, also said he doubts Congress will pass immigration legislation this year, but he added that if the Senate can clear a bill, 'it lays the groundwork' for 2007." Obama also "accused President Bush of a 'stubborn refusal' to attack the causes of climate change, and said tougher fuel standards, stricter curbs on oil imports and more investment in cleaner energy are essential to avert global catastrophe."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Air Marshals Plead Guilty To Cocaine Smuggling. The AP (4/4) reports, "Two U.S. air marshals pleaded guilty Monday to accepting money to smuggle cocaine on a flight to Las Vegas and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors." The AP continues, "The marshals admitted they accepted $15,000 to use their positions as air marshals to bypass airport security and smuggle 15 pounds of cocaine." The AP adds, "Shawn Ray Nguyen's attorney, Kent Schaffer, said his client pleaded guilty because 'he felt that the best way to ... demonstrate his repentance about his conduct was to take a guilty plea as early as possible.' … George Parnham, an attorney for Burlie Sholar III, said the plea was the best alternative. 'We want to save ourselves as much of his future as we can,' he said." The AP notes, "Homeland Security spokesman David Adams said that Sholar and Nguyen remained on indefinite suspension without pay. … According to the criminal complaint, Nguyen, 32, smuggled two envelopes containing drug money and fraudulent government documents past airport security in December. … Nguyen then discussed with the informant smuggling large loads of cocaine and bringing in others to help, according to the complaint. … Authorities had said Nguyen recruited Sholar, 38, for the plan."

The Houston Chronicle (4/4) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark McIntyre "said the investigation was continuing, but cautioned against the expectation of more arrests. … The possibility of wrongdoing by other air marshals was evident in February when a third air marshal admitted during a dramatic courtroom confrontation to sharing a room with Sholar so he could bill the government for a second hotel room."

Missouri Woman Sentenced For Meth Conspiracy. The Carthage (MO) Press (4/3) reports a Carthage woman was sentenced in federal court Monday for her role in a conspiracy to "distribute between five and 15 kilograms of methamphetamine in southwest Missouri. The conviction is the result of Operation Ice Storm, a long-term investigation into the illegal distribution of large quantities of methamphetamine in southwest Missouri. Ricki J. Gomez…was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Ortrie D. Smith…to four years and nine months in federal prison without parole." The Carthage Press notes that the DEA took part in the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0025054

Illinois Man Gets 20-Year Sentence For Dealing Crack. The Southern (4/3) reports a 22-year-old Carbondale man "has been sentenced to 20 years in prison on federal charges of dealing crack cocaine and unlawful possession of a firearm. Brandon McDade previously pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute crack. … The conspiracy was investigated by the Southern Illinois Enforcement Group, Jackson and Perry County sheriffs' offices, Carbondale and Pinckneyville police departments, DEA and ATF."

Maryland, DC Seen As "Magnets" For Meth Dealers. The Washington Post (4/4, B5, Paley) reports Maryland and the District "are among the few jurisdictions in the country that have no restrictions on the sale of pseudoephedrine… making them magnets for meth dealers desperate to get the drug. At least 41 states place controls on the drug. … A federal law that takes effect Friday will make it illegal to purchase more than 3.6 grams, or about 120 pills, of the drug in one day, but law enforcement groups said they will continue to lobby for passage of state laws so local officials have their own tools to combat meth. … After Virginia required last fall that pseudoephedrine-based cold medications be placed behind the counter, drug dealers began crossing into Maryland and the District to buy the drug, according to Scott Burns."

Louisiana Jailer Faces Drug Distribution Charges. The Natchez (MS) Democrat (4/4) reports U.S. District Judge James Kirk "found probable cause Monday in Alexandria to proceed with prosecution of Concordia Parish Sheriff's Office jailer Dave Spurs. Spurs, of Ferriday, was arrested Thursday on three counts of distribution of crack cocaine. … The bust, part of an ongoing investigation between the DEA and the Louisiana State Police, netted three others."

California County Supervisor Seeks To Ban Marijuana-Flavored Candy. The Enterprise-Record (4/3) reports Alameda County Supervisor Nate Miley "wants to protect your kids from Chronic and Hydro and Sticky Icky Buds. All three are part of a line of marijuana- and hemp-flavored candy that Miley wants banned. The Board of Supervisors is set to discuss a ban on the sale of such products."

Lawyer Says Marijuana-Flavored Candy Undermines Drug Laws. In the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/4), Washington lawyer Michael C. Barnes writes, "Kudos to Georgia state senators who voted in favor of a bill to prevent the sale of marijuana-flavored candy. Members of the Agriculture and Consumer Affairs Committee realized that the availability of hemp candy on store shelves is harmful to our children and undermines Georgia's anti-drug laws."

Canada's Prime Minister Scraps Legislation Decriminalizing Marijuana. The New York Times (4/4, Krauss) reports Prime Minister Stephen Harper "announced Monday that he was scrapping draft legislation to decriminalize possession of small amounts of marijuana, a measure that had been strongly criticized by the Bush administration. … Harper announced the move during a speech to the Canadian Professional Police Association in which he pledged to toughen sentences for drug and gun crimes, tighten parole rules, strengthen controls on child pornography and expand the national databank of DNA samples for convicted criminals."

Canada's CTV (4/4) reports on its Web site that a lawyer "fears stepped-up prosecution of medical marijuana users now that the Conservative government has signaled it won't pass a Liberal law decriminalizing the possession of small quantities of pot."

US Seeks To Shut Down California Gun Dealer. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/3, Lee) reports, "The federal government wants to shut down one of Northern California's largest firearms dealers because the San Leandro business, which has a history of run-ins with firearms regulators, cannot account for nearly 2,000 guns." The Chronicle continues, "The decision by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to revoke Trader Sports' federal license to sell firearms on June 1 follows an audit that revealed owner Tony Cucchiara cannot document the weapons' whereabouts, the agency said in documents filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco. … Cucchiara blames the problem on clerical errors made by store employees who duplicated entries or transposed digits when completing required records noting the acquisition or sale of a weapon, his attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said today. … Segal said ATF inspectors 'were instructed to go in and search all the way and find these hypertechnical violations.'" The Chronicle adds, "The government doesn't buy Cucchiara's explanation, saying in court papers that his store willfully violated the law after repeatedly being told what it needed to do. … Cucchiara, who has been selling guns since 1958, plans to appeal the planned revocation at a May 25 hearing in federal court."

DOJ_NMG_0025055

IMMIGRATION:

Senators Seek Compromise On Immigration Bill. Republican senators met in Majority Leader Bill Frist's office to hammer out an acceptable compromise on the immigration bill with the hopes of finalizing a measure by Friday. However, the goal of reaching a filibuster-proof deal appeared unlikely, with vote counts showing a possible compromises receiving fewer than 60 votes in favor. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Reynolds, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Facing a self-imposed Friday deadline for reaching agreement on the thorny issue of immigration, GOP senators worked Monday toward a possible compromise that would permit some illegal immigrants to remain in the country and apply for citizenship but would deny that opportunity to others." Frist "launched what participants said would be a series of closed-door negotiations to bridge a divide between Republicans who favored providing a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and those who opposed it." Senators said "the Republican negotiations would continue today, and they expressed determination to pass a bill before the two-week Easter recess, which is scheduled to begin when the Senate adjourns Friday." A number of Republicans "who oppose options that would legalize illegal immigrants already in the country went to the White House on Monday for a meeting with Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove."

The AP (4/4, Gamboa) reports the lawmakers "considered allowing illegal immigrants who have been in the country more than five years or have other connections to the United States to remain legally and eventually seek citizenship." Sen. Arlen Specter said, "We're looking at the roots concept, and that is if they have been here more than five years. That is a reasonable line as to people who have roots who ought to be treated differently. And if they have been here less then five years, they do not have roots to the same extent and can be treated differently, and that is what we're looking at." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, A4, Rogers, 2.11M) reports Republican leaders "bluntly warned Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) that his bill will get no more than 58 votes to cut off debate. And Mr. Specter said later, 'We're going to add some more hurdles to move farther away from the concept of amnesty.'" The leadership "was promoting ideas put forward" by Sen. Chuck Hagel "that would treat those illegal immigrants -- who have entered the U.S. in the past five years -- more as guest workers, without a clear path to citizenship."

The Washington Times (4/4, Hurt, 90K) reports another proposed compromise "floating around would allow only those who have overstayed their visas to apply directly for citizenship. Anyone who had sneaked across the border would be required to return. But neither of the proposals would satisfy Senate conservatives."

CQ (4/3,Sandler) reports Frist was "racing to find middle ground before the end of the week on a complex overhaul of immigration policy that has divided his party." Frist plans to "hold a meeting of the Republican Senate caucus early Tuesday morning to share some of the proposed ideas." Frist said, "There are probably four different approaches [being discussed]. I'm going to be working with each of the groups to see what we can take to the floor." CQ adds that earlier in the day, "Frist, John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., met with Bush adviser Karl Rove at the White House. Frist then met with Cornyn and others, who favor a proposal that would require illegal immigrants to leave the country before being eligible for a temporary worker program that would not lead to citizenship."

The Washington Post (4/4, A9, Weisman, 744K) reports the talks, "led by Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), are aimed at finding a formula that would persuade a majority of Republicans to support an immigration bill now backed largely by Democrats." Majority Leader Frist "plans to push for a final vote on immigration legislation this week, but it is not clear whether any measure can muster the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster."

Frist, Cornyn, Kyle Met With Rove And Card To Discuss Strategy. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Bash) reported that the GOP Senate leadership "is trying to figure out how to make sure that the deep divisions within their party over immigration doesn't end up in total deadlock when it comes to legislation on immigration and to that end we understand that the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist went to the White House this afternoon with a couple other Republican senators. Senator John Cornyn of Texas and also Senator Jon Kyle of Arizona. … They met with Karl Rove, the President's Deputy Chief of Staff and the White House liaison to Congress Candy Wolfe. Now sources familiar with that discussion say it was essentially a strategy session. What they are trying to figure out is how to make sure the divisions especially when it comes to a so-called guest worker program don't just end everything right here in the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0025056

Senate Conservatives Seen As Likely To Buck Leadership. Roll Call (4/4, Stanton, Yachnin) reports House conservatives "are threatening to derail a budget measure that's far too expensive for their taste unless leadership cooperates on a series of reform measures, while Senate conservatives may derail efforts to pass an immigration bill this week, pushing the thorny issue further into an already tight election cycle." The "likelihood of a House revolt over the budget is unclear, but the chances for a showdown in the Senate are considered higher." Majority Leader Bill Frist "could have his hands full preventing a dispute between conservative and moderate Republicans over a guest worker proposal that could scuttle his plan of finishing the bill this week." While Frist "has said he does not support a Judiciary Committee-passed version of the proposal, he hasn't entirely thrown his lot in with conservatives, either. Instead, he is looking to find a middle ground."

14% See Illegal Immigration As Most Important Election Issue This Year. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Blitzer) reported, "In a new CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation, 14 percent say illegal immigration will be the single most important issue affecting their vote this year, 43 percent call it very important, 31 percent call it somewhat important. Just nine percent say it's not important." CNN added that 47 percent favor proposals "to build fences along the Mexican border with the United States and toughen criminal penalties for illegal immigrants and those who hire or help them." Meanwhile 24 percent "say they are very sympathetic" to illegal immigrants, 46 percent "say they are somewhat sympathetic. On the other hand 12 percent are somewhat unsympathetic, 14 percent in this new CNN poll say they are very unsympathetic."

Senators' Personal Backgrounds Play Important Role In Debate. The New York Times (4/4, Swarns, 1.19M) reports Sen. Pete Domenici recounted on the Senate floor how his mother, an illegal Italian immigrant, was detained during World War II. His "powerful account reflects a broader reality that has gone almost unnoticed as Republicans feud over whether to legalize the nation's illegal immigrants. Among the most passionate Republican voices in this debate are lawmakers with strong immigrant ties, who have woven the strands of family history into an outlook that has helped shape their legislative positions. The close connection has convinced some lawmakers of the importance of providing citizenship to illegal immigrants, while others say it should be granted more sparingly." Sen. Arlen Specter "said his parents came to the United States from Russia in the early 1900's," while Sen. Jon Kyl "said he grew up listening to the stories of his grandparents, who arrived from the Netherlands sometime before 1910." Sen. Mel Martinez "fled Cuba for Florida in 1962, when he was 15, and lived in orphanages and with foster families until he was reunited with his family four years later."

Undocumented Immigrants' Plans To Come Forward Depend On Nature Of Final Bill. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Paulson, 61K) reports though "many immigrants prefer the Senate's more open-armed bill, it can't yet answer their most urgent question: Who'd get to stay and who'd be sent home?" How senators "would resolve" complicated cases for immigrants who don't fall into neat categories "may be what determines whether most undocumented immigrants living and working in the US step forward to be counted - a major goal of the legislation - or remain in the shadows." Senators are "debating what waivers to include" for those "who have previous immigration violations."

Immigrant Rights Organizers Call For National Boycott. The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports immigration rights organizers "today will call for a nationwide boycott of work, school and shopping on May 1 to protest congressional efforts to clamp down on illegal aliens as part of pending immigration-reform legislation." The "Great American Boycott of 2006" is "only one in a series of large-scale events the protesters hope will sway lawmakers to put millions of illegal aliens on track toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship." Boycott organizers "think the Senate Judiciary Committee, under the pressure of massive protests last week, adopted a series of reforms in sharp contrast to the House-approved bill."

DOJ_NMG_0025057

Protest Organizers Encourage Followers To Not Use Latin American Flags. The Washington Times (4/4, Summers, 90K) reports the "organizers of an upcoming pro-immigration rally on Capitol Hill and in at least 10 other cities are encouraging protesters to leave their Latin American flags at home." Mexican, Salvadoran and Guatemalan "flags and slogans at pro-immigration rallies across the country have sparked controversy between Americans who say the flags represent immigrants' and illegal aliens' disdain for U.S. laws and pro-immigration advocates who say the flags represent ethnic pride."

ACLU Seeks Apology From Principal Over Pro-Latino Slogan T-Shirts. The Washington Times/AP (4/4, Sampson) reports the American Civil Liberties Union "asked a Northern Virginia elementary school principal to apologize to two students for keeping them out of class because they wore T-shirts bearing the slogans 'Latinos Forever' and '100% Latinos.'" The state ACLU "also wants the principal to clear the incident from the boys' records and to assure that the Woodbridge school won't violate students' free-speech rights by issuing a statement indicating that such clothing will be allowed henceforth."

Talk Radio Host Sees Border Security As Key Issue. In a Washington Times op-ed (4/4), talk radio host Rick Amato says, "America's borders are a mess and are urgently in need of a policy which is not only coherent, but also equips those entrusted to protect our borders with the proper tools and manpower needed to do so. While illegal immigration may be on everyone's mind now, border protection will be the hot-button issue heading into the 2006 congressional campaign." It "should come as a surprise to no one that the Mexican government cannot be relied upon to secure the problem on its side of the border."

Enhanced Border Enforcement Said To Prevent Return Migration. In a New York Times op-ed (4/4), Prof. Douglas S. Massey of Princeton says, "The rate of undocumented migration" from Mexico "adjusted for population growth, to the United States has not increased in 20 years. That is, from 1980 to 2004 the annual likelihood that a Mexican will make his first illegal trip to the United States has remained at about 1 in 100. What has changed are the locations and visibility of border crossings. And that shift, more than anything, has given the public undue fears about waves of Mexican workers trying to flood into America." In addition, the US is "now locked into a perverse cycle whereby additional border enforcement further decreases the rate of return migration, which accelerates undocumented population growth, which brings calls for harsher enforcement."

Nebraska Said To Demonstrate Immigration's "Scrambled Politics." In her Washington Post column (4/4, A23), Ruth Marcus says Nebraska "illustrates the new geographic reality of illegal immigration: They're not just in Texas (or California or Florida) anymore. In recent years the most rapid growth in the population of undocumented migrants (as well as legal immigrants) has taken place in states that previously had only a handful of foreign-born residents." Nebraska "underscores the scrambled politics of immigration: Where a politician will come down on the issue isn't necessarily predictable based on party affiliation or geography." Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel "is a leader in backing comprehensive immigration reform. The state's Democratic senator, Ben Nelson -- up for reelection this year -- has been taking an enforcement-comes-first line; he touts a 'get-tough border security bill' that features a fence extending from the Pacific to the Gulf of Mexico."

Zakaria Says European Approach To Immigration Breeds Radicalism. In his Washington Post column (4/4, A23), Newsweek International editor Fareed Zakaria says, "Many Americans have become enamored of the European approach to immigration -- perhaps without realizing it. Guest workers, penalties, sanctions and deportation are all a part of Europe's mode of dealing with immigrants. The results of this approach have been on display recently in France, where rioting migrant youths again burned cars last week. Across Europe one sees disaffected, alienated immigrants, ripe for radicalism. The immigrant communities deserve their fair share of blame for this, but there's a cycle at work. European societies exclude the immigrants, who become alienated and reject their societies." Compared with "every other country in the world, America does immigration superbly. Do we really want to junk that for the French approach?"

Dobbs' Opposition To Illegal Immigration Satirized. In his New York Times column (4/4), John Tierney satirizes CNN anchor Lou Dobb's crusade against illegal immigration with a mock newscast: "First, more bad news from Washington. Despite my personal trip to Cancún for last week's summit meeting, President Bush remains hostage to foreign interests. My soaring ratings apparently mean nothing to the White House or the Senate Republicans working on an amnesty plan for the illegal immigrants now carrying Mexican flags through our streets."

DOJ_NMG_0025058

TAX:

Bidder Protests Could Delay Tax Collection Outsourcing. Government Executive (4/4, Mandel) reports, "Protests filed by unsuccessful bidders may cause delays in an Internal Revenue Service initiative to hire private sector companies to help collect tax debt." GE continues, "Livermore, Calif.-based Diversified Collection Services and Houston, Texas-based GC Services have filed protests with the Government Accountability Office over the IRS' process for selecting three collection companies to carry out the first phase of the initiative." GE adds, "The protests were filed on March 17 and March 20, according to GAO Senior Attorney Edward Goldstein, shortly after the March 9 announcement of the contract award. IRS spokesman John Lipold said it is not yet clear whether the protests will affect the timeline for work on the contract. … The contents of the DCS protest were not public, but Maria Perrin, senior vice president of business development with the firm, said the protest was aimed at understanding the criteria used in the selection process. 'Once we get more information, it will become either "OK, we understand the procedure we went through," or "no, we don't agree," ' she said. … One of two protests filed by GC Services focused on the history of Austin, Texas-based Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson, one of the firms awarded a contract. A former partner with that firm, Juan Pena, pleaded guilty in September 2004 to federal charges of conspiracy and bank fraud in connection with a bribery case. … Pena was one of four defendants involved in paying bribes to two San Antonio city councilmen in return for a contract to collect fines and fees for the city, according to a Justice Department statement announcing Pena's plea."

USA Today Urges Tighter Rules On Taxpayer Privacy. USA Today (4/4) editorializes, "It's April 4: Do you know where your tax return is? … If you used a commercial tax preparer, your data could be at a lot of places other than the IRS — a bank, a mortgage company or some other business that wants to sell you something." USA continues, "While many taxpayers assume their returns are private, IRS rules adopted in 1974 allow the tax preparers to share information from returns with affiliates, or sell it to third parties, with the taxpayers' permission. Millions of taxpayers sign away privacy each year when their returns are prepared. … Companies can then try to sell them everything from retirement accounts to controversial loans, often at rates that would make a loan shark blush." USA adds, "Now, the IRS wants to change the rules, and at a hearing today in Washington, the agency is bound to get an earful. Consumer advocates have criticized the IRS for what they see as plans to loosen the rules. Major tax preparers have blasted the agency for adding what they regard as needless confusion. … H&R Block, the nation's largest preparer of individual tax returns, argues that disclosing information to affiliates allows it to offer 'customized products based on an integrated view' of the customer's finances. Perhaps. But if taxpayers want a product, they can go to a bank or mortgage company and share whatever tax information they wish. … At the least, taxpayers deserve explicit consent forms explaining what information they're giving up and warning of the possible dangers. Better yet, if Congress has any interest in protecting its constituents rather than its campaign contributors, it might want to require that preparers stick to doing taxes, instead of turning tax time into a bazaar for selling other financial products."

USA Today (4/4) notes that "H&R Block declined to provide an opposing view to this editorial. Jackson Hewitt Tax Service did not return calls seeking an opposing view." USA includes excerpts from written comments that H&R Block and Jackson Hewitt have filed with the IRS.

Congressional Report Highlights Tax Preparation Firms' Frequent Mistakes. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 8, 2:10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Congressional investigators will release an unnerving report. An estimated 60% of all tax returns are completed by professional preparers. But according to an investigation, you might do at least as well figuring out your own taxes." ABC (Wiener) added, "The investigators encountered a shocking lack of knowledge about very basic tax issues -- bad advice that could get taxpayers in major trouble with the IRS." Legislation "pending in Congress would require new preparers to take an entry test. Then, take brushup courses." Sen. Charles Grassley: "If it isn't done right, it's the taxpayer that's left holding the bag, to pay a penalty, a fine. And in some egregious cases, maybe even go to jail."

NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 7, 2:45, Thompson, 9.87M) reported an NBC hidden camera investigation found tax preparation firms were willing to encourage cheating on tax returns to increase refunds. NBC added, "So why would any tax preparer encourage cheating to get you that big refund?" Sen. Max Baucus, Montana: "There is a tendency for a lot of preparers to line their pockets, frankly, by charging hidden additional fees." Thompson: "A federal study to be released Tuesday by the Government Accountability Office found exactly what we did — tax preparers at major chains in one city encouraging cheating. Half the time, they did not report side income or they claimed an ineligible child."

DOJ_NMG_0025059

WSJournal Criticizes Perry's Proposed Tax On Business Receipts. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M), "The National Taxpayers Union reports that Texas is one of at least 20 states…where homeowners are rebelling against soaring assessments that in some cases are taxing people out of their homes. … Texas is the epicenter of this backlash, because property tax bills in some localities have doubled in seven years, according to the taxpayer group Americans for Prosperity." Gov. Rick Perry "embraced a tax plan that cuts the property tax by one-third in many localities and eliminates the state's hated business franchise tax, which is a disguised business income tax on capital-intensive industries." But Perry would pay for the cuts with a 1% business tax on gross receipts. Perry says his goal is to make Texas "the top performing economy in the nation." Cutting "the stampeding cost of property taxes will help accomplish that goal. But raising taxes on the very businesses that he's trying to attract surely won't."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

More White House Staff Changes Expected. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Malveaux) reported that President Bush "is looking for heavy hitters since Josh Bolten will be taking over as chief of staff." Sources say Bolten is "looking at three areas, one White House communications, legislative affairs and of course Treasury. White House communications a lot of discussions over strategy as well as the message from the podium, that of course would impact most greatly White House press secretary Scott McClellan. Whether or not he would be taking on a different role and perhaps someone in his place…. Other sources I talked to say that they feel his job is very much secure. He's very close to the president. And that this is a speculation. Of course, legislative affairs, they are looking for an elder statesman type of person to fill that role to reach out to Republicans in Congress, some of the numbers -- or the names rather on the short list including former Representative Bill Paxon (ph) of New York as well as former Senator Phil Gramm and then finally when it comes to the Treasury Secretary, of course, the White House again as recently as today expressing a great deal of confidence in Treasury Secretary John Snow at the same time sources inside and outside the administration saying that the President is looking for what they call an alternative replacement. As recently as a couple of weeks ago extending that offer to the CEO of Time Warner, Dick Parsons who sources say turned it down."

DeLay Won't Run For Reelection, Will Resign From House Seat. Rep. Tom DeLay will not run for reelection in November. Instead, the congressman is expected to resign from the House within the next few months. DeLay, who will make an official announcement today, granted an interview to Galveston County Daily News (4/4, Aulds), in which he said "his decision was best for his district and based on troubling internal polling numbers." Internal polls "showed him beating Democrat Nick Lampson in the general election but in a race that would be too close for comfort, DeLay said." DeLay's exit, says the Daily News, "robs Democrats of a handy target for national attacks on the Republican Party and may take the national spin off the race." DeLay told the paper, "I would assume, being the realist I am that Mr. Lampson is going to have a hard time keeping this a national race."

DeLay also spoke to Time, which runs the interview on its website (4/3, Allen). DeLay said, "I'm a realist. I've been around awhile. I can evaluate political situations. And it was obvious to me that the 22nd District needed an election that discussed issues. It was obvious to me that this election had become a referendum on me. … I just felt like I didn't want to risk the seat and that I can do more on the outside of the House than I can on the inside right now." DeLay also said, "I've been fighting this strategy of personal destruction for going on 10 years. I'm not whining. The Democrats even publicly announced that they were going to destroy my reputation and an effort to do that."

The story is receiving extensive coverage in major Texas and national papers. The Dallas Morning News (4/4, Gillman) calls DeLay's decision "unexpected," and says it was taken with "his power diminished and his legal troubles mounting." DeLay, adds the Morning News, "will quit Congress by mid-June." The decision "shocked Texas Republicans." The Morning News says "the final straw was apparently the plea deal entered Friday by a former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, the third confidant to turn government witness in an ongoing federal corruption inquiry centered on super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Legal experts have speculated that these former aides and allies could provide damaging evidence against the congressman, though Mr. DeLay has vigorously denied any wrongdoing." The Houston Chronicle (4/4, Mason, Hedges, 581K) also reports on "the shocking move," adding "the embattled congressman…was expected to withdraw from the race, step down from Congress and be gone by May."

DOJ_NMG_0025060

USA Today (4/4, Stone, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports DeLay "plans to change his legal residency to Virginia, where he has long had a home, to allow GOP leaders back in his Texas district to replace his name on the ballot, Forti said." His decision "concludes a dramatic fall from the heights of power."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Simon, Hook, Curtius, 958K) says "DeLay's decision stunned Capitol Hill." Stuart Roy, a former DeLay aide, "said he thought his former boss was deterred by the prospect of a tough fight and -- even if he were reelected -- life in Congress without a major leadership position. 'As much as he is ideologically driven and cause-oriented, he's also very much a pragmatist when it comes to the art of the possible,' Roy said." The Times also says DeLay's "efforts to consolidate Republican power and build a lasting political majority were the root of his downfall." Meanwhile, the New York Times (4/4, Hulse, 1.19M) says "one Congressional official with knowledge of Mr. DeLay's plans" who "did not want to be identified" told the Post, "He just decided that the numbers and the whole political climate were against him and that it was time to step aside." The Washington Times (4/4, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (4/4, Mullins, 2.11M) run similar reports.

The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Weisman, Cillizza, 744K) reports DeLay "said he informed President Bush of his decision yesterday afternoon." The Washington Post (4/4, A7, Smith, 744K) runs a second story titled "Federal Probe Has Edged Closer to Texan," reporting that the resignation "comes amid a federal criminal investigation that already has reached into his inner circle of longtime advisers."

The AP (4/4, Sidoti) notes House Majority Leader John Boehner "called his predecessor 'one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known.' 'He has served our nation with integrity and honor, and I'm honored to call him my colleague and friend,' Boehner said."

Thirteen House Republicans Returning Rudy Contributions. The Hill (4/4, Schor) reports, "Thirteen House Republicans already have returned or plan to return contributions they took from lobbyist Tony Rudy, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy last week and joins former cohort Jack Abramoff as a possible witness in the government's expanding corruption probe of lawmakers and their aides." Of the "34 House Republicans whose campaigns or PACs received money from Rudy since 2001, the offices of six members told The Hill they do not plan to return the contributions or donate them to charity." Rudy "pleaded guilty Friday to one count of conspiracy, agreeing to cooperate with the Justice Department's investigation into a widespread bribery and fraud scheme spearheaded by disgraced GOP lobbyist Abramoff." Rudy "spread his contributions among a wide swath of the GOP conference, giving $48,500 since 2001 to four members of leadership, two committee chairmen and then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Rudy's boss from 1995 to 2000."

WSJournal Says Republicans Have "Sense Of Entitlement." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) says, "Clearly a sense of entitlement set in among some Republicans, who forgot why they were elected and began to believe that power was its own reward. … The Abramoff story still has a long way to run this election year, and one way or another the Members themselves will not emerge unscathed. If Republicans lose their House majority because GOP voters stay home in disgust, Team DeLay will be one of the reasons."

Abramoff Sought Contract With Sudan. Two eyewitnesses say Jack Abramoff sought to sell his services to Sudan to help the embattled nation improve is reputation in the US. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Hamburger, Silverstein, 958K) reports, "Khidir Haroun Ahmed, Sudan's ambassador to the United States, said in an interview that Abramoff proposed a multimillion-dollar lobbying contract in late 2001 but that the proposal was 'never seriously considered' by the Sudanese. He declined to elaborate. … A spokesman for Abramoff, Andrew Blum, confirmed that a conversation took place between Abramoff and the ambassador but said Abramoff never sought a contract and rejected working for the Sudanese because of that country's human rights record."

"New, Edgier" Lott Said To Be "Merciless" When It Comes To Bush, Frist. USA Today (4/4, Lawrence, 2.31M) this morning runs a very positive profile of

DOJ_NMG_0025061

GOP Sen. Trent Lott, who "lost his job as Senate majority leader and then he lost his Gulf Coast house to Hurricane Katrina. The one-two punch didn't knock him out. Instead, it has unleashed his tongue. Long known for his passion for order…the Mississippi senator has traded iron discipline and party loyalty for a more freewheeling take on life and fellow Republicans." Lott "says in an interview that he's always been inclined to say what he thinks -- but he also allows, 'I do have a certain amount of independence and freedom now that I didn't have when I was leader.'" USA Today refers to a "new, edgier Lott," who is "merciless when it comes to President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., the men Lott says forced him out as leader in 2002." Scott Reed, "a GOP strategist who ran the presidential campaign of another Republican Senate majority leader, Bob Dole, says Lott's 'style of leadership has been missed. He gave the party direction." Phil Singer of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee retorted, "Only Bill Frist could make Republicans yearn for the days of Trent Lott."

House Vote On 527s Could Be Very Close. Roll Call (4/4, Newmyer, Bresnahan) reports, "House Republican leaders are bracing for a close vote on their push to rein in the free-spending nonprofit groups known as 527s, even as the details of the legislation the House plans to vote on Wednesday remain in flux." In "what might otherwise be a party-line vote," some members of the conservative Republican Study Committee "are raising concerns about the measure, complaining it doesn't go far enough to simultaneously roll back other campaign finance restrictions. If enough RSC members buck their leadership when the measure comes to a vote on the House floor Wednesday, they could sink the 527 bill."

GOP Unity Strained Again Over Budget Plan. The Washington Post (4/4, A21, Weisman, Murray, 744K) reports, "It has been just over three months since moderate Republicans squared off with House Republican leaders over the federal budget, but this week, with those wounds still fresh, they will be at it again. If they can round up the votes, House leaders will bring a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint to the floor, probably on Thursday." Republicans "hope to tout the measure as a testament to the party's commitment to fiscal discipline, at least on one corner of the federal budget -- non-security discretionary spending." But "to accommodate a 7 percent increase in military spending and a 3.6 percent boost to homeland security programs, domestic programs would have to be squeezed. Moderate Republicans are again balking. … At least half a dozen moderate Republicans have declared their opposition to the budget, as written, and with Democrats united in opposition, GOP leaders cannot afford many more defections." But "conservatives are just as resolute that Republicans hold the line on spending, lest the GOP's base voters abandon a party that has overseen the most dramatic fiscal shift from surpluses to deficits in the nation's history."

Democrats Evoke "Do Nothing Congress" Nickname. Congress plans to meet fewer days this year than in 1948, when President Harry Truman dubbed the body the "Do Nothing Congress." The Washington Times (4/4, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The average number of days lawmakers spend in session has dwindled over the decades, but legislators are on track to be in Washington fewer than 130 days in 2006. … Democrats, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, are evoking the nickname as they try to win back control." The Times adds, "Sean Spicer, spokesman for the House Republican Conference, said the number of days members spend in Washington is not a good indicator of the quality of work. … Rep. Thelma Drake, Virginia Republican, argued that this Congress has been more effective than previous ones, pointing to recent bills changing bankruptcy, energy and immigration policy."

Bush, Senate At Impasse Over Social Security, Medicare Trustees. The New York Times (4/4, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush and the Senate are at an impasse over the appointment of trustees for Social Security and Medicare, crippling the panel that supervises the two programs. This, in turn, has delayed the annual reports on the financial condition of the programs, which together account for more than one-third of all federal spending. Under federal law, the reports are supposed to be sent to Congress by April 1." The Times adds, "Since 2000, Social Security and Medicare have had two public trustees: John L. Palmer, former dean of the Maxwell School at Syracuse University, and Thomas R. Saving, an economist at Texas A&M." Their terms "have expired, and Mr. Bush has renominated them, but the Senate has taken no action. Senate leaders of both parties say they want to follow the precedent of having the public trustees serve no more than one term." But "the White House said Monday that the Senate should approve the president's nominees. … In the absence of public trustees, the administration has delayed sending the 2006 reports to Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0025062

Firms Try To Save Conflict Of Interest Changes In Pension Bill. Financial services companies want to preserve a provision in a pension bill to repeal some conflict of interest rules, making it easier for all street firms to sell financial products to pension funds. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports, "The provision, pushed by the Securities Industries Association and Fidelity Investments, is in the House version of the pension bill, but is opposed by Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, a member of the House-Senate conference committee. … The section of the pension bill dealing with conflicts of interest is one of several stumbling blocks to a compromise. While the Bush administration hasn't taken a formal position on the provision, the Labor Department has been advising conferees on the need to narrow the change, according to committee staff."

Survey Finds Americans Confident, Naive About Retirement Prospects. New research indicates that Americans remain confident about their retirement prospects, but the Wall Street Journal (4/4, Greene, 2.11M) reports that they may be "dangerously naïve" about the subject. The Retirement Confidence Survey, which is scheduled for release today by the Employee Benefit Research Institute notes that while 40% of working couples are covered by traditional pension plans, 61% of surveyed workers "expect to get income from such a plan in retirement." The Journal adds, "The responses in the survey, conducted annually for the past 16 years, reflect few worries about the spreading curtailment of pension plans. Twenty-four percent of the survey's participants said that they are very confident that they will have enough money to live comfortably in retirement -- virtually the same number as last year -- and 44% of those surveyed said they are somewhat confident about their financial prospects in later life, an increase of four percentage points from last year."

51 Federal Agencies Have Offered Cash Buyouts Since 2002. The Washington Post (4/4, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Since November 2002, 51 federal agencies -- about half of the executive branch -- have offered cash buyouts and early retirements to reshape their workforces, according to a recently released report from congressional auditors. The findings confirm what many federal employees have suspected -- that buyout offers have been increasing in recent years. The report by the Government Accountability Office counted at least 22,600 employees who left the government after accepting a buyout, early-out or combined package during fiscal years 2003 through 2005."

Stem Cell Research Spreads Despite Federal Funding Limits. Stem cell research in the US is gaining steam despite President Bush's decision over four years ago to limit public funding for studies of embryonic stem cells. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Regaldo, 2.11M) reports that according to the NIH, "the federal government's spending on such research hit a high of more than $37 million last year, according to the National Institutes of Health. … Last year, NIH grants and contracts supported about 154 research projects involving the administration-approved stem cells."

Bush Throws First Pitch On Opening Day In Cincinnati. All three networks last night reported on President Bush throwing the first pitch for the Reds' opening game against the Cubs. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 11, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "drew a standing ovation," adding "Bush continues a tradition that began in 1910, with President William Howard Taft." The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 9, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Taking the mound in Cincinnati was Number 43, right-hander George W. Bush, called up from Washington to throw out the first pitch as the Reds played the Cubs. The President described his toss as kind of a slow ball, but it did have a nice arc to it." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 10, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) said, "Marking the occasion today, former Texas Rangers owner and current President of the United States, George W. Bush. He was accompanied to the mound at Cincinnati's opener against the Cubs by two Iraq war veterans, and the father of a fallen veteran in the war in Afghanistan."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "Bush, whose political world of late has been as chilly as Cincinnati's 50-degree opening day temperature, landed his pitch in the vicinity of home plate, despite a stiff breeze. It was just wide enough to be considered a brushback on a right-handed hitter."

The New York Times (4/4, Times, 1.19M) reports, "Even President Bush's most ardent supporters concede he has been having a hard time getting many pitches over the plate in recent months. He came closer on Monday." The Reds' new chief executive, Bob Castellini, "was one of the investors with whom Mr. Bush bought the Texas Rangers in 1989."

DOJ_NMG_0025063

The Washington Times (4/4, Dinan, 90K) says Bush became "the first sitting president to throw the opening pitch in the home of the first professional baseball club." The Washington Post (4/4, A21, Frommer, 744K) reports the White House "has not said whether Bush will do the honors at the Nationals' home opener next Tuesday."

Book Challenges Allegation First Lady Used Drugs. The Washington Times (4/4, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that in his new book "Laura Bush: An Intimate Portrait of the First Lady," author Ronald Kessler takes on kitty Kelley's "claims about past drug use by first lady Laura Bush. In her book, Mrs. Kelley claimed Mrs. Bush was 'known in her college days [at Southern Methodist University] as a go-to girl for dime bags of marijuana.' The charge provoked uproarious laughter among Mrs. Bush's friends from SMU, according to Mr. Kessler's book, which is the first biography of the first lady to be written with White House cooperation. 'If she was the go-to, I missed that,' Mr. Kessler quotes Pamela Nelson, Mrs. Bush's Theta Kappa Alpha sorority sister at SMU. 'I was there. She was the go-to for a lot of things that were uplifting.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Manufacturing Activity Declined In March. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "A closely watched reading of the manufacturing sector weakened in March, but still points to solid economic growth in the months ahead." The Institute for Supply Management "said its index of manufacturing activity dropped to 55.2 in March from 56.7 in February, pushed lower by a decline in new orders and employment. Nevertheless, readings over 50 indicate expansion, so the data suggest that the nation's factories in March enjoyed a 34th consecutive month of growth. At 55.2, the ISM index for March was only slightly lower than the 55.4 monthly average over the past year."

Rise In Long-Term Interest Rates Could Slow Economy. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, A1, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "After stubbornly resisting nearly two years of prodding by the Federal Reserve, long-term interest rates are on the rise, a trend that could eventually slow the nation's expansion. Yesterday, the yield on the 10-year US. Treasury note -- the foundation for long-term interest rates -- rose as high as 4.905%, matching a two-year peak set in May 2004. Some analysts believe the yield is on a run that will take it above 5%." The upturn, "spurred by deepening economic growth in the US and abroad, is pushing up the cost of a widening range of consumer and business loans -- including 30-year mortgages and corporate bonds -- from extraordinarily low levels."

Gasoline Prices Rise To $2.59 For Regular Unleaded. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 10, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Energy Department reports that the price of gasoline shot up nine cents to $2.59 for regular unleaded. That's the highest price since late October, when one-third of the nation's oil-refining capacity was offline because of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Mufson, 744K) says that "with political tensions propping up crude oil prices and oil demand running strong in the United States and rising in China, gasoline prices could remain at these levels for the foreseeable future."

Electric Bills Not Expected To Rise Much This Summer. USA Today (4/4, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Finally, some good news for consumers about energy prices. With electricity costs expected to be up only slightly this summer from last, air conditioning bills likely will not be a shock to the wallet this year, according to data from the Energy Department." The nationwide average retail electricity price "is expected to be up 3% during June, July and August from the same time in 2005. That's about in line with inflation and follows a 4.3% gain last summer, according to the Energy Information Administration, the statistical arm of the Energy Department."

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. USA Today/AP (4/4, Wang) reports that yesterday "the Dow gained 35.62 points, or 0.3%, to 11,144.94, after ending the first quarter Friday with a 3.7% gain. Broader stock indicators were mixed. The S&P 500 rose 2.98 points, or 0.2%, to 1297.81. The Nasdaq dropped 3.05 points, or 0.1%, to 2336.74." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Patterson, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Some In Hollywood Critical Of Hillary Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Daunt, 958K) reports, "Depending on whom you talk to in Hollywood these days, Hillary Clinton is either too conservative, too polarizing, too famous, too stiff or -- keep this to yourself! -- too sexy. And those are just the opinions of the celebrities who vote Democrat. (Don't even ask what the few Republicans had to say.)" The Times adds, "Once the darling of the industry's liberal set, Clinton has come under attack from some as she starts to line up support for what many feel will be a run for the presidential nomination." The "chatter started quietly last year, when the Hollywood political crowd began speculating that Clinton could be a 2008 contender. … For months, few were willing to say anything negative on the record, for fear of offending Clinton and her husband," but "Hollywood is a fickle place; behind-the-scenes feuding and gossiping are just part of the game."

DOJ_NMG_0025064

Clinton Challenger To Launch Fundraising Drive. The New York Times (4/4, Healy, 1.19M) reports, "John Spencer, the former Yonkers mayor running against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, is planning a 30-state fund-raising drive to try to rally the national Republican Party to defeat her re-election bid this year, and has already secured support from some prominent conservatives." Even though Spencer "is still competing for the Republican Party's nomination against another candidate, Kathleen Troia McFarland, a former spokeswoman in the Reagan Pentagon, some conservatives have signaled early support for him." They "include Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican who is seen as a possible presidential candidate, and Representative Tom Feeney, a Florida Republican who is chairman of the House Conservatives Fund, a political action committee, according to aides to all three men."

Bill Clinton To Help DNC Effort To Boost State Parties. The Washington Times (4/4, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton has signed on to help Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean's drive to revitalize state Democratic parties across the country." Clinton "will begin the effort next week, by hosting an April 10 fundraiser for the DNC." The Times adds, "The former president reportedly had doubts about Mr. Dean's plan, but was convinced of the project's value and agreed to lend his assistance after a February meeting with the DNC chairman."

Frist Team Reaches Out To Washington "Chattering Class." The Hill (4/4, Bolton) reports, "Allies of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) are waging a quiet campaign to rehabilitate his image among opinion makers to ensure that members of D.C.'s 'chattering class' who mold the national conventional wisdom do not dismiss his presidential prospects." Frist" had breakfast with a small group of political handicappers last week and recently sat down with The New York Times to discuss his 2008 hopes. And his staff last month sent an e-mail to supporters asking them to rank Frist first and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) last in a survey gauging support for the top Republican presidential hopefuls, according to a copy obtained by The Hill." The Hill adds, "On Friday, too, his senior staff met with a handful of conservative leaders to assuage their concerns about the slow progress of President Bush's judicial nominees through the Senate -- a process that has reached a near standstill since the confirmation of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court, according to familiar sources."

Allen's 2006 Challenger Is Friend Of McCain. The Hill (4/4, Allen) reports, "Sens. George Allen (Va.) and John McCain (Ariz.) could square off for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- if an old McCain friend doesn't get to Allen first." Former Navy Secretary James Webb, "one of McCain's 'oldest friends,' is vying for the Democratic nomination to take on Allen in his reelection bid this November. Although Webb must first get past lobbyist Harris Miller in the Democratic primary, political analysts say his candidacy could end up hampering Allen's presidential aspirations and bolstering McCain's. … Despite the longtime friendship between McCain and Webb, a former Republican, the Arizona senator said he is backing Allen. Even so, in an interview outside the Senate chamber last week, McCain called Webb 'a war hero' and 'a great patriot.'"

MoveOn Criticizes NBC For Refusing To Run Its Ads. The Hill (4/4, Young) reports, "Two NBC-owned television stations have refused to carry advertisements sponsored by MoveOn.org's PAC that accuse four incumbent Republicans of selling out to energy interests." WVIT-TV in Hartford, CT, and WCMH-TV in Columbus, OH, "will not air the ads, which target Republican Reps. Nancy Johnson (Conn.), Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Chris Chocola (Ind.) and Thelma Drake (Va.). NBC Universal, a unit of General Electric, owns both affiliates." MoveOn PAC said, "We expected Republicans to respond, but we didn't expect two local NBC stations owned by GE to refuse to run our ad. … This smells of NBC pursuing its own political agenda at the expense of free speech and balance." NBC Universal, WVIT and WCMH "did not respond to requests for comment by press time yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0025065

O'Connor To Join Board Of Rockefeller Foundation. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor will join the board of the Rockefeller foundation in June. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) reports, "Justice O'Connor will become one of 15 members of the board, which includes Raymond W. Smith, chairman of both Rothschild North America and Arlington Capital Partners, whose appointment was also announced. … In a statement, Justice O'Connor said the foundation was 'constructively involved in providing creative and insightful aid to vulnerable groups around the globe.'"

Deal May Be Close For Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News. The New York Times (4/4, Carter, 1.19M) reports, "CBS's long courtship of Katie Couric has moved close to a conclusion. A deal to recruit her away from NBC's 'Today' show and into the nightly anchor chair at CBS News may be completed as early as this week, people close to the negotiations said yesterday." The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Kurtz, 744K) says "NBC executives expect Katie Couric to leave the 'Today' show and accept an offer from CBS to become the first woman to anchor an evening newscast on her own, with an announcement of her departure likely as early as this week." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) runs a similar report.

USAF Cargo Plane Crashes, Nobody Killed. The New York Times (4/4, Wald, 1.19M) reports that the crash of a USAF C-5B Galaxy "near a runway at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware early this morning" caused several injuries among the 17 personnel aboard but no deaths. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 3, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the C-5 "was trying to make an emergency landing when it hit the ground." An Air Force spokeswoman said "she did not know what the emergency was, or what cargo was on board." The plane had been bound for "the Naval Air Station in Rota, Spain, and then Kuwait." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 3, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) called the C-5 "one of the safest aircraft in the US Air Force."

Speech Patterns Seen As Key Influence In Presidential Vote. In his Washington Post column (4/4, A2), Richard Morin says, "What really may have decided the last presidential election" is that President Bush and Vice President Cheney "sounded more presidential than their Democratic counterparts. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) seemed the most depressed or suicidal. And Kerry's running mate, Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), sounded the most like a 'girly man.'" Researchers at the University of Texas at Austin "collected transcripts of 271 televised interviews, news conferences, town hall meetings and candidate debates conducted in 2004. The speech samples -- more than 400,000 words in all -- were run through a computer text-analysis program."

Blix Says Iran Years Away From Nuclear Weapon. The AP (4/3) reported former IAEA head and UN weapons inspector Hans Blix "said Monday that Iran is at least five years away from developing a nuclear bomb, leaving time to peacefully negotiate a settlement. Blix…said he doubted the US would resort to invading Iran" and "said there is still time for dialogue over Iran's nuclear enrichment program, which Tehran insists is for peaceful purposes but the West fears is part of a secret nuclear weapons program."

In an analysis of Tehran's torpedo test over the weekend, the AFP (4/3) said Iran was "flexing its military muscle" and had warned "the West not to 'play with fire' at a time of mounting tensions over its nuclear program." The test "coincides with a critical phase in the dispute over its nuclear ambitions, which the United States alleges is cover for a weapons program. Tehran denies the charges and officials said the success of the war games showed that the Islamic republic would never back down in the atomic standoff."

Iran Tests New High-Speed Torpedoes. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Ensor) reported that Iran has tested "two new types of high-speed torpedoes, capable, Iran said, of going over 200 miles an hour underwater to hit a submarine at any depth and to break a surface warship in two. Tests came as part of a large Iranian naval exercise in the Gulf dubbed 'The Great Prophet.' Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman in a statement said, 'It is not surprising that they have tested this weapon.' He said, 'The Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities.'"

The Washington Times (4/4, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Iran tested an older Scud missile variant last week and often exaggerates its military developments, the Pentagon said yesterday in response to Tehran's reported testing of new advanced weaponry. 'We know that the Iranians are always trying to improve their weapons systems by both foreign and indigenous measures,' Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said." He added that "the Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities."

DOJ_NMG_0025066

Missile Test Sparks Jump In Oil Futures. The Financial Times (4/4, Hoyos, Smyth) reports, "Crude oil prices jumped to their highest level since Hurricane Katrina on Monday amid uncertainty about Nigerian supplies and as Iran announced it had tested new weapons during war games in the Strait of Hormuz." Tehran's "declaration that it had test-fired a missile and a newly developed torpedo in the strait, the world's main oil shipping route, propelled Brent crude oil futures nearly $2 higher to $67.93 a barrel, before prices settled 93 cents higher at $66.84."

Launching Of Iranian Satellite Worries Government Analysts, Experts. The New York Times (4/4, Broad, Sanger, 1.19M) reports that "with last year's launching" of a satellite "and another planned in the next few weeks, Tehran has become the newest member of the international space club. The question now asked in Washington and other capitals is whether Iran's efforts are simply part of its drive to expand its technical prowess or an attempt to add another building block to its nuclear program. In that sense, it is the newest piece of the Iranian atomic puzzle." The Times adds, "To some government analysts and other experts in the West, Iran's space debut is potentially worrisome."

Iranian Bootleggers To Face 74 Lashes, Fine, Up To Year In Prison. The New York Times (4/4, Fathi, 1.19M) reports, "For more than 27 years, Iran's Islamic leaders have waged an uphill battle to cleanse the country of bootleg liquor. Since the 1979 revolution, the government has banned alcoholic drinks and frequently flogged those who drank them. The small community of Christians and Jews was exempted, but could not sell alcohol to Muslims." The Times adds, "In the latest effort to curb the widespread consumption and distribution of alcohol, the new conservative Parliament recently increased the punishment for selling or drinking it. Offenders still get 74 lashes, but now also receive a hefty fine and from three months to a year in prison, twice the maximum sentence than under the old law."

Rice's Wednesday Hill Testimony On India Nuclear Deal Previewed. The AP (4/3, Schweid) reported, "In a preview of the line" Secretary Rice "will take over two days of House and Senate testimony, [Spokesman Adam Ereli] acknowledged the deal had generated concern on Capitol Hill. Rice and other top administration officials, who have been buttonholing members of Congress for weeks, hope to build consensus for the agreement, Ereli said." The AP noted support for the deal will be complicated by two recent Iranian ship visits to Indian ports. The AP said Ereli "rejected the notion that the administration cut the deal with India to help build up the world's largest democracy as a counterweight to a rising China." Undersecretary Burns is quoted saying, "India can be trusted."

Venezuela Takes Control Of Oil Fields Operated By Foreign Companies. The Financial Times (4/4, Webb-Vidal) reports, "Venezuela has taken control of two oilfields operated by Eni and Total, the Italian and French energy companies, cranking up tensions with multinationals operating in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter." Rafael Ramírez, energy minister, "said on Monday the government had taken over the operations at the weekend because the two companies had failed to meet an April 1 deadline to comply with new legislation." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Bahree, 2.11M) says "Venezuela stepped up its battle to extract more-favorable terms from big international oil companies." The two companies "said they had failed to reach an agreement with the government to cede majority ownership in the two fields -- called Jusepin and Dacion -- to Petróleos de Venezuela SA, or PdVSA, the state-owned oil company, by a deadline at the end of last month."

Chavez Said To Use Oil Revenues To Buy Influence. The New York Times (4/4, Forero, 1.19M) reports, "President Hugo Chávez is spending billions of dollars of his country's oil windfall on pet projects abroad, aimed at setting up his leftist government as a political counterpoint to the conservative Bush administration in the region." Chavez's "new spending has given more power to a leader who has been provocatively building a bulwark against what he has called American imperialistic aims in Latin America." The Times says Chavez "is more than an irritant. He is fast rising as the next Fidel Castro, a hero to the masses who is intent on opposing every move the United States makes, but with an important advantage" – oil revenue.

The AP (4/3, Toothaker) reported, "Chavez accused the United States of being behind an effort to make it appear that Venezuela has territorial designs on some countries in the region," including the Netherlands Antilles. He "has previously suggested the Dutch islands off Venezuela's coast could be used as a launching pad for a U.S. invasion. … Chavez insists his government is democratic and accuses Washington of conspiring against him. He says the United States was behind a short-lived 2002 coup."

DOJ_NMG_0025067

UN Human Rights Envoy Protests His Exclusion From Sudan. The New York Times (4/4, Lacey, 1.19M) The government of Sudan today blocked a planned visit by the United Nations' top humanitarian official to the western Darfur region, prompting the official, Jan Egeland, to accuse Khartoum of attempting to hide the dire conditions there." The Sudanese Foreign Ministry said they delayed the visit to deconflict it with the birthday of the Prophet Mohammed. An official also said "it would not have been safe for Mr. Egeland, a Norwegian, to visit the country given the recent controversy over cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad published in a Danish newspaper." The Times says "relations between the Sudanese and the United Nations are particularly sensitive now because of the world body's plans later this year to take over the running of the African Union peacekeeping mission currently under way in Darfur." Although Egeland "has stopped short of calling the conflict a genocide, as the Bush administration has done, [he] has laid much of the blame for the suffering there at the feet of government officials."

Taylor Enters Not Guilty Plea. The New York Times (4/4, Nichols, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "In his first appearance before a special international tribunal, Charles G. Taylor, the former Liberian president, pleaded not guilty to 11 counts of war crimes, but not before refusing to recognize the court's jurisdiction and accusing it of attempting to meddle in the region's affairs.'" The AP (4/4, Faul) adds, "The former Liberian president initially said he could not plead on the charges, which stem from his alleged role in Sierra Leone's civil war, because he did not recognize the court. ... But after Justice Richard Lussick insisted, Taylor said calmly: 'Most definitely, your honor, I did not and could not have committed those acts against the sister republic of Sierra Leone.'"

Russia Hopes To Weaken Western Influence In Former Soviet States. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Weir, 61K) reports that "Russia is mulling its options" in the post-Soviet neighborhood. Russia is heartened by the pro-Russian party's victory in Ukrainian parliamentary elections but fears the Ukrainian "insistence that it will apply for NATO membership as early as 2008." The Kremlin increasingly sees violent repression of protests, such as in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, and Belarus as "an acceptable alternative to more Ukraine-style pro-democracy shifts."

Melloan Urges Harder Line With Putin. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, Melloan, 2.11M) that President Bush needs to admit that "Vladimir Putin is a hopeless case for any help in promoting world peace and freedom." Russian behavior in Iran and Iraq suggests that Putin "has never quite acknowledged that the Cold War is over."

EU Resents Polish Push For Strong US Ties. The Washington Times (4/4, Borowiec, 90K) reports that the conservative new Polish government has annoyed the EU "with an assertive anti-Russian, pro-American foreign policy" that undermines EU efforts at unanimity. Polish officials believe "the United States is much better able than the European Union to offer military security to Poland and other former Warsaw Pact members."

US-China Trade To Take Center Stage. The USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) reports that several "politically charged events" in April will make US-Chinese trade discussion central. They include "the April 20 summit [of Bush and Hu], a high-level meeting of the countries' Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade and the expected release of a U.S. Treasury Department report that could for the first time accuse China of manipulating its currency." However, China specialist Nicholas Lardy says that "Bush lacks leverage to compel action," given American indebtedness to China.

Berlusconi And Prodi Clash In Debate. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) reports that the Italian rivals "traded insults and statistics" in their second televised debate. They discussed numerous issues, "but the economy was the topic the two repeatedly discussed." Incumbent Berlusconi is "trailing in the polls by at least three percentage points."

Thai PM Hails Vote. The New York Times (4/4, Fuller, 1.19M) reports that Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra "claimed victory on Monday in national elections, which were boycotted by opposition groups." In a concession to the opposition, he "offered to set up an independent committee to judge his fitness to rule." The Times reports that "data from the Election Commission indicated that about 10 million voters checked the 'abstain' box on their ballots, a record number that opposition groups said showed the depth of disaffection."

DOJ_NMG_0025068

London Mayor Demands US Ambassador Pay Traffic Congestion Charge. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, McWalters, 958K) reports that London Mayor Ken Livingstone "has people on both sides of the Atlantic tut-tutting over his latest accusation: that the U.S. ambassador, whom the mayor called a 'car salesman,' is behaving like a 'chiseling little crook' by refusing to pay traffic charges." Livingstone demanded over the weekend that Ambassador Robert H. Tuttle and other U.S. Embassy commuters "pay the $14 charge to enter central London by car." The fee is known as a "congestion charge." British officials say the embassy staff members owe about $250,000 in fines for refusing to pay the fee." US officials in London "say they consider the fee a tax, from which they are exempt under the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. … The US Embassy would not comment on Livingstone's complaint."

Pakistan Criticized For Seeking To Silence Women's Advocate. In his New York Times column (4/4), Nicholas Kristof profiles Pakistani women's advocate Mukhtar Mai, who "has become an international celebrity. Her autobiography is the No. 3 best seller in France and is coming out this fall in the U.S., movies are being made about her, and she has been praised by dignitaries like Laura Bush and the French foreign minister." But "best of all, her campaign is really working: more women seem to be prosecuting rapes and acid attacks, and there's some evidence that such violence is dropping. But partly because of her success, there's a good chance that Mukhtar will be murdered." President Pervez Musharraf "seems to feel that Mukhtar is casting a spotlight on Pakistan's dark side, so he is leading an effort to bully her into silence."

Schroder Criticized For Gazprom Deal, Gag Order. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) says in an editorial that a Hamburg court "confirmed a gag order yesterday that reins in a German politician's criticism of the former chancellor, Gerhard Schröder, for taking a lucrative job as head of a Russian-led gas pipeline project." Guido Westerwelle, leader of the Free Democrats, "is no longer permitted to say" that Schröder "cut a deal on the project with the Russian gas giant Gazprom while he was chancellor and then went to work for Gazprom immediately on leaving office. Now it emerges that Mr. Schröder's government guaranteed financing of more than a billion dollars for the pipeline. Mr. Schröder insists that he knew nothing about that." Like "many other politicians who can't wait to cash in on their public service, Mr. Schröder seems not to understand — or pretends he doesn't — that 'wrong' is not the same as 'illegal.'"

Treasury Department Praised For Branding Hezbollah TV Station. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) says in an editorial that "between 10 and 15 million Arabic speakers in Europe, North Africa and the Middle East tune into Al-Manar (the Beacon), the television channel produced in Beirut by the terrorist group Hezbollah. The station's purpose, an Al-Manar official told researcher Avi Jorisch of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, is to 'help people on the way to committing what you call in the West a suicide mission.'" That's why "it's good news that last month the Treasury Department named Al-Manar as a Specially Designated Global Terrorist entity. The designation prohibits financial transactions with Al-Manar and its parent company, the Lebanese Media Group, and enables the government to level penalties against U.S. financial institutions (or foreign institutions that transact business in the U.S.) doing business with them."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"DeLay Quits His Drive For Re-Election."
"Bruins Are Gator Bait."
"The Right Sound For The Scene."
"Terrorist A Step Closer To Death."
"Lab-Grown Bladders Successful In Humans."
"New Battle On The Home Front."
"Pellicano Inquiry Expands To Snare Director Of 'Predator.'"

USA Today:

"DeLay To Drop Out Of Race, House."
"Medicine Goes Mobile: The House Call Returns."

New York Times:

"DeLay Is Quitting Race And House, Reports Assert."
"Justices Decline Terrorism Case Of A US Citizen."
"Jurors Permit Death Penalty For Moussaoui."

DOJ_NMG_0025069

"An Immigration Debate Framed By Family Ties."
"Chavez Uses Aid To Win Support In The Americas."
"With Yoga, Comedy And Parties, Synagogues Entice Newcomers."

Washington Post:
"DeLay To Resign From Congress."
"Moussaoui Found Eligible For Death."
"Gas Prices Up Sharply Ahead Of Peak Season."
"CBS Prepares To Land A New Anchor."
"First Bladders Grown In Lab Transplanted."
"On IM, Keeping Tabs And Keeping Up Appearances."

Washington Times:
"Death OK'd For Moussaoui"
"Boycott Set To Support Illegals."
"Nats Fall To Mets In Season Opener."
"DeLay To Quit Campaign, Step Down From Congress."
"Obesity is A Growing Road Hazard For Children."
"Phone Menus Press Callers' Hot Buttons."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM Shows Its Faith In Wagoner."
"$2.65? Gas Is A Bargain For Now."
"Cancer Program On Shaky Grounds."
"State To Get Language Grant."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"9/11 Plotter Eligible For Death."
"Theater Trailer For 'United 93 A Painful Jolt For Some Viewers."
"Embattled DeLay Says He'll Leave Congress."
"'My Fellow Italians' – Turner Kin's Hat In Faraway Ring."

Houston Chronicle:
"Embattled DeLay Will Quit The Race."
"Many Show Interest In Seat."
"Astros Bask With Big Assist From The Fans."
"Jury Finds Moussaoui Eligible For Execution."
"Defense Witness Testifies Perjury Was Committed."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Moussaoui Verdict; Midwest Tornadoes; Cargo Plane Crash; Iraq-US KIAs; Rice-Iraq; Carroll Homecoming; Tornado Season; Tax Preparer Mistakes; Airline Quality; Gas Prices; Bush-First Pitch; Regenerative Medicine.
CBS: Moussaoui Verdict; 9/11 Victim-Parents; Carroll Homecoming; Iraq-US KIAs; Midwest Tornadoes; Cargo Plane Crash; Standardized Testing- Scoring Pressures; Los Angeles-Klimt Painting; Bush-First Pitch; NCAA-Wheelchair Basketball Championship.
NBC: Midwest Tornadoes; Moussaoui Verdict; Cargo Plane Crash; Iraq-US KIAs; Rice-Iraq; Carroll Homecoming; Tax Preparer Cheating; Red Cross Reform; Airline Quality; Bush-First Pitch; Undersized Car Seats.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: DeLay Resignation; Moussaoui Sentencing; NCAA Men's Championship; TN-Tornadoes.
CBS: DeLay Resignation; Moussaoui Sentencing; TN-Tornadoes; NCAA Men's Championship; Bonds-Steroid Use; Wall Street.
NPR: DeLay Resignation; TN-Tornadoes; Belarus-Lukashenko Swearing In; Foreign Stock Markets; Sudan-Aid Efforts; Moussaoui Sentencing; NCAA Men's Championship; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a meeting on health care initiatives, Roosevelt Room; attends Republican National Committee Finance luncheon, Closed press. Evermay, 1623 28th St. NW.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Meets with youth at a Helping America's Youth event, St. Charles, Mo.; speaks at a Jim Talent for Senate luncheon, St. Louis.

US Senate: 10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Strategic Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the missile defense programs. Defense Undersecretary Eric S. Edelman; Gen. James E. Cartwright, commander, U.S. Strategic Command; Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director, Missile Defense Agency; David W. Duma, acting director, Operational Test and Evaluation, DoD. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on money laundering and terrorist financing threats. Undersecretary of the Treasury Stuart Levy; Undersecretary of State E. Anthony Wayne; James Burris, Jr., FBI; Kevin Delli-Colli, DHS. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on aviation security. Assistant DHS Secretary Edmund Hawley; Cathleen

DOJ_NMG_0025070

Berrick, GAO; Gregory Principato, Airports Council International-North America. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the costs of tax preparations for taxpayers. Michael Brostek, Director, Strategic Issues Team, GAO; Paul R. Desaulniers, Special Agent, GAO; Christine A. Hodakievic, Special Agent, GAO; Bert DuMars, Director, Electronic Tax Administration, IRS; Nina E. Olson, National Taxpayer Advocate, Taxpayer Advocate Service; Robert A. Weinberger, Member, Free File Alliance, LLC; Francis X. Degen, EA, President, National Association of Enrolled Agents; Harley Duncan, Executive Director, Federation of Tax Administrators. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Internatioknal Operations and Terrorism Subcommittee. Closed briefing on counterterrorism priorities. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Fu7ll Committee. Markup of FY06 supplemental appropriations for hurricane relief and operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Personnel Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 budget for health benefits for military personnel. Air Force Vice Chief of Staff Gen. John Corley; Undersecretary of Defense David Chu; Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed hearing on intelligence issues. Members only. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the reform of the FHA's Title I Manufacturered Housing Loan Programs. Assistant HUD Secretary Brian Montgomery; Michael Frenz, Ginnie Mae; Kevin Clayton, Clayton Homes. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Seapower Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the U.S. Transportation Command. Gen. Norton Schwartz, commander of the command, and Gen. Duncan McNabb, commander, Air Mobility Command. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. Meets for morning hour and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (6 bills): 1) H.J.Res. 81 - Providing for the appointment of Phillip Frost as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 2) H.J.Res. 82 - Providing for the reappointment of Alan G. Spoon as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 3) H.Con.Res. 355 - Recognizing the benefits and importance of school-based music education, and for other purposes; 4) H.Res. 703 - Recognizing the 20th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster and supporting continued efforts to control radiation and mitigate the adverse health consequences related to the Chernobyl nuclear power plant; 5) H.Res. 744 - Expressing support for the Good Friday Agreement of 1998 as the blueprint for lasting peace in Northern Ireland and support for continued police reform in Northern Ireland as a critical element in the peace process; 6) H.Res. 692 - Commending the people of the Republic of the Marshall Islands for the contributions and sacrifices they made to the United States nuclear testing program in the Marshall Islands, solemnly acknowledging the first detonation of a hydrogen bomb by the United States on March 1, 1954, on the Bikini Atoll in the Marshall Islands, and remembering that 60 years ago the United States began its nuclear testing program in the Marshall Islands.

9 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Projection Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on the U.S. shipbuilding industry. Acting Undersecretary of Defense Gary Powell; Deputy Assistant Navy Secretary Allison Stiller; Vice Adm. Paul E. Sullivan, commander, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rear Adm. Charles S. Hamilton II, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rick Self, National Shipbuilding Research Program; Cynthia L. Brown, American Shipbuilding Association; Mark L. Montroll, National Defense University. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Supreme Court. Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual predators and the Internet. Sharon Cooper, University of North Carolina; Justin Berry, Bakersfield, Calif.; Ken Gourlay, Royal Oak, Mich.; Ernie Allen, executive director, National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Alexandria, Va.; Parry Aftab, executive director, Wired Safety, Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y.; Shannon Sullivan, teen angel, Wired Safety, Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y.; Teri Schoeder, president and program director, I Safe America, Carlsbad, Calif.; Moni Sallam, mentor, Safe America, Carlsbad, Calif. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0025071

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on visa processing delays. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Tony Edson; Jess T. Ford, GAO; Yo-Yo Ma, artistic director, The Silk Road Project Inc.; Sandra L. Gibson, president and CEO, Association of Performing Arts Presenters; Dennis J. Slater, president, Association of Equipment Manufacturers; Kevin Schofield, general manger, Strategy and Communications, Microsoft Research; Elizabeth C. Dickson,Ingersoll-Rand Co. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Concsitution Subcommittee. Hearing on lobbying reform. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

12 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. and Constitution Subcommittee. Joint hearing on government acquisition of personal information bought through information resellers. Linda D. Koontz, GAO; Maureen Cooney, acting chief privacy officer, Homeland Security Department; Peter Swire, Moritz College of Law, Ohio State University; Stuart Pratt, president and CEO, Consumer Data Industry Association. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on defense health programs. Location: Room H-143, Capitol.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Office of Science and Technology Policy. Location: Room H-309, Capitol.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Tactical Air and Land Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on combat systems and protection initiatives. Paul L. Francis, GAO; Janet St. Laurent, GAO; Mike Gilmore, CBO; Assistant Army Secretary Claude M. Bolton; Army Deputy Chiefs of Staff Lt. Gen. David F. Melcher and Lt. Gen. James J. Lovelace; Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, commanding general, Marine Corps Combat Development Command. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Hearing on federal workforce issues regarding airport security. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on NRC facility standards since 9/11. Jim Wells, GAO; Nils Diaz, chairman, Nuclear Regulatory Commission; Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal; Danielle Brian, executive director, Project of Government Oversight; Marvin Fetel, vice president and chief nuclear officer, Nuclear Energy Institute; Chris Crane, president and chief nuclear officer, Exxon Generation Co. LLC. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Highways, Transit and Pipelines Subcommittee. Hearing on reliability of Highway Trust Fund revenue estimates. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Foreign Operations, Export Financing and Related Programs Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the State Department. Secretary Rice. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

4 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on agency cooperation in the war on terrorism. Joint Chiefs of Staff Vice Chairman Adm. Edmund Giambastiani; Amb. Henry Crumpton; Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, National Counterterrorism Center. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

5 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Telecommunications and the Internet Subcommittee. Markup. of miscellaneous business. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: GERMAN FOREIGN MINISTER FRANK-WALTER STEINMEIER _ Highlights: Schedule includes discussions with senators, a noon news conference and dinner with Secretary of State Rice. Details have not been announced.

PAKISTANI INTERIOR MINISTER AFTAB AHMAD KAHAN SHERPAO _ Highlights: 10 a.m. Meets with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. 11:30 a.m. Meets with Attorney General Gonzales. 1:30 p.m. Meets with Deputy National Securit6y Adeviser J.D. Crouch. White House. 2:45 p.m. Meets with Amb. at Large John Miller. 3:45 p.m. Meerts with Deputy DEA Administrator Michele Leonhart. 5 p.m. Meets with Rep. Ed Royce. Room 2202, Rayburn. 6 p.m. Meets with Undersecretary of Defense Eric Edelman, Pentagon.

BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION _ The Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, holds its 2006 Legislative Conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Reps. Robert Simmons, R-Conn.; Steny Hoyer, D-Md.; Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio; and Linda Sanchez, D-Calif. John Sweeney, president, AFL-CIO; and Sen. john McCain, R-Ariz. Location: Washington Hilton and Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0025072

HISPANIC BUSINESSES _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce (USHCC) holds its 16th Annual Legislative Conference Immigration reform, telecommunications reform, and advancing federal procurement opportunities are among the key issues that will receive top billing at this years legislative conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. Immigration Summit. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas; Representatives Jim Kolbe and Luis Gutierrez, and Mexican Ambassador Carlos de Icaza will participate. 9:30 a.m. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas. 1 p.m. White House brefing with keynote address by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 5:15 p.m. Political party briefing with Reps. Joe Baca, Lincoln Diaz-Balart, Luis Fortuno, others. Reagan Trade Center. Location: Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CHINA-INDUSTRIAL SUBSIDIES _ 9 a.m. - 5 p.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission holds a public hearing to assess China's compliance with its World Trade Organization accession on subsidies, examine what constitutes China's subsidy regime, evaluate the level of transparency of China's economic planning process, and identify how China's industrial subsidies negatively or positively affect U.S. companies, investors or workers. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn House Office Building.

CLIMATE-GREENHOUSE GASES _ 9:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Senate Energy & Natural Resources Committees hosts a group of panelists comprised of government, business, and environmental organizations for a bipartisan discussion on climate and how Congress might go about creating a mandatory trading program to control US greenhouse gas emissions. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

JOHANNS _ 8 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks at the Government Performance Summit. Location: Wyndham City Center Hotel, 1143 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

IMMIGRATION SURVEY _ 9 a.m. Pew Hispanic Center Directort Roberto Suro and Pew Research Center Presidenty Andrew Kohut hold a briefing on a new survey on immigration. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IMMIGRATION-CIVIC ACTION _ 9:30 a.m. Organizers of the March 25 immigration march and rally in Los Angeles hold a news conference to announce their next national action. Location: National Press Club.

MEHLMAN-DENTAL ASSOCIATION _ 10:30 a.m. Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman addresses the American Dental Association. Location: J.W. Marriott Hotel, Grand Ballroom, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

FINANCIAL LITERACY _ 11 a.m. Treasury Secretary Snow and US Treasurer Anna Cabral, others, launch the National Strategy for Financial Literacy. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

WEINBERGER FUNERAL _ 11 a.m. Funeral for Caspar Weinberger. Location: Section 30, Arlington National Cemetery.

SMITH-HUMAN RIGHTS _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., addresses students at American University's Washington College of Law on how to implement a bipartisan approach to human rights. Location: Room 600 of the law school, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

CHAMBLISS _ 11:30 a.m. Sen. Saxby Chambliss holds a telephone briefing on immigration reform. Notes: Callin number: 888-396-9929; passcode: Chambliss.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., others, hold a press conference on comprehensive immigration reform and the need for improved border security. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

TERRORISM _ 11:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a panel discussion on the transatlantic dialogue on terrorism, with Daniel Benjamin, Marc Sageman, Karin von Hippel and Julianne Smith, all of CSIS. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

HEALTH CARE SAVINGS _ 12 p.m. Bob Litan, a scholar at both the Kauffman Foundation and the Brookings Institution. holds a briefing to present findings from a recent report on how accelerated broadband deployment in the United States could deliver hundreds of billions of dollars to the U.S. economy. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn House Office Building.

HOYER _ 12 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

INTELLIGENCE SUPPORT-MILITARY _ 12 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a meeting on ``Intelligence Support to the Military." Speakers include Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif.; and John McLaughlin, senior fellow,

DOJ_NMG_0025073

Merrill Center for Srategic Studies, SAIS; former acting director of the CIA. Location: Council on Foreign Relations, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SENATE-LOUISIANA _ 12:15 p.m. Senate Louisiana delegation and state political leaders will join in urging the Senate to include funding for hurricane protection levees and Louisiana housing in the Supplemental Appropriations bill. Location: Senate Swamp.

DEMOCRATS _ 12:30 p.m. The Democratic Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-211, Capitol. Notes: Gallery escort leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

REPUBLICANS _ 12:30 p.m. The Senate Republican Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-207, Capitol. Notes: Gallery escort leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

WHISTLEBLOWERS _ 12:30 p.m. Presentation of the annual Ridenhour Awards to recognize whistleblowers. Location: National Press Club.

US-INDONESIA _ 1:40 p.m. Joint news conference with USTR Rob Portman and Indonesian Trade Minister Mari Pangestu. Location: USTR, 600 17th St. NW.

FAIR HOUSING _ 2 p.m. HUD Secretary Jackson, others, kick off Fair Housing Month. Location: HUD cafeteria, 451 7th St. SW.

DEMOCRATS-SECURITY _ 2:15 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Congresswoman Hilda L. Solis, Chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, and Congresswoman Ellen Tauscher, Member of the House Armed Services Committee, will join first responders at a press conference tomorrow to discuss ``Real Security: A Democratic Plan to Secure America and Restore Our Image in the World." Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 3:45 p.m. House Speaker Dennis Hastert joins House Republican Leaders to discuss Border Security, Budget Reform, and 527 Reform. Location: Room H-230 (balcony area), Capitol.

GOP-ENVIRONMENT _ 4:30 p.m. Senator Chaffee and Congressman Boehlert hold an event with Republicans for Environmental Protection. Location: Russell Park.

JOURNALISTS HONORED _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University honors journalists Anne Garrels of NPR, George Packer of The New Yorker, Christiane Amanpour of CNN and Doonesbury creator Garry Trudeau. After the presentation, Amanpour and others will hold a panel discussion on Iraq. Location: Bunn Center auditorium, Georgetown University.

WHITE HOUSE PRESS _ 8 p.m. - 9 p.m. American University's School of Communication will hosts a panel discussion titled, ``The White House Press Corps: Then and Now." Panelists include: Alexis Simendinger, White House correspondent, National Journal; Helen Thomas, Hearst News Service reporter and dean of the White House Corps; Kenneth T. Walsh, Chief White House correspondent, U.S. News & World Report; and Mark McDonald, program director, WAMU 88.5 FM and AU School of Communication broadcast journalist in residence. Location: Mary Graydon Center, University Club, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, APRIL 4, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Jurors Find Moussaoui Eligible For Death Penalty 3
Supreme Court Declines To Hear Padilla Appeal 4
Hayat Case Seen As Example Of DOJ Overreach On Terror Allegations 5
Pakistani Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Stinger Missile Plot 5
9/11 Detainee Testifies About Alleged Use Of Dogs At New Jersey Jail 5

Patriot Act:
Patriot Act Used In Baby Formula Criminal Case 5

Homeland Response:
IG Report Says FBI-Coast Guard Dispute Impedes Maritime Terror Attack Response 6
Justice Department IG Says US Ports "Largely At Risk." 6
GAO Says NRC Weakened Security Regulations After Consulting With Industry 6
International Student Admissions Rebounding From Post-9/11 Decline 6
DHS Official's Testimony On DC Preparedness Criticized 7
FBI Interviewing Workers, Contractors At Florida Nuclear Plant ... 7
Minnesota Domestic Terror Plot Foiled 7
Cohen Says Hole At Ground Zero Is Bush's Legacy 7
FEMA's Post-Katrina Report Said To Highlight Old Problems 7
Race Seen As Dominant Issue In New Orleans Mayoral Primary 7

War News:
Rice, Straw Press Iraqis To Form Government 8
Wehner Says War Critics Have Offered No Alternative To Bush "Freedom Agenda." 9
Zarqawi Reportedly Replaced As Head Of Al Qaeda In Iraq 9
US Troops In Iraq Try To Bring Iraqi Forces Up To Speed 10
Iraqi Civilians Attempt To Provide Own Security 10
Thirteen US Troops Killed In Iraq Over Weekend 10
CSMonitor Editor Thanks FBI, Military For Work To Free Carroll 10
New Documents Slow Australian Oil-For-Food Probe 10
Skeptics Question Fugitive Kurdish Writer's Plight 10
Allen Advocates Boykin For Special Operations Command 11

DOJ:
Card, Gonzales, Other Top Bush Aides Spotted At DC Restaurant 11
DOJ Privacy Officer To Launch Panel 11

Corporate Scandals:
Enron Defense Begins To Present Case 11
Former Westar Executives Sentenced 12
Refco Shareholders Consolidate Suits 12
HealthSouth Pays Out Hefty Legal Fees 12

Criminal Law:
Capitol Police Seek Arrest Warrant For McKinney 13
Director Charged In Pellicano Probe 13
Jury Hears Closing Arguments In "Mafia Cops" Trial 14
California Men Plead Guilty To Operating Massive Music, Software Piracy Ring 14
Former Nevada Commissioner, Exotic Dancers Testify About Alleged Bribes 15
Judge Rejects Plea Agreement In Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Probe 15
Connecticut Mob Boss Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison 15
Mexican Police Arrest Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer 15
Virginia Executives Sentenced To Prison, Fines For Contract Fraud 16
Teenage Girl Charged In Shooting Of Baltimore Officer 16

Civil Law:
Sikorsky Sues DOD To Keep Records Sealed 16
Philip Morris Makes Payment To States As RJR Balks 16
FEC Ruling On Internet Activity Called "Classic Compromise." .. 17

Civil Rights:
DOJ Lawsuit Alleges Discrimination Against Mississippi White Voters 17
DOJ Reaches Settlement With Virginia Beach Over Police Entrance Exam 17
American-Statesman Urges DOJ Probe Of Austin Police Beating 17
DOJ Checks Michigan Court For ADA Compliance 18
ACLU: "Operation Meth Merchant" Targeted South Asian Store Owners In Georgia 18
Recommendations Offered To Curb Anti-Semitism On College Campuses 18
Yale Wins Anti-Political Correctness Award 18

Antitrust:
Alcatel, Lucent Seek CFIUS Support For Proposed Merger 18

GM Sells Financing Arm Stake For $7.4 Billion 19
Novartis Raises Bid For Chiron 19
Continental AG To Purchase Motorola Automotive Unit 20
Maytag Chairman To Step Down 20
Approval Of Boeing-Lockheed Rocket Deal Expected This Month 20
EU To Charge Countries Over Energy Reform Delays 20
Key Washingtonians Lobbying To Boost Patent Protections 21

Environment:

EPA Regional Offices Opposed To Emissions Rule 21
Obama Hits Bush "Stubborn Refusal" To Address Climate Change 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Air Marshals Plead Guilty To Cocaine Smuggling 22
Missouri Woman Sentenced For Meth Conspiracy 22
Illinois Man Gets 20-Year Sentence For Dealing Crack 22
Maryland, DC Seen As "Magnets" For Meth Dealers 22
Louisiana Jailer Faces Drug Distribution Charges 22
California County Supervisor Seeks To Ban Marijuana-Flavored Candy 22
Canada's Prime Minister Scraps Legislation Decriminalizing Marijuana 22
US Seeks To Shut Down California Gun Dealer 23

Immigration:

Senators Seek Compromise On Immigration Bill 23

Tax:

Bidder Protests Could Delay Tax Collection Outsourcing 25
USA Today Urges Tighter Rules On Taxpayer Privacy 26
Congressional Report Highlights Tax Preparation Firms' Frequent Mistakes 26
WSJournal Criticizes Perry's Proposed Tax On Business Receipts 26

Congress-Administration:

More White House Staff Changes Expected 27
DeLay Won't Run For Reelection, Will Resign From House Seat27
Thirteen House Republicans Returning Rudy Contributions 28
"New, Edgier" Lott Said To Be "Merciless" When It Comes To Bush, Frist 28
House Vote On 527s Could Be Very Close 28
GOP Unity Strained Again Over Budget Plan 28
Democrats Evoke "Do Nothing Congress" Nickname 29
Bush, Senate At Impasse Over Social Security, Medicare Trustees 29
Firms Try To Save Conflict Of Interest Changes In Pension Bill. 29
51 Federal Agencies Have Offered Cash Buyouts Since 2002... 29
Stem Cell Research Spreads Despite Federal Funding Limits ... 29
Bush Throws First Pitch On Opening Day In Cincinnati 30
Book Challenges Allegation First Lady Used Drugs 30

Other News:

Manufacturing Activity Declined In March 30
Some In Hollywood Critical Of Hillary Clinton 31
Bill Clinton To Help DNC Effort To Boost State Parties 31
Frist Team Reaches Out To Washington "Chattering Class." 31
Allen's 2006 Challenger Is Friend Of McCain 31
MoveOn Criticizes NBC For Refusing To Run Its Ads 31
O'Connor To Join Board Of Rockefeller Foundation 32
Deal May Be Close For Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News.. 32
USAF Cargo Plane Crashes, Nobody Killed 32
Speech Patterns Seen As Key Influence In Presidential Vote 32
Blix Says Iran Years Away From Nuclear Weapon 32
Rice's Wednesday Hill Testimony On India Nuclear Deal Previewed 33
Venezuela Takes Control Of Oil Fields Operated By Foreign Companies 33
UN Human Rights Envoy Protests His Exclusion From Sudan... 33
Taylor Enters Not Guilty Plea 34
Russia Hopes To Weaken Western Influence In Former Soviet States 34
EU Resents Polish Push For Strong US Ties 34
US-China Trade To Take Center Stage 34
Berlusconi And Prodi Clash In Debate 34
Thai PM Hails Vote 34
London Mayor Demands US Ambassador Pay Traffic Congestion Charge 34
Pakistan Criticized For Seeking To Silence Women's Advocate 34
Schroder Criticized For Gazprom Deal, Gag Order 35
Treasury Department Praised For Branding Hezbollah TV Station 35

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 35

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 36

DOJ_NMG_0025076

TERRORISM NEWS:

Jurors Find Moussaoui Eligible For Death Penalty. Jurors yesterday found Zacaria Moussaoui eligible for the death penalty. The story received extensive coverage on network news broadcasts and cable news last night and in newspapers today. It was the lead on ABC and CBS, and was second in NBC's story lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (4/3, lead story, 3:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Those who suffered the most in the attacks, the victims and their families, will now confront Moussaoui in court, and make their case that he deserves to die." ABC (Thomas) added, "Family members of the 9/11 victims were overjoyed." In the "next phase of the trial, the prosecution will show the photographs of all the nearly 3,000 victims. 45 members of their family will testify about what that day did to their lives."

The CBS Evening News (4/3, lead story, 2:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) noted Moussaoui's "court-appointed lawyers had urged him not to testify, but he insisted. He insulted the jurors, he disavowed the lawyers and he cursed America." CBS (Stewart) added, "Moussaoui apparently couldn't have cared less" about yesterday's decision. "When the jury left, he yelled, 'You'll never get my blood. God curse you all.' It was a total victory for the government." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 2, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) also reported that the decision "is a big victory…for the federal government…in a case that almost got derailed." NBC (P. Williams) added that former federal prosecutor Andrew McBride "says today's verdict makes it more likely Moussaoui will ultimately be sentenced to die."

USA Today (4/4, 4A, Johnson, 2.31M) adds, "The jury's decision elated several 9/11 victims' relatives. Abraham Scott, whose wife, Janice Marie, was killed in the Pentagon when it was hit by a hijacked American Airlines jet, likened Moussaoui to a dog with rabies.' Rosemary Dillard, whose husband, Eddie, was on the jet that hit the Pentagon, pumped her fist as she left the courthouse. … 'This man has no soul; he has no conscience.'" However, The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 2, 2:30, Roberts, 7.66M) reported Al and Maureen Santora, parents of a 9/11 victim, "have been going to a courthouse in New York City to watch the Zacarias Moussaoui trial on closed circuit television." Yesterday's decision "brought no satisfying answers for the Santoras." The trial, "they say, exposed the failure of the government's intelligence network.

The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) notes that "legal specialists said the emotional nature of the coming evidence is a major advantage for the government. They said prosecutors have survived their most difficult hurdle." DOJ spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos "said prosecutors 'are pleased with the jury's ruling in this important case. Our efforts on behalf of the victims of 9/11 will continue as we pursue the next phase of this trial.'"

The New York Times (4/4, Lewis, 1.19M) reports that "the second phase of the complicated federal death penalty law is more mathematical. The jury will be asked first to consider whether the aggravating factors of his crime outweighed any mitigating factors." Although "Moussaoui's lawyers have suggested in court papers that they may introduce testimony from a psychologist showing that Mr. Moussaoui suffers mental impairment as a result of anti-Muslim bigotry he faced growing up in France," that testimony "may well be outweighed by the deaths of Sept. 11."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Serrano, 958K) recalls that during the trial, prosecutors "urged the jury to concentrate on what they said was their proof that Moussaoui's lies to FBI agents in Minnesota cost the government the chance to locate the Sept. 11 plotters and stop the hijackings." But Moussaoui lawyer Edward MacMahon "argued…that Moussaoui was never groomed for a Sept. 11 role," and that "the FBI and CIA were not cooperating with each other enough in the summer of 2001 to find the hijackers, even with Moussaoui's help."

Bloomberg (4/4, Arthur) reports, "The jury deliberated for about 17 hours over four days. In the second part of the sentencing trial, which will begin April 6, the jury will consider factors weighing for and against capital punishment to decide whether to sentence Moussaoui to death. A verdict of death must be unanimous. … 'We are pleased with the jury's ruling in this important case,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos. 'Our efforts on behalf of the victims of 9/11 will continue as we pursue the next phase of this trial.'"

AFP (4/4) reports, "The US government, which saw its failure to stop the attacks exposed in a catalogue of bungles, missteps and mistakes highlighted by defense lawyers, was left to savour a legal victory in the war on terror. … The jury decision means they accepted the government's theory that Moussaoui's lies 'with lethal intent' in jail, after his arrest in August 2001, directly resulted in the deaths of at least one person on September 11. … Had he told about his knowledge of the plot, authorities would have been able to unroll a massive prevention operation, and would have stood a chance of stopping the attacks, the government claimed."

Scripps Howard (4/4, Gordon) reports, "After the 10-minute hearing adjourned, the bearded would-be terrorist shouted 'You'll never get my blood! God curse you all!' as he left the courtroom. … Yet experts said Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts a year ago, may have sunk himself. He gave prosecutors another big helping hand in the first phase of the sentencing trial. He insisted on testifying over his lawyers' objections and then further incriminated himself by admitting that he was part of the Sept. 11 operation, that he planned to fly a fifth plane into the White House and that he lied upon his arrest so the suicide hijackings could go forward."

DOJ_NMG_0025077

The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) and AP (4/4, Barakat) also report on the jury's decision.

Supreme Court Declines To Hear Padilla Appeal. Fox News' Special Report (4/3, Hume) reported, "The Supreme Court today declined to take the case of terror suspect Jose Padilla, who sued to challenge the legality of his prior detention as an enemy combatant. However, the separate case involving criminal charges involving Padilla will still go forward in Miami." USA Today (4/4, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the justices "voted 6-3 to spurn" Padilla's appeal.

The Washington Post (4/4, A6, Lane, 744K) says the "potential showdown between the Supreme Court and the Bush administration over the president's war powers was averted yesterday when the court declined to hear" the case. The court "granted the administration's request not to review the case…because the administration last November met Padilla's demand to be indicted in a civilian court and transferred from a Navy brig to a civilian jail." The decision "is a victory for the administration because it leaves intact an appeals court ruling that upheld the president's authority to detain Padilla as an 'enemy combatant.'" But "the win was possible only because the administration had already made its tactical retreat in the face of negative public reaction and uncertain prospects at the high court, legal analysts said." The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Richey, 61K) makes a similar case in a story headlined "Bush Team Wins On Power To Detain, For Now," and the Washington Times (4/4, Taylor, 90K) says the court's move was equivalent to "sidestepping" the issue. Donna R. Newman, a defense attorney for Padilla, "said the high court's rejection of the case was not a complete loss. She said the court 'put the government on a very short leash.'"

The New York Times (4/4, Greenhouse, 1.19M) notes Padilla "fell one vote short on Monday of persuading the Supreme Court to take his case. Four votes are necessary for the court to take a case, and Mr. Padilla's appeal received only three." The outcome "was not the unalloyed victory for the Bush administration that it might have appeared to be." Three justices who voted not to hear the case, Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and John Paul Stevens, along with Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., "filed an unusual opinion explaining their position. They noted that Mr. Padilla, who is now out of military custody and awaiting trial in federal district court in Miami on terrorism-related charges, was entitled to a criminal defendant's full range of protections, including the right to a speedy trial." The Times adds, "Most significant, the three justices warned the administration that the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, stood ready to intervene 'were the government to seek to change the status or conditions of Padilla's custody.'"

The AP (4/3, Holland) reports, "The former Chicago gang member and convert to Islam was held in a military prison as an alleged enemy combatant for three and a half years, part of that time without access to lawyers. … His supporters wanted the Supreme Court to use his case to declare that Americans cannot be arrested on U.S. soil and held incommunicado. … Justices appeared poised to do that last fall, but with Padilla's appeal pending the government abruptly changed its strategy. Prosecutors brought criminal charges in Florida, and now Padilla has what his lawyers sought all along, traditional legal rights as part of the federal court system." The AP notes, "The Justice Department said it was pleased by the outcome of Padilla's appeal. … 'Fighting the war on terrorism requires the use of numerous tools and tactics which have been viewed as lawful by the courts, and we are pleased that Mr. Padilla's case will be pursued through the criminal justice system,' Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said."

The Legal Times (4/3, Mauro) reports, "In an unusual statement explaining the Court's denial of review, Justice Anthony Kennedy said 'strong prudential considerations' argued against the Court taking up the case. If the Court did review Padilla's case, Kennedy said, its ruling on the enemy-combatant issue would not affect his current custody status. Given that the government has detained Padilla for nearly four years, Kennedy said 'it must be acknowledged' that he has a 'continuing concern' that he could be reclassified as an enemy combatant. … If that happens, Kennedy said, Padilla could challenge the detention again in several ways, including a habeas petition to the Supreme Court. Kennedy put the government on notice that the courts would be open for further appeals if Padilla's status changes again, 'to ensure that the offices and purposes of the writ of habeas corpus are not compromised.'"

CNN.com (4/3, Mears) reports, "In a brief dissent, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said, 'Nothing the government has yet done purports to retract the assertion of executive power Padilla protests.' Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer also would have accepted the case for review."

Voice of America (4/4, Malone) reports, "The administration has said it had the power to detain Padilla since his arrest in 2002 as part of its overall legal strategy in fighting the war on terror. … 'We are dealing with a new kind of threat, a new kind of enemy and that has required new thinking and new strategies by the administration,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said."

DOJ_NMG_0025078

More Commentary. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) editorializes, "The Supreme Court ducked its duty yesterday," but "fortunately…did not hand a total victory to the administration. Justice Kennedy made it clear that the case raises 'fundamental issues respecting the separation of powers,' and strongly signaled that the court would be ready to step in quickly if the government returned Mr. Padilla to military custody, or his basic rights were denied in his civilian trial. We trust Justice Kennedy and his colleagues to stay true to that pledge."

The Washington Post (4/4, A22, 744K) editorializes that the ruling "seems initially to be a victory for the Bush administration and its aggressive legal approach to the war on terrorism. Beneath the surface, however, the court's action is less an endorsement of the administration's approach than face-saving permission for the government's backing down."

Pentagon Releases Guatanamo Detainee Names. The Washington Post (4/4, A6, 744K) reports, "The Pentagon yesterday released the names and nationalities of a group of detainees at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the second batch of documents made public by the Defense Department in the past 30 days after four years of resistance." The Post adds, "The combined 7,600 pages represent the most complete list of detainee names, ages and nationalities to date. Yesterday's documents were published voluntarily, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said." The Defense Department "still holds about 490 people at Guantanamo Bay, the vast majority without charges."

Hayat Case Seen As Example Of DOJ Overreach On Terror Allegations. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/4, Maykuth, 423K) reports, "The FBI's discovery last summer of an alleged al-Qaeda cell among the Pakistani immigrants in" Lodi "sent a shiver through California's heartland." But now, "the much-ballyhooed case appears enfeebled. Some experts say it fits a pattern of the government overstating the importance of post-9/11 terrorism cases." Lodi City Councilman John Beckman said, "Our confidence in the FBI has been severely shaken. When we look at the totality of the case, a lot of folks here are wondering, Is that all the FBI has?" The Inquirer adds, "Experts say the Lodi case is not unusual. While the Justice Department alleges that 401 people have been charged in 'terrorism-related offenses' since Sept. 11, and 212 have been convicted, analysts say only a handful were proven hard-core terrorists. … But others say it is impossible to measure the deterrent effect of the government's aggressive action against suspects for what appear to be petty offenses such as immigration violations."

Pakistani Man Sentenced To Five Years In Prison For Stinger Missile Plot. The AP (4/4) reports, "A federal judge sentenced a Pakistani man Monday to nearly five years in prison for his admitted role in a drugs-for-weapons plot to sell Stinger anti-aircraft missiles to the Taliban and al-Qaida." Muhamed Abid Afridi "pleaded guilty in March 2004 to one count of conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and one count of conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish." Afridi and codefendants Syed Mustajab Shah and Ilyas Ali – who have pleaded to the charges and still face sentencing – were arrested in 2002 "by police in Hong Kong who received a tip from the FBI. The three were secretly videotaped in meetings days earlier with undercover FBI agents at a Hong Kong hotel."

9/11 Detainee Testifies About Alleged Use Of Dogs At New Jersey Jail. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/4, Duff-Brown) reports, "A Canadian detained in the U.S. with hundreds of Arab or Muslim men after" 9/11 "testified Monday that he was jailed in New Jersey in harsh conditions and terrorized by snarling dogs before being cleared of terrorist links." Akil Sachveda "is one of seven Arab or Muslim men named in the class-action federal lawsuit…against senior U.S. officials, including FBI Director Robert Mueller and former Attorney General John Ashcroft." However, "The Passaic County Sheriff's Department, which runs the jail, said the lawsuit was unjustified and that dogs are only used to sniff out contraband or maintain security." The Canadian Press (4/4) notes Center for Constitutional Rights lawyer Shane Kadidal said, "There's similarities to the systematic abuse at Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib."

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Act Used In Baby Formula Criminal Case. In a lengthy, front-page story, The Wall Street Journal (4/4, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports under the headline "How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man In Baby-Food Ring" about the use of FISA warrants in the investigation and prosecution of Arizona grocery wholesaler Samih Jammal, who was convicted of operating a baby formula theft ring. The Journal notes that Jammal, a "U.S. citizen born in Lebanon, was never charged with any offense related to terrorism. … His case sits on the fine line between the government's responsibility to go all-out to prevent terrorism and its duty to protect the constitutional rights of American citizens accused of crimes. It's a line that has blurred considerably since 9/11 and the 2001 passage of the Patriot Act." Jammal "is appealing, contending that FISA evidence used against him was illegally obtained and crippled his defense. … 'It's baby formula of mass destruction here,' he said at one pretrial hearing."

DOJ_NMG_0025079

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

IG Report Says FBI-Coast Guard Dispute Impedes Maritime Terror Attack Response. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/4, Sherman) reports an analysis by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine released yesterday finds that "squabbling between the Coast Guard and the FBI could lead to confused and potentially disastrous responses to terrorism incidents at sea." The AP notes, "The bickering came to a head in last year's weeklong anti-terrorism drill, TOPOFF 3," when "the FBI wanted to limit the assault to its elite Hostage Rescue Team," but "the Coast Guard ultimately changed the scenario to circumvent the FBI's role as the lead agency, Fine said. A plan released in October that was intended to address the problem does not sufficiently clarify the agencies' roles, Fine said."

The New York Times (4/4, Lipton, 1.19M) notes that the Fine report declares, "The F.B.I. and the Coast Guard both want the ability to respond to terrorist threats in the maritime area. Unless such differences over roles and authorities are resolved, the response to a maritime incident could be confused and potentially disastrous." FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko said, "There is no room for failure. We will resolve this." However, an unnamed "Homeland Security official" said that "the new report might sharpen the disagreement. 'It was written to bolster the F.B.I. argument that they should remain in charge,' the official said."

The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports Fine found that "the FBI has failed to rank U.S. seaports based on the likelihood of terrorist attacks, nor does it always use that basis when assigning agents who specialize in maritime security." Fine "said one FBI field office with six significant seaports in its territory has one maritime liaison agent, while another FBI field office with no strategic ports has five maritime liaison agents. … 'In addition, we found that the FBI database used to collect information on terrorist threats and suspicious incidents at seaports cannot be easily searched to identify trends in maritime-related suspicious activities or threats,' he said. The report, however, praised the FBI's decision to name maritime liaison agents in most of the bureau's 56 field offices to coordinate seaport security with other federal agencies."

Justice Department IG Says US Ports "Largely At Risk." The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports Justice Department IG Glenn A. Fine released a report yesterday, which found that "seaports remain largely at risk" following 9/11. Fine said the FBI failed "to conduct a threat assessment" for US seaports, hampering its "ability to make informed decisions about resource allocation." He "also said the FBI and the U.S. Coast Guard have not resolved issues regarding their overlapping responsibilities, jurisdictions and capabilities to handle a maritime terrorism incident."

GAO Says NRC Weakened Security Regulations After Consulting With Industry. The New York Times (4/4, Wald, 1.19M) reports a GAO report to be released today says that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission "weakened security regulations it had proposed for reactors" after it consulted with the industry. The report says it "created the appearance that the changes were made based on what the industry considered reasonable and feasible to defend against rather than an assessment of the terrorist threat itself," but "stopped short of saying that the commission had made changes 'based solely on industry views.'" Rep. Christopher Shays, who requested the study, said the "findings paint a decidedly mixed picture of nuclear power security today."

In an article that also cites the GAO report, the Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Marks, 61K) reports that the nation's 103 nuclear power plants "are little safer from air attack" than they were before 9/11, according to critics. "And squabbling has set in over what the security standards should be." While some experts say "the current criteria do not require nuclear plants to be protected against a threat equal to the one posed by the 9/11 hijackers," industry "officials counter that nuclear power plants are already the nation's best-protected critical infrastructure." Meanwhile, they are "relying on the Transportation Security Administration" to protect against an aerial attack.

International Student Admissions Rebounding From Post-9/11 Decline. The Des Moines Register (4/3, Livermore, 166K) reported, "More international students are likely to apply to attend graduate school in Iowa and nationwide this year, following a two-year, post-Sept. 11 slump, according to new data from four-year universities." University of Iowa international student office director Scott King "said the shift occurred after university presidents lobbied the federal government to make it easier for foreign students to study in the United States." Iowa State University President Gregory Geoffroy "was among the 15 university presidents who joined the National Security Higher Education Advisory Board, which the FBI said was meant to 'foster cooperation and understanding' between the agency and higher education." Geoffroy said in an interview that the importance of international student admissions "was a major topic we talked about there." He added, "Any time leaders in federal government hear university presidents, particularly with the passion they talk about this issue, it probably has impact collectively when you put it together."

DOJ_NMG_0025080

DHS Official's Testimony On DC Preparedness Criticized. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post's Eric M. Weiss (4/4, A21) writes that the written testimony of DHS' director for national capital region coordination, Thomas J. Lockwood, "last week stands out for its abstruseness." Prepared for "a Senate panel annoyed that there is still no comprehensive strategic plan to protect the region," Lockwood's testimony said emergency response partners "plan to invest in maturing…45 initiatives, focusing on the development of performance measures and timelines to ensure the effective implementation of these initiatives." Weiss continues, "Oh, so is that why, five years after Sept. 11, 2001, Prince George's County emergency officials still do not have radios compatible with the rest of the region? Perhaps it will take more time to mature that initiative."

FBI Interviewing Workers, Contractors At Florida Nuclear Plant. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (4/4, Gardiner, 249K) reports, "FBI agents are interviewing workers and contractors at the Turkey Point power plant this week to figure out who drilled a small hole in a pipe that's part of the cooling system of a nuclear reactor." Florida Power & Light spokeswoman Rachel Scott "said there was no reason for anyone to be working on the drilled pipe. Workers were, however, making repairs in the general area, including jobs like affixing sheet metal that would have required drilling, she said." The Sun-Sentinel adds FBI Special Agent Michael D. Leverock "said it doesn't appear that an outsider breached the power plant's security and gained access inside."

Minnesota Domestic Terror Plot Foiled. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/4, Egerstrom, Hawley) reports, "Authorities have foiled a 'domestic terrorism' plan, recovering a cache of weapons and bomb-making equipment, the Rice County Sheriff's Office said today. … Rice County public officials and buildings were the presumed targets." The Pioneer-Press continues, "The multi-unit South Central Drug Investigation Unit said Allen Weatherford, 44, was arrested Friday on charges of attempted first-degree arson, possession of explosive devices and for being a felon in possession of firearms. … His brother, Mark Weatherford, was already in jail for failing to make a court appearance." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Investigating officers reported finding more than 50 firearms, including a 50-caliber machine gun, in the brothers' rural farm home. They also found propane tanks with a mixture of fuel oil and fertilizer along with detonation devices. … The investigation began last November when authorities in Goodhue County stopped a car and discovered weapons and drugs. That led to a search warrant being issued for a rural Rice County farmstead where Allan Weatherford lived, according to Meredith Erickson, senior assistant county attorney for Rice County. … The Rice County Sheriff's Office said the investigation included the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, the FBI, ATF, Goodhue County and Dodge County sheriff's offices, and Bloomington, Faribault and Northfield police departments."

Cohen Says Hole At Ground Zero Is Bush's Legacy. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (4/4, 744K) that President Bush's legacy "is likely to be where I was Sunday: the immense gash in Lower Manhattan known as Ground Zero. More than 4 1/2 years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the hole has yet to be filled. … The failure to capture or kill bin Laden is the failure of Bush and his Pentagon team of incompetents -- Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the former commander of the Afghan and Iraq wars, Tommy Franks. One is still in office, the other is getting rich on the lecture circuit, and neither offers much of an explanation for why the mass killer of Americans still has not been caught." Cohen says the hole in lower Manhattan is, "by dint of failure, George Bush's presidential library. His proper legacy is a void."

FEMA's Post-Katrina Report Said To Highlight Old Problems. The AP (4/4, Jordan) reports, "An internal FEMA report that calls for urgent reform after Hurricane Katrina outlines old failures the disaster response agency was warned about five months before the storm struck." The Feb. 13 report says the agency "suffered from confusing leadership roles, outdated or inadequate response plans and inexperienced or under-trained staff during Katrina. It also details problems in tracking supplies to disaster sites." FEMA acting director R. David Paulison said that "all post-Katrina reports" are "helpful in rebuilding FEMA," but "acknowledged the government is often slow to revamp itself, comparing the recommendations made after Hurricane Andrew in 1992 to Katrina more than a decade later."

Wolffe Says Brown Replacement Elusive Because Administration Has "Abolished FEMA." On MSNBC's Countdown (4/3, Olbermann), Newsweek's Richard Wolffe was asked about FEMA's inability to find a permanent replacement for former director Michael Brown. Wolffe said, "They've been trying for a long time. Essentially, and the administration won't say this, but they've abolished FEMA. They want people to go through Chertoff, and anyone who's worth their salt doesn't want do that. They want to maintain the good jobs they have in their home states and they don't want to just become middle-management in the bureaucracy." Olbemann: "Well, that Homeland-FEMA dyad worked so well last Fall."

Race Seen As Dominant Issue In New Orleans Mayoral Primary. The New York Times (4/4, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that race has taken the place of reconstruction

DOJ_NMG_0025081

as the "dominant motif" in New Orleans' April 22 mayoral primary. "This year, the three major candidates or their supporters have aligned themselves along racial lines, with each camp hoping it has singled out the correct, and as yet unknown, demographic." Meanwhile, "Tough discussions about whether some neighborhoods should not be rebuilt or whether the city should issue far fewer building permits have been largely absent. Even contemplating such notions publicly is considered a political kiss of death."

Red Cross To Overhaul Financial Operations After Katrina Debacle. NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The American Red Cross today said it will overhaul the way it handles future disasters after criticism from its post-Katrina performance. They will funnel money to other charities when it needs to and crack down internally on waste and abuse."

Future Of New Orleans Neighborhoods Said To Depend On "Bargain Seekers." The Washington Post (4/4, A3, Whoriskey, 744K) reports, "The future of New Orleans's flood-ravaged neighborhoods may depend" on "bargain seekers to invest and renovate." Though "some blocks" are dotted with "For Sale" and "For Sale by Owner" signs, "most houses offer no clues at all to the owners' plans for the vacant properties. Still, for those with faith in the city's future and a willingness to live in largely abandoned, low-lying neighborhoods, the areas are not without appeal. They are bargains."

Indonesian Tsunami Survivors Volunteering Along Gulf Coast. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Axtman, 61K) reports on "eight Indonesian tsunami survivors and aid workers who, having witnessed international relief firsthand, are now reciprocating with some of their own" along the Gulf Coast. They "have found common ground with those they aid." Novianus Patanduka said that seeing what happened during Katrina "really affected our hearts," but added that one "can't compare the suffering of Katrina with the suffering of the tsunami. Here, even the poorest people still have cars beside their [government- provided] trailers. When you go out into the most devastated parts of Indonesia, all the people have is their own physical strength.'"

Undocumented Workers Said To Play Vital Role In Rebuilding New Orleans. Under the headline "Migrants Find a Gold Rush in New Orleans," the Los Angeles Times (4/4, Quinones, 958K) reports that as the floodwaters receded from New Orleans following Hurricane Katrina, "Word…spread throughout the Latino immigrant diaspora in America that the city had plenty of work, construction wages had doubled to $16 an hour and no one was asking for papers." John Logan, a Brown University demographer, says "there must be 10,000 to 20,000 immigrant workers in the region by now, and the number is going to grow." The Times adds, "As the Senate debates new immigration laws and marchers demonstrate across the country, these immigrants offer another reminder of the country's reliance on undocumented labor from Latin America."

WAR NEWS:

Rice, Straw Press Iraqis To Form Government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw made an unannounced visit to Baghdad over the weekend to urge squabbling Iraqi politicians to form a government of national unity. NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 5, 2:30, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "The message was blunt, the meetings tense. They made it clear, interim leader Ibrahim al-Jafari must be replaced by a strong prime minister to control the militias who've been killing civilians." For the "first time, Rice spent the night in Iraq, even as a mortar hit nearby. Critics say more than tough talk is needed to avoid all out civil war." Tonight, "it appears that Rice's message may have gotten through. Iraq's major Shiite party may back a stronger leader."

ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 5, :10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "In Baghdad, today, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw ended a surprise visit by pressing Iraqi leaders to stop bickers and agree on a new government."

The AP (4/4, Gearan) reports, "The US and Britain expect Iraq to quickly restrain militias and unify around a stable government," Secretary Rice "and her British counterpart said Monday in a visit meant to resonate both in Iraq and at home. Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions over two days of unusually hard-edged diplomacy. Rice stayed overnight to make the point that security is improving despite relentless violence that has eroded public support in the US for a war now in its fourth year." The Secretary is quoted saying, "First and foremost, the purpose of this trip is to encourage and to urge the Iraqis to do what the Iraqis must do because the Iraqi people deserve it. But yes, the American people, the British people...need to know that everything is being done to keep progress moving." Rice and Straw "repeated a strong message that the next government has to curb the power of sectarian militias, which are blamed for much of the current wave of reprisal killings among Shiites and Sunnis."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Daragahi, 958K) reports that Rice and Straw "attempted to placate the fears of the country's Shiite Muslim majority in anticipation of the likely ouster of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari. … But the soothing words came amid a concerted effort on the part of the U.S. and Britain as well as Iraq's Sunni Arabs, Kurds and a growing chorus of Jafari's erstwhile Shiite allies to convince the leader to step aside."

DOJ_NMG_0025082

The Washington Times (4/4, Kralev, 90K) reports that Rice and Straw "made clear in private, as well as in public, that Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari should step aside to clear the way for another Shi'ite candidate who would be more acceptable to the Sunnis and Kurds."

In Diplomatic Travels, Rice And Straw "Rub Off On Each Other." In a profile piece titled "On The Road With Condi and Jack," the Washington Post (4/4, A19, Kessler, 744K) writes, "Combining hard-nosed foreign initiatives with tourism and local politicking, the diplomatic duo has bounced across Europe and the Middle East, personifying the 'special relationship' between their countries. … They are a bit of an odd couple: an elegantly dressed African American woman who grew up in the segregated South and a plain blue-suit-and-tie Englishman who carries a red wooden box as a briefcase. … Aides say they genuinely like each other and -- unlike many high-powered figures -- don't seem to get on each other's nerves. Straw is the only foreign minister Rice will regularly pick up the phone and call, rather than having the State Department operations center arrange the conversation." The Post goes on to say that Rice believes "that time spent overseas helps build personal relationships that can pay off later in diplomacy. Although the British and the Americans are close allies on many matters, they have policy disputes" including Gitmo and global warming. The Post also reports that "by the end of trip, the two would sometimes finish each other's sentences and even had begun to rub off on each other."

WPost Says Administration Must Keep Pushing For Political Accord In Iraq. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/4, A22, 744K) says the Bush Administration has been "curiously passive" about the "evident inability of Iraqi leaders" to forge a political accord, noting, "At last, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared in the Green Zone on Sunday, five months after her previous visit, and teamed with British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw to drive home the message that, as she put it, 'if this vacuum of power continues' violence will spiral beyond all control." The Post adds that the Bush Administration "has no choice but to keep pressing for a political accord. The question remains whether other outside influence can be brought to bear. … In other crises the United States has used 'contact groups' of interested powers to apply pressure. In Iraq's circumstances such remedies are more difficult. Still, they ought to be tried."

More Commentary. In a his column today in the Washington Post (4/4, A23, 744K), Eugene Robinson writes, "Condoleezza Rice made a surprise trip to Baghdad over the weekend to advance the Fairy Tale Doctrine, pressuring Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to stop all the maneuvering and go ahead and form a government, preferably one that doesn't make it a crime to be Sunni Muslim. You see, if only the Iraqis can put together a government, everything will be just fine. Okay, she didn't quite say that all would be sweetness and light. But by jetting to Baghdad without telling anybody in advance, taking along British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw and freezing al-Jafari with her most intimidating Ice Queen faux-smile, she clearly reinforced the administration's view that cobbling together a new government is the next magic bullet that is going to rescue the Iraq adventure from an utter debacle."

DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) that as "pressure mounts on the president to explain why U.S. forces remain in Iraq as that fractured country slips deeper into civil war, Bush increasingly offers up the need to democratize the world as his raison d'être for hanging on in Iraq. In other words, Iraq is the Khyber Pass of the president's defense of America. It's the passageway through which he wants us to believe freedom must flow to the rest of the world." Wickham adds, "Democracy is no magic potion for the bad behavior of people who have little tolerance for it. That's a very painful reality that President Bush must someday face."

Wehner Says War Critics Have Offered No Alternative To Bush "Freedom Agenda." Peter Wehner, deputy assistant to the President and director of the White House's Office of Strategic Initiatives, writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M), "A small group of current and former conservatives…have become harsh critics of the Iraq war," suggesting "that it is a failure and the president's effort to promote liberty in the Middle East is dead." Critics of the Iraq war "have offered no serious strategic alternative to the president's freedom agenda, which is anchored in the belief that democracy and liberal institutions are the best antidote to the pathologies plaguing the Middle East." Wehner adds, "In Iraq, we are witnessing advancements and some heartening achievements. … The process of democratic reform has begun, and now would be precisely the wrong time to lose our nerve and turn our back on the freedom agenda. It would be a geopolitical disaster and a moral calamity -- and President Bush, like President Reagan before him, will persist in his efforts to shape a more hopeful world."

Zarqawi Reportedly Replaced As Head Of Al Qaeda In Iraq. A leading Islamist says al Qaeda militant Abu Musab Zarqawi has been replaced as head of al Qaeda in Iraq in order to put an Iraqi figure at head of the group's struggle. The Washington Times (4/4, Sands, 90K) reports, "But terrorism specialists were divided on whether the move represented a demotion for the figure most closely identified with a wave of suicide bombings and beheadings or a move by Zarqawi to focus his efforts on a larger regional war." The Times adds, "Reports that Zarqawi had been shunted aside are 'nothing we can verify,' Lt. Col. Barry Johnson told reporters in Baghdad yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0025083

US Troops In Iraq Try To Bring Iraqi Forces Up To Speed. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Levinson, 61K) reports that US military efforts to train Iraqi police and military have had "mixed" results. According to the Monitor, "the Brookings Institution reports [of] a total 241,700 Iraqi enlistees, only 54,000 of those troops are considered capable of operating independently from Coalition units. The remaining soldiers must fight alongside coalition forces." The article notes that "even the smallest US transfers of authority have had discouraging results."

Iraqi Civilians Attempt To Provide Own Security. With Iraqis being targeted at an "unprecedented rate," USA Today (4/4, Frank, 2.31M) reports that civilians, wary of "the ability of police to and soldiers to protection," are "attempting to provide their own security, relying on neighbors and family or hiring armed guards. … Convinced that Iraqi police and soldiers can do little to protect them, residents are arming and organizing, often in elaborate ways, to provide their own safety."

Thirteen US Troops Killed In Iraq Over Weekend. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 4, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Five Marines were killed and three others went missing after their truck rolled over in a flash flood. At least eight other US service members have been killed since Saturday."

The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 4, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "April is off to a costly start for US forces in Iraq. The military reports at least 13 Americans now killed this weekend, most of them yesterday in Anbar Province, which is west of Baghdad. Three Marines and a Navy sailor were killed in combat." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 4, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported the "US death toll has been heavy over the past two days."

The New York Times (4/4, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "Three marines and one sailor were killed on Sunday in the rebel assault, the military reported, offering no further information. It was the largest number of American deaths in a single attack in more than a month. In another part of Anbar on Sunday, a flash flood toppled a seven-ton truck, killing five marines riding inside it and wounding one, the military said. Two marines and one Navy corpsman in the truck were missing, officials said."

The Washington Post (4/4, A19, Finer, Fekeiki, 744K) reports, "The deaths came two days after a month in which there were 32 U.S. military fatalities, the lowest monthly figure since early 2004. At least 13 Americans have been killed already in April."

Wounded Soldiers Feel "Sense Of Unease" Upon Return To US. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Zucchino, 958K) reports. "When the wounded come home from Iraq, nothing is as it once was. They look different, of course -- pocked with shrapnel scars and surgical incisions, sore and tentative, and carrying the memory of that moment, just before the blast or bullet, when they were still whole. … Aggressive and driven in Iraq, the wounded become dependent and distracted back home. Hometowns and living rooms feel different. Friends have moved away. Children have grown. Iraq was terrifying and dangerous, but it became fulfilling and familiar. The wounded are relieved to be back with their families. Though thankful to be alive, they're burdened by a sense of unease."

CSMonitor Editor Thanks FBI, Military For Work To Free Carroll. The New York Times (4/4, Zezima, 1.19M) reports that former hostage Jill Carroll visited the Christian Science Monitor newsroom. Monitor Editor Richard Bergenheim thanked the US embassy in Baghdad for working "with a passion" to free Carroll. The Times reports that he also "thanked the FBI…and the military." An anonymous official "said the American hostage working group in Baghdad assisted with Ms. Carroll's case." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 6, 2:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported that she has "been given a staff job at the Monitor, and according to representatives from the paper, she already has several book offers." However, the CBS Evening News (4/3, story 3, 0:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reports that Carroll "has no immediate plans to discuss her ordeal in public."

New Documents Slow Australian Oil-For-Food Probe. The New York Times (4/4, Bonner, 1.19M) reports that Australia's wheat-exporting giant AWB supplied "over six volumes of documents" to lawyers investigating whether it "paid $200 million in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein under the United Nations oil-for-food program." Hearings are now 13 weeks old. Emerging intelligence papers show "that as far back as 1998, Australian intelligence agencies had been told that [a Jordanian company receiving payments from AWB] was a front for the Iraqi government and was being used to violate United Nations sanctions against Baghdad."

Skeptics Question Fugitive Kurdish Writer's Plight. The New York Times (4/4, Worth, 1.19M) reports that a controversial Kurdish author "says he has been receiving death threats by phone since January, when his new book on sex and Islam touched off angry street demonstrations in several Kurdish cities in Iraq." However, others accuse Mariwan Halabjayi of being a "publicity hound." The Times says that "Islamist political leaders deny that they ever threatened him and say they see him as a publicity-hungry clown, not a dangerous blasphemer. Even some secular figures say Mr. Halabjayi's book…may have been a ploy to get political asylum in Europe."

DOJ_NMG_0025084

Allen Advocates Boykin For Special Operations Command. The AP (4/4, Sidoti) reports that Sen. George Allen wants "Lt. Gen. William G. (Jerry) Boykin, currently the Pentagon's deputy undersecretary for intelligence," to replace the retiring head of the US Special Operations Command. Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, stated, "This officer would not be among those whom I would recommend for this position." Gen. Boykin aroused controversy in 2003 with "speeches at evangelical Christian churches in which he painted the war on terror as a Christian fight against Satan and suggested that Muslims worship idols."

DOJ:

Card, Gonzales, Other Top Bush Aides Spotted At DC Restaurant. The New York Daily News (4/4, Grove, 729K) reports in its "Lowdown" column, "Note to former White House Chief of Staff Andy Card: Next time you and your high-powered pals want to have a private dinner at a D.C. restaurant — as you did Saturday night with Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez, FBI Director Robert Mueller and former FEMA chief Joe Albaugh and your wives at the Mexican eatery Lauriol Plaza — make sure the dark-suited Secret Service guys at the next table at least order guacamole and chips. Then again, they probably won't be there next time."

DOJ Privacy Officer To Launch Panel. Government Executive (4/4, Pulliam) reports, "The Justice Department's recently arrived chief privacy officer said in an interview Monday she plans to launch an internal privacy and civil liberties board in two weeks." GE continues, "The board will be made up of director or deputy director-level officials and will address the broad range of privacy issues that confront the department, said Jane Horvath, who assumed her job as the department's first chief privacy and civil liberties officer on Feb. 21. … Horvath told Government Executive that her 'first and primary responsibility is to ensure that the department ensures the civil liberties of the American people.' … She said she is working out her relationship with the department's Inspector General's Office to determine what types of privacy complaints she will receive, adding that she anticipates she'll handle broad, issue-related problems rather than complaints from individuals. … Horvath also plans to address Justice's use of commercial data for finding terrorists and standards for and oversight of mass data collection." GE adds, "Her official duties include reviewing and overseeing the department's privacy operations, developing Justice's privacy policies and ensuring the compliance of privacy impact assessments, known as PIAs. Horvath also serves on the department's Data Integrity Board and its document committee."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Defense Begins To Present Case. The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Johnson) reports, "Lawyers for former Enron Corp. executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling began presenting their defense against fraud charges Monday without the lead lawyer for Lay, who was preparing for a second round of surgery to alleviate a heart condition." The Post continues, "Kicking off the 10th week of the trial, the defense teams jointly called witnesses designed to advance their argument that no fraud took place at the Houston energy company. One of the case's most anticipated witnesses, Skilling, could begin to testify as early as Thursday, lawyers said." The Post adds, "In perhaps the most powerful testimony of the day, former executive assistant Joannie Williamson said she believed that her friend, then-investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, had pleaded guilty to spare his family and reduce his prison sentence. Under questioning by defense lawyer Chip B. Lewis, Williamson recounted that Koenig called her in August 2004, hours after his plea to aiding and abetting securities fraud. … 'He said, "I'm not guilty, but in order for this to work, everyone needs to believe that,"' Williamson testified. … Defense lawyers contend that many of the 16 former Enron employees who pleaded guilty did so under pressure from law enforcement authorities and under fear of the onerous federal sentencing guidelines." The Post notes, "On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn H. Ruemmler stressed Williamson's close and ongoing relationship with both defendants. Lay, for instance, offered to pay the witness's legal fees, and Skilling socializes with her and others once a week, the prosecutor said."

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, McWilliams) reports, "The defense in the trial of two former top Enron Corp. executives struggled on its first day, as a defense witness backed down from earlier claims and a lead defense attorney was hospitalized for the second time in two weeks." The Journal continues, "It was a modest start to the defense's case that there was no wrongdoing at the energy company, apart from thefts by a few subordinates, and underscored the central role of testimony by the two former top executives in their defense. Former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling may testify as early as tomorrow, much earlier than had been expected." The Journal notes, "In an unexpected twist on the proceedings, Mr. Lay's 65-year-old lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, is scheduled to undergo surgery today that could remove him from the defense team. Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are to evaluate a stent that was installed slightly more than a week ago. … Despite the procedure, Mr. Ramsey returned quickly to court. Now, however, there 'appears to be some difficulty with the stent,' a spokeswoman for Mr. Lay said in a statement yesterday. … Mr. Ramsey's health situation is a setback for Mr. Lay. Mr. Ramsey has long been one of the best-known criminal defense attorneys in Texas, bringing a down-home but aggressive demeanor to the courtroom that has helped him win difficult cases -- including the acquittal of a man who had been charged with murdering and dismembering a man."

DOJ_NMG_0025085

The Houston Chronicle (4/4, Flood) reports, "Williamson testified that she thinks her friend Koenig succumbed to pressure, though she acknowledged on cross-examination by prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler that Koenig never said he was pressured. … This testimony follows a main defense theme — that many witnesses who testified against Skilling and Lay were coerced by the government into pleading guilty and are just saying what prosecutors wanted to hear. … Lay and Skilling argue there was no conspiracy. They say Enron was in good shape, but the lack of confidence engendered by revelations about thieving by ex-CFO Andrew Fastow and his cohorts caused a 'run on the bank.'"

Former Westar Executives Sentenced. The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Masters) reports, "The former chief executive of Westar Energy Inc. was sentenced yesterday to 18 years in prison for his role in a corporate looting case known in some circles as 'the Enron of Kansas.'" The Post continues, "David C. Wittig, 50, and the utility's onetime top dealmaker Douglas T. Lake, 55, were convicted in September of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing internal controls at the Topeka, Kan., utility. … U.S. District Judge Julie Robinson sentenced Lake to 15 years and ordered each man to pay $5 million in fines plus restitution. The two have already been ordered to forfeit more than $53 million to Westar." The Post adds, "Wittig's sentence is one of the longest handed down in a major white-collar fraud case and reflects the government's increasingly harsh reaction to corporate malfeasance. … Former WorldCom Inc. chief executive Bernard J. Ebbers received 25 years for his role in that telecommunications firm's massive accounting fraud, but most other fallen corporate titans have received less. … Under the federal sentencing guidelines, each man had faced as much as life in prison, but their lawyers argued that such a punishment would be unduly harsh."

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Smith) reports, "The charges stemmed from a series of transactions initiated by Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake, 55, shortly after Mr. Wittig joined Westar in 1995. Among the specific allegations were improper use of the company's aircraft and arranging for increases to his own compensation without normal board knowledge or approval. … Mr. Wittig assumed Westar's helm in 1998 to help the Topeka, Kan., utility develop a growth strategy that would enable it to take advantage of deregulation of the electric industry. But prosecutors later said, and a federal jury agreed, that Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake instead found ways to abuse their positions of trust to pad their own wallets through schemes that circumvented the normal board approval process."

Refco Shareholders Consolidate Suits. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Mollenkamp, McDonald, McKay) reports, "A consolidated lawsuit filed by Refco Inc. shareholders and bondholders claims the commodity-brokerage firm used 10 transactions totaling more than $5 billion -- far more extensive than previously thought -- to keep hundreds of millions of dollars of losses off its books." The Journal continues, "The lawsuit, a roll-up of more than a dozen shareholder actions previously brought, was filed yesterday in federal court in New York. It alleges Refco executives were so intent on launching Refco's initial public offering of stock last August that they ignored complaints about lax executive oversight. The suit also alleges negligence on the part of the collapsed company's auditor and investment bankers." The Journal adds, "As previously reported, when Refco in October revealed former Chief Executive Phillip R. Bennett had hidden about $430 million in bad debts, customers rushed to get their money back, ultimately forcing the firm to seek bankruptcy protection. … The shareholder suit seeks class-action status. When the earlier suits were filed, U.S. District Judge Gerard E. Lynch consolidated them into one and appointed lead counsel to file one complaint."

HealthSouth Pays Out Hefty Legal Fees. The Fulton County Daily Report (4/4, Peters) reports, "HealthSouth Corp. has helped lots of lawyers become more prosperous in recent years. … The Birmingham, Ala., company expects eventually to pay a total of about $147 million in legal fees for litigation expenses incurred since 2003, according to the company's annual report, which was filed last Wednesday." The Report continues, "In March 2003, federal prosecutors launched a fraud case against the company and its founder and former CEO, Richard M. Scrushy. Since then, HealthSouth has paid to defend itself in that criminal case, as well as civil cases filed in federal and state courts by the company's shareholders, bondholders, auditors and employees. … Some Atlanta law firms got in on the action, including Alston & Bird; Parker, Hudson, Rainer & Dobbs; and the Atlanta office of Jones Day." The Report adds, "HealthSouth's legal bills are comparable to other U.S. corporations that have found themselves in trouble with federal regulators in recent years, said Ron Peppe, a vice president at the Washington-based Association of Corporate Counsel. … HealthSouth already has paid some of the $147 million total, Peppe said. It has put the rest in reserve, with the expectation that it will eventually need to pay the full amount. The final total could end up being less, but $147 million is probably a good estimate, he said."

DOJ_NMG_0025086

CRIMINAL LAW:

Capitol Police Seek Arrest Warrant For McKinney. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Blitzer) reported, "CNN has confirmed from Federal law enforcement officials that Capitol Police are asking Federal prosecutors to issue an arrest warrant for Democratic Congresswoman Cynthia McKinney of Georgia. They filed a complaint stemming from an incident last week between the Georgia Democrat and a Capitol police officer as she tried to enter a House office building without a lapel pin that identifies her as a member of the United States Congress." The AP (4/4, Kellman) reports "a spokesman for U.S. Attorney Kenneth L. Wainstein said he was reviewing the merits of the case. 'We are working with Capitol Hill police to fully understand and appreciate the incident,' principal assistant US Attorney Channing Phillips told The Associated Press in a telephone interview."

The Washington Post (4/4, A4, Wilber, 744K) reports McKinney "expressed regret for the incident but has not apologized. She has said she expects to be exonerated once the case is fully reviewed. At a news conference last week, she said the officer touched her inappropriately. Her lawyers said McKinney, who is black, was the victim of racial profiling." Last night McKinney appeared on CNN's The Situation Room (4/3), where she said, "The bottom line on this is that it doesn't matter if you're in the United States Capitol or the Georgia Capitol, the issue is racial profiling." Asked if the allegation that she struck a Capitol Police officer are true, McKinney said that "if you would look, you would find that even inside the Capitol Hill Police Department there are problems inside with the treatment of -- or the respect for diversity, let me say."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/4, Kemper, Reid, 430K) says "a security video shows McKinney entering the building and moving around the metal detector and X-ray machine." However, it does not show her encounter with the police officer, according to officials familiar with it." But Fox News' Special Report (4/3, Wilson) reported "Capitol Hill law enforcement officials with knowledge of the investigation say they have built, quote, a very solid case against McKinney. A highly placed source tells Fox News numerous witnesses gave sworn statements that they saw McKinney aggressively punch the officer's badge with her cell phone after the officer asked her to stop at a House office building security check point and produce identification. Officials were close to dismissing the matter after McKinney initially offered regret for the incident but reconsidered late Friday after she held a press conference with high profile activist Danny Glover and Harry Belafonte."

The Hill (4/4, Hearn) says the "bizarre scuffle" between McKinney "and an unnamed US Capitol Police officer is winning the spirited congresswoman few new friends in her caucus. In fact, some Democrats are trying to distance themselves from her." McKinney "has been aggressively publicizing the incident, calling press conferences on each of the past two business days and even attracting a mention on the front page of The New York Times, something that the dozens of House and Senate Democrats combined couldn't match when they unveiled their homeland-security plan last week." Now, "with McKinney facing a possible arrest warrant, the media frenzy is set only to escalate. … All of the attention has some Democrats concerned that McKinney is drawing the limelight away from their policy goals and Republicans' ethical missteps to focus on a momentary, disputed encounter in a Capitol Hill hallway."

USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) and Roll Call (4/4, McArdle), among other sources, run similar accounts this morning. The New York Times (4/4, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports McKinney "has raised the issue of racial bias in the past. In her first term in Congress in 1993, she publicly complained about a confrontation with an elevator operator who she said initially assumed she could not be a member of Congress because of her appearance and race. (Ms. McKinney acknowledges that her attire is unusual, especially her gold cowboy boots and running shoes.)" In her 1996 campaign for reelection, she "called her opponents 'a rag-tag group of neo-Confederates.' She has also said she complained to President Bill Clinton of 'disparate treatment' at two White House events during his administration because of her race."

McKinney Used Taxpayer Funds To Fly Singer To Georgia. Roll Call (4/4, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) has admitted to breaking government rules by using taxpayer money to fly singer Isaac Hayes to Georgia to help dedicate a new office, according to a report Monday afternoon by Channel 2 Action News in Atlanta. McKinney's office, according to the report, says it will reimburse the Congressional fund for the cost of Hayes' flight and hotel room."

Director Charged In Pellicano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Krikorian) reports, "Top Hollywood movie director John McTiernan has been charged with lying to FBI investigators about his relationship with a private detective charged with illegal wiretapping, officials announced today." The Times continues, "McTiernan directed Arnold Schwarzenegger in the 1987 movie "Predator," which was nominated for an Academy Award for special effects. McTiernan is by far the most prominent entertainment figure to be criminally charged in the ongoing investigation into the tactics used by Anthony Pellicano, the private detective employed by many Hollywood figures before he was convicted of possessing an explosive device. He is now awaiting trial on illegal wiretapping charges. … McTiernan, 55, also directed 'Die Hard,' 'The Last Action Hero,' 'The Hunt for Red October,' and 'Rollerball.' McTiernan's alleged crime occurred on Feb. 13 during an interview with FBI agents, according to the charges filed by federal prosecutors in Los Angeles. … 'McTiernan claimed that he had no knowledge of any wiretapping conducted by Anthony Pellicano and had never discussed wiretapping with Anthony Pellicano, when in fact, as defendant McTiernan knew, he had hired and paid Anthony Pellicano to conduct a wiretap,' according to the charges."

DOJ_NMG_0025087

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Marr) reports, "Mr. McTiernan is charged with making a false, fictitious and fraudulent material statement. The accusation of lying in an FBI interview could rattle nerves in Hollywood, where numerous lawyers and executives have been questioned by the FBI or appeared before a federal grand jury in regards to the investigation of Mr. Pellicano. … The investigation into Mr. Pellicano kicked off in 2002 when the FBI raided his Sunset Boulevard offices and found explosives and grenades, which led to a 30-month prison sentence. … The FBI also confiscated numerous computer files that provided a web of leads in their investigation into Mr. Pellicano's tactics as Hollywood's top private detective, according to court documents."

Viacom Chiefs Back Grey As Pellicano Probe Widens. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Eller, Hofmeister) reports, "Viacom Inc.'s top brass gave Brad Grey, chief executive of Paramount Motion Picture Group, a vote of confidence Monday despite the unwanted attention the studio is getting from his links to indicted private investigator Anthony Pellicano." The times continues, "In their first interview on the subject, Viacom Chairman Sumner Redstone and CEO Tom Freston said Grey's ties to Pellicano were fully examined by the company before he joined the studio more than a year ago. They said they remained comfortable with their decision to tap the former talent manager to turn around the lagging studio. … Freston, who personally selected Grey for the job, said that before he was hired, Grey was 'totally upfront' about his involvement with Pellicano. Grey's attorney, Bertram Fields, had hired the investigator to work on two high-profile lawsuits brought against Grey by his former client Garry Shandling and 'Scary Movie' executive producer Bo Zenga. … Grey informed his prospective bosses that he had testified twice before the grand jury as a witness in the Pellicano matter and had been questioned by the FBI. … In addition, Freston said, Viacom did its homework, largely through conversations between Viacom General Counsel Michael Fricklas and Grey's personal attorney, Ron Olson."

Jury Hears Closing Arguments In "Mafia Cops" Trial. The AP (4/4) reports, "Two ex-police detectives betrayed their badges by becoming hired guns for the Mafia, a prosecutor said Monday during closing arguments at their federal racketeering trial." The AP continues, "Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa 'led double lives,' helping unleash a wave of violence that left eight people dead, prosecutor Daniel Wenner told the jury. … 'They gathered and sold information to the mob. They kidnapped for the mob. They murdered for the mob,' Wenner said. … The prosecutor described the case as 'the bloodiest, most violent betrayal of the badge this city has ever seen.'" The AP notes, "Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, countered by accusing the government of using the testimony of a convicted drug dealer, a gangster and an embezzler to frame an honest crime fighter. … The witnesses 'have conned people their whole lives,' he said." The AP adds, "Authorities allege Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were involved in eight slayings between 1986 and 1990 while on the payroll both of the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso."

Newsday (4/4, DeStefano) reports, "Tacitly acknowledging a five-year statute of limitations issue that could still derail the government's case, Wenner argued that the criminal conspiracy…continued almost up to the time both defendants were arrested in March 2005. Proof of that, he said, was in the fact that Eppolito and Caracappa lived across the street from each other in Las Vegas," so that "Caracappa could keep an eye on Eppolito and make sure he didn't weaken and expose their crimes, Wenner argued. He also said a drug deal they allegedly took part in during late 2004 put the case within the statute of limitations." Caracappa co-counsel Rae Koshetz "stressed the limitation period in her closing statement, saying the government tried to dress up a stale case by pulling in evidence of a small drug deal for Ecstasy that had no relationship to the conspiracy." The New York Daily News (4/4, Smith, 729K) adds that "star witness" Burton Kaplan "was billed as the man who could put the so-called Mafia Cops away for life," and Wenner said yesterday that he "lived up to his billing." The Eppolito and Caracappa lawyers "contend that Kaplan made up the whole crazy conspiracy to get out of prison before he dies of old age. But Wenner argued that Kaplan…couldn't have made up all the damning details." The New York Post (4/4, Haberman, 624K) also reports on the closing arguments under the headline "'Blood Traitors To NYPD Badge.'"

California Men Plead Guilty To Operating Massive Music, Software Piracy Ring. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/4, Estrella) reports Ye Teng Wen and Hao He of Union City, Calif., "pleaded guilty on Monday to producing 200,000 pirated copies of music and software compact discs, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. … Many of the items contained counterfeit FBI anti-piracy seals and silk-screened artwork that made them appear legitimate, according to the U.S. Attorney for Northern California." The Chronicle notes, "In October, the FBI raided 13 locations in California and Texas and seized 494,000 pirated CDs, DVDs and software in the country's largest manufacturing piracy seizure to date, according to the Recording Industry Association of America." The San Jose Mercury News (4/4, Ackerman, 268K) adds that Wen and He were arrested "as part of an undercover operation code-named 'Remaster.' … Speaking at a press conference Monday afternoon, officials said the manufacturing operation…may have produced as many as 12 million pirated CDs. They called it the largest manufacturing operation of its kind uncovered in the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0025088

The AP (4/4) reports, "Wen and He admitted to mass producing nearly 200,000 pirated music and software CDs, many of which contained counterfeit anti-piracy seals from the FBI and silk screened artwork to make the merchandise appear legitimate, the U.S. Attorney said. The pirated works mainly involved Latin music artists and Symantec Corp.'s Norton anti-virus software." Bay City News Wires (4/3) also notes that "they pleaded guilty to counterfeiting the FBI's own anti-piracy seal on the counterfeit music discs."

Former Nevada Commissioner, Exotic Dancers Testify About Alleged Bribes. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/3, Allen) reports, "Seven witnesses were called to the stand Monday in the political corruption case against former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. Each told the jury the two had connections to strip club owner Mike Galardi." Former Commissioner Erin Kenny "told the jury Herrera was arrogant and she believed he was taking Galardi bribes. … But later, Kenny admitted while she believed both were taking bribes, she has no proof they did. Next, the prosecution called two former dancers from Galardi's strip club who testified they received money from Galardi and his associates. One received $400 to give Herrera an hour's worth of lap dances. The other received $400 to perform a sex act on Herrera."

Judge Orders Release Of FBI Surveillance Transcripts. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/3, Allen) also reports, "In response to a request from several media outlets, Judge Larry Hicks ordered transcripts of FBI wiretaps be released to the media. The actual audio recordings may not be released; federal prosecutors say developing a system to copy the wiretaps would interfere with their trial preparation."

Judge Rejects Plea Agreement In Philadelphia Ticket-Fixing Probe. The Philadelphia Daily News (4/4, Hinkelman) reports US District Judge Norma L. Shapiro "refused to accept the guilty plea yesterday of a former city hearing officer accused of fixing Philadelphia parking tickets in exchange for $200 in cash and $169 worth of concert tickets to see Prince." Molden David Faison was charged "with one count of attempted Hobbs Act extortion," but Shapiro "said she was not convinced that Faison was guilty of the charge." The person from whom Faison allegedly took the bribe "was identified in court yesterday as John Florio, who later became an FBI informant in the investigation of Faison. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Judy Smith said the FBI audio tapes 'clearly' would show that Faison believed Florio was 'acting as an agent' on behalf of the plumbing company when he gave Faison the concert tickets even though it was part of an FBI sting. But Shapiro wasn't convinced."

Mariano Surrenders City-Owned Vehicle. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/4, Schaffer, 423K) reports, "Rick Mariano won't be able to drive to prison in his city-owned car. The Philadelphia city councilman…has turned in" his official vehicle. "Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said the decision was part of the councilman's move to keep a lower profile following his fraud, bribery, and money laundering convictions." McCalla said, "This is just another step along the line which began when he relinquished his leadership positions." But he "said that line would not include Mariano's early resignation from his $102,000-per-year post."

Connecticut Mob Boss Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison. The AP (4/4, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Janet Bond Arterton in New Haven, Conn., yesterday sentenced Gambino underboss Anthony Megale "to 86 months in prison. Megale admitted that from 2002 to 2004 he and others extorted $2,000 monthly payments from a Stamford strip club owner. He was caught on FBI recordings setting up the payments and predicting dire consequences if the club owner could not pay." The AP notes, "Megale was among 11 people arrested on charges stemming from an investigation in which an undercover FBI agent infiltrated the mob for three years, authorities said. Faced with a trial that would allow hours of secretly recorded FBI tapes into evidence, one defendant after another pleaded guilty."

Mexican Police Arrest Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer. The Albuquerque Tribune (4/4, Shepard) reports Mexican federal police yesterday arrested Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in New Mexico for the murders of sheriff's deputy James McGrane and Candido Ray Martinez. "More than 10 law enforcement agencies and more than 250 agents poured into the East Mountains, searching homes, woods and vehicles. … The manhunt drummed up more than 1,000 tips." On Saturday, "the reward for information leading to Astorga's capture was hiked to from $50,000 to $130,000," and he "was placed on the FBI's top 10 'Most Wanted' list." FBI Albuquerque SAC Tom McClenaghan "said his team will look into who, if anybody, deserves reward money." The AP (4/4, Mygatt) also notes Astorga "was placed on the FBI's list of Top 10 most-wanted fugitives." Bernalillo County Sheriff Darren White said, "Currently, we have a team of detectives in El Paso waiting to work with FBI agents who are also in that area to work on the extradition of Astorga." He added, "This was a true team effort."

DOJ_NMG_0025089

Virginia Executives Sentenced To Prison, Fines For Contract Fraud. WVEC-TV Norfolk (3/31) reported, "Officials with two Hampton Roads companies were sentenced and fined for defrauding the government to get set-aside contracts for minority-owned companies. The presidents of ACS Environmental, Inc. of Chesapeake and Air Power Enterprises, Inc. of Portsmouth pleaded guilty last June to buying false training certificates for their employees working in the asbestos, lead abatement, and hazardous waste industries." WVEC adds, "James Schaubach, president of ACS and vice president of Air Power, was sentenced to 21 months in prison, to be followed by 3 years of supervised release and fined $1.5 million. … Nicanor Lotuaco, president of Air Power, was sentenced on Jan. 26, 2006 to five months in jail, followed by five months home detention and three years supervised release, and fined $1 million."

Teenage Girl Charged In Shooting Of Baltimore Officer. The Baltimore Sun (4/4, Jones) reports, "A 17-year-old girl suspected of masterminding an attempted robbery-turned-shooting of a Baltimore police officer was arrested Monday and charged with helping another man set up the ambush in the Westport neighborhood, according to city prosecutors and a police source." The Sun continues, "Brittany Johnson was charged as an adult with attempted murder, armed robbery and several handgun violations, court documents say. She went before a District Court commissioner and was ordered held without bail pending a formal bail hearing that could happen Tuesday, said Margaret T. Burns, a spokeswoman for the city state's attorney's office." The Sun adds, "Johnson, of the 2400 block of Ridgely St., is accused of luring the undercover vice detective, Dante N. Hemingway, to a public housing community during his lunch break by posing as a friend of the officer, according to a high-ranking police official with knowledge of the investigation. Police are investigating a connection between the officer, Johnson and the female friend; the source said the two women share a cellular phone. … Police said they do not suspect the acquaintance was part of the attempted robbery on Thursday that ended in an afternoon shootout that left Hemingway in critical condition with bullet wounds to his neck, chest and stomach."

CIVIL LAW:

Sikorsky Sues DOD To Keep Records Sealed. Cox News Service (4/3, Carr) reports, "One of the nation's largest defense contractors is suing the Pentagon to prevent the release of Black Hawk helicopter production inspection records, saying they would reveal confidential information to its competitors. … But the Bush administration disagrees with Sikorsky Aircraft Corp., whose helicopters are heavily used by the military in Iraq, Afghanistan and missions throughout the world." Cox continues, "The administration, better known for keeping government information secret, is asking a federal judge in Washington to release the records to Alan M. Cohn, a reporter for a television station based in New Haven. … Cohn is investigating whether mechanical failures have caused Black Hawk helicopters to crash in Iraq. His quest for information began in 2003 after several Sikorsky employees told him they were worried that defective parts had caused a series of deadly crashes in Iraq that year. … Cohn believes the records would shed light on whether the Defense Department had raised concerns with Sikorsky about the quality of the helicopter's machinery." Cox notes, "The records in question — called Corrective Action Requests — are a way for the Defense Department to inform a contractor that it is not complying with the Pentagon's safety and performance standards, said Dick Finnegan, associate general counsel of the Defense Contract Management Agency. … On March 2, 2004, Cohn filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) to obtain all inspection reports related to the Black Hawk dating back to 2003 and for Sikorsky's responses to the reports. The Defense Contract Management Agency denied Cohn's request two months later."

Philip Morris Makes Payment To States As RJR Balks. The AP (4/4, Stoughton) reports, "Philip Morris USA apparently has decided against playing hardball with the states over a hefty settlement payment due in April, but Reynolds American Inc.'s RJR is hanging tough." The AP continues, "On Friday, Philip Morris, the nation's largest cigarette maker, made its $3.4 billion payment, even though it believes that sum eventually should be reduced to reflect market losses it suffered due to its participation in the 1998 Master Settlement Agreement. … RJR, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., also made its payment Friday but decided not to pay the full amount, company spokesman David Howard said. Howard declined to provide details about the company's payment." The AP adds, "Philip Morris, RJR and Loews Corp.'s Lorillard have sought to cut $1.2 billion from the $6.5

DOJ_NMG_0025090

billion due April 17. The companies say a provision in the settlement allows them to reduce payments to the 46 states if they collectively lose market share to so-called 'nonparticipating manufacturers' -- or players operating outside the pact. … But the big tobacco companies also must prove that the states did not adequately enforce statutes requiring the outsiders to place funds in escrow accounts in case of future state litigation."

FEC Ruling On Internet Activity Called "Classic Compromise." E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (4/4, A23, 744K), "Last month the Federal Election Commission issued a rule regulating political activity on the Internet. … The decision could be looked at as a classic political compromise: Campaign reformers got something they wanted (the Web would not be allowed to become the loophole that ate all campaign finance regulations), while bloggers got something they wanted (freedom to inform, opine, fulminate and enrage, i.e., to speak their minds). But the decision was better than your usual split-the-difference Washington sausage-making because it acknowledged that two serious principles are at stake and because it sought to make sure that regulations would be applied uniformly across media outlets." Dionne adds that Congress "should resist any bill that would overturn the FEC's shrewd ruling and let money slosh around freely on the Internet."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Lawsuit Alleges Discrimination Against Mississippi White Voters. USA Today (4/4, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "Lean, lanky and a fast-talking blur of perpetual motion, Noxubee County Democratic Chairman Ike Brown has roamed the political landscape of eastern Mississippi for 25 years with one clear aim: electing Democrats who are really Democrats. Brown has no time for moderate white Democrats who might get elected but who would then support Republican policies. 'To hell with 'em,' Brown says of people he calls 'Dixiecrats.'" Brown's lawyer, Wilbur Colom, "says he is simply 'a tough politician.' But the US Justice Department says Brown's take-no-prisoners brand of politics has crossed the line into discrimination against white voters and candidates." The Justice Department "has launched a landmark lawsuit against Brown -- the first time the federal government has used the 1965 Voting Rights Act to allege racial discrimination against whites. … Some legal analysts say the suit marks a striking change of focus by the Bush administration on voting rights cases, which until now have centered on discrimination against blacks and other minorities." Brown, "who the Justice Department points out served 21 months in prison in the mid-1990s on charges of income tax fraud, says his efforts to elect blacks are no different than the hardball political tactics white politicos have used in Mississippi for generations."

DOJ Reaches Settlement With Virginia Beach Over Police Entrance Exam. The AP (4/4) reports that Virginia Beach, VA, officials "have reached a settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice over allegations that the math exam given to police recruits discriminates against blacks and Hispanics. … The agreement filed Monday in U.S. District Court in Norfolk said the city will change how the exam is scored." The AP continues, "The new standards require applicants to score at least 70 percent on the reading and grammar test, and score an average of at least 60 percent on all three parts of the exam, said Mark Stiles, the city's deputy attorney. … Previously, applicants had to score at least 70 percent on the math section of the National Police Officer Selection Test used to screen and select entry-level officers. Although the test is given by police departments nationally, each department can determine what it takes to pass. .. The city also will allow 124 applicants who failed the math test between 2002 and 2005 to resume participation in the hiring process. Those applicants would have passed under the new standards."

American-Statesman Urges DOJ Probe Of Austin Police Beating. The Austin American-Statesman (4/4) editorializes, "Now that a jury has weighed in, the U.S. Department of Justice should investigate whether three Austin police officers violated the civil rights of Ramon Hernandez." The A-S continues, "Last week, it took less than two hours for an all-white jury of six people to acquit officers William Bradley Heilman, 31, and Christopher Gray, 28, for beating and using their stun guns on Hernandez while he was handcuffed and facedown on the ground. Rookie officer Joel Follmer, 37, also faces criminal misdemeanor charges for official oppression in a separate case that is pending. … The jury's verdict left many people scratching their heads. Like the infamous Rodney King case, the officers had been captured on video punching, kicking and standing on Hernandez's neck. The jury sided with Heilman of Pflugerville, and Gray of Georgetown, who said their actions amounted to self-defense because they were in a life-or-death struggle with Hernandez. The officers asserted that it was necessary to use that kind of force to bring Hernandez under control. Each officer outweighed Hernandez by 70 pounds." The A-S adds, "Just as it was in the King case, it's hard to reconcile the jury's verdict in the Hernandez case with what is on the video. It's difficult to look at the video and think the officers' conduct was warranted. The six-member jury decided that the officers broke no laws. That is not the same as saying they did nothing wrong. Even so, many people — some of them officers — will interpret the verdict as meaning that the officers acted properly. That would be tragic. … The 1991 King case divided the Los Angeles community and unleashed a hostility against police that remains today. We believe that swift intervention by the Department of Justice would help avert a similar negative backlash in Austin."

DOJ_NMG_0025091

DOJ Checks Michigan Court For ADA Compliance. The Macomb (MI) Daily (4/3, Hotts) reports, "A federal prosecutor toured Eastpointe (MI)'s district court last month as part of an investigation of alleged violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, city and federal officials said." The Daily continues, "An assistant U.S. Attorney was joined by several city and court officials as she inspected the 38th District Court building on Nine Mile, west of Gratiot, on March 14. It wasn't clear whether she was compiling information for a report or merely examining the facilities. … A prosecutor with the Justice Department in Detroit confirmed the tour took place but would not comment further." The Daily adds, "City Manager Wayne O'Neal said he left the inspection feeling the prosecutor had not found any major violations. … 'The only comment she made was something to the effect that the building was constructed under the same federal guidelines that are in place today,' O'Neal said. 'I'd be surprised if we're found to be out of compliance. We know there are some minor issues that need to be addressed and we're certainly working on those.' … A complaint was filed with the Justice Department last year by Judge Norene Redmond alleging there are compliance problems with handicapped parking and ramps to a secured entrance of the court. The complaint further states there are non-compliance issues with the court's interior, including public lavatories and holding cells, which are not accessible by people using wheelchairs."

ACLU: "Operation Meth Merchant" Targeted South Asian Store Owners In Georgia. The AP (4/3, Bluestein) reports the ACLU contends in a motion to be filed this week that prosecutors and police "zeroed in on stores owned by South Asians while ignoring white-owned stores in a sweeping drug sting. The motion, which will be filed Wednesday, says authorities selectively targeted South Asians during an 18-month investigation that aimed to curb the sale of household products used to manufacture methamphetamines." The group "hopes the filing will prompt a judge to toss out the case against dozens of South Asian merchants indicted last year in Operation Meth Merchant. Beginning in early 2004, 15 undercover agents were sent to small grocery stores, tobacco shops and delis in six remote northwest Georgia counties."

Recommendations Offered To Curb Anti-Semitism On College Campuses. The US Commission on Civil Rights yesterday approved recommendations aimed at ensuring Jewish college students are protected from anti-Semitic harassment. USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) reports that the recommendations come in response to allegations that "an anti-Israel bias is rampant on college campuses." The commission "also urged university leaders to 'set a moral example by denouncing anti-Semitic and other hate speech,' and to ensure that Middle East studies departments protect the rights of all students. It recommended Monday that the Department of Education 'vigorously' enforce the federal law that bars discrimination based on 'race, color or national origin,' and that Congress clarify that 'national origin' can refer to Jewish heritage."

Professor Says Fear Of "Anti-Semitism" Label Stops All Scrutiny Of US-Israel Partnership. Mark Mazpower, a professor of history at Columbia University, writes in the Financial Times (4/4), "In their article, published last month in the London Review of Books, John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, two highly respected scholars, argued that it is the lobby's success rather than any special convergence of national interests that explains the extent of American support for Israel. What is striking is less the substance of their argument than the outraged reaction: to all intents and purposes, discussing the US-Israel special relationship still remains taboo in the US media mainstream. … If fear of being tarred as an anti-semite – and there is no more toxic charge in American politics – blocks the way, what anti-semitism actually implies in today's America is increasingly unclear." Mazpower adds, "There is no reason why the partnership between the US and Israel should not be susceptible to the same kind of cost-benefit analysis as any other area of policy. After all, no special relationship lasts forever: ask the Brits."

Yale Wins Anti-Political Correctness Award. Yale University has been awarded the Collegiate Network's annual award to highlight the negative influence of political correctness, for enrolling a former Taliban official with a fourth grade education. The Washington Times (4/4, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports that the group said, "Yale pursued [Sayed Rahmatullah] Hashemi's admission in the name of that sacred cow, diversity, which now appears to extend not only to people of various sexes, creeds, races, ethnicities, sexual preferences and practices, but also to enemy combatants who make war upon the United States."

ANTITRUST:

Alcatel, Lucent Seek CFIUS Support For Proposed Merger. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Hitt, Silver) reports, "Alcatel SA and Lucent Technologies Inc. appear to be taking care to avoid a political backlash against their proposed merger given the heightened scrutiny of foreign investment in the U.S." The Journal continues, "The combined companies plan to create an independent U.S.-based subsidiary to handle government research projects that are of 'sensitive nature,' the firms said. Under the arrangement, all classified projects done for the U.S. government will be pulled together into a subsidiary that will be part of Lucent's Bell Labs, the company's elite research institution." The Journal adds, "The subsidiary will be overseen by a separate board made up of three U.S. citizens: former Defense Secretary William Perry; former Central Intelligence Agency Director James Woolsey; and Kenneth Minihan, past director of the National Security Agency, which is responsible for monitoring electronic communications for possible security threats. … The arrangement grew from informal consultations between the two firms and the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, a panel made up of several federal agencies that reviews possible national-security implications of foreign investments. Those conversations began well before the merger was made public, as the two firms, which hail from opposite sides of the Atlantic, worked to anticipate potential concerns, government and business officials said."

DOJ_NMG_0025092

GM Sells Financing Arm Stake For $7.4 Billion. The Financial Times (4/4, MacKintosh, Beales, Simon) reports, "General Motors agreed to sell a controlling stake in its finance arm to an investment consortium led by Cerberus Capital on Monday for $7.4bn, securing the troubled carmaker a cash inflow of $14bn over the next three years." The Times continues, "GM secured the sale of 51 per cent of GM Acceptance Corp to Cerberus, Aozora, a Japanese bank owned by Cerberus, and Citigroup's private equity arm. … However, GM admitted it had sold the stake at a loss because its own financial problems meant it could not give GMAC the funding it needed to expand. The payment is equal to half the 'tangible' book value, excluding goodwill on GMAC's balance sheet. GM will take a non-cash charge of $1.1bn-$1.3bn to cover the loss. … 'We felt economically all things considered this was a better transaction for us than alternatives including keeping the business,' said Fritz Henderson, chief financial officer." The Times notes, "In addition to the $7.4bn sale price, the transaction will result in a $2.7bn payment from GMAC to the carmaker as tax assets are released. GM will retain car lease and retail loans with a net book value of $4bn, which it expects to realise over the next three years. … The surrender of GMAC control ends a fire-sale of GM's non-essential assets over the past year that includes most or all of its stakes in Fiat Auto, GMAC's commercial mortgage unit, and Japan's Fuji Heavy Industries and Suzuki. Talks are also under way about the sale of GM's 7.9 per cent stake in Isuzu, the Japanese truckmaker."

USA Today (4/4, Healey) reports, "The deal, to close in the fourth quarter, gives the money-losing automaker $7.4 billion from buyers at closing and $2.7 billion from GMAC because of a favorable change in its tax status. The rest, mainly from GMAC vehicle leases, is paid within three years. … The cash is useful if there's a strike or other cash-burning crisis. But it halves GM's share of GMAC profits at a time when GM is losing money — $10.6 billion last year."

The Washington Post (4/4, D1, Freeman) reports, "As part of the deal, the automaker said GM and GMAC will enter into a number of 10-year agreements under which GMAC will continue to support GM's automotive operations, GM said. The automaker has worked hand-in-hand with GMAC over the years when it has needed to act aggressively to discount cars and trucks to clear inventories. … Financial analysts say they don't expect the nature of that collaboration to change. GM has tried to pull back from that strategy but has had trouble making it work." The Post notes, "Last month, GM announced a sweeping buyout plan designed to clear its employment ranks of 30,000 high-wage union positions. In the past six months, GM has come up with plans to hold down ballooning costs for health care, trimmed retirement and pension benefits, and begun laying off engineers and other white-collar workers. GM also halved its stockholder dividend and cut pay for executives, including Wagoner's salary."

The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Berman, Langley) reports, "The deal carries lots of risks for the buyers, primarily the fate of GM itself. Cerberus could be pushed into a corner should the auto maker enter bankruptcy reorganization or suffer continuing market-share losses. Another risk is the residential-mortgage market, in which GMAC is a big player. It's vulnerable to a possible housing downturn. … Cerberus also could make substantial profit, thanks to the differing values of GMAC's components. The price to be paid is roughly equivalent to GMAC's tangible book value, a finance term meaning the price a thing might fetch if liquidated. But some parts, such as the residential-mortgage division, are worth perhaps 1.5 times tangible book value, according to people briefed on the deal. Should GM recover enough to buy back the auto-finance division, Cerberus would have bought the other GMAC operations for a substantial discount." The Journal notes, "Few deals better capture the dramatic changes sweeping through the financial markets than this one, putting a little-known private investment fund in partnership with an auto maker once seen as a bellwether of the entire American economy."

Novartis Raises Bid For Chiron. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Hamilton) reports, "Novartis AG boosted its cash offer for the shares of Chiron Corp. it doesn't already own, quashing a shareholder insurrection and effectively sealing its acquisition of the biotechnology pioneer." The Journal continues, "The Swiss drug giant, which owns 44% of Chiron, said it will offer shareholders $48 a share in cash, a $3 increase from a previously raised bid. That values the transaction at $5.4 billion, up from $5.1 billion. … The sweetened offer appears to have ended a shareholder revolt over the bid, which several investors considered a lowball offer for a company just recovering from problems in its vaccine business. Chiron's shares dropped precipitously in late 2004 after it pulled its influenza vaccine Fluvirin from the U.S. following alleged contamination at a production facility. Some investors and analysts argued that Chiron shares were just starting to recover when Novartis offered $40 a share for the company in September 2005. The next month, Novartis increased the bid to $45."

DOJ_NMG_0025093

Continental AG To Purchase Motorola Automotive Unit. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Rauwald) reports, "German auto-parts supplier and tire maker Continental AG said it has signed an agreement to acquire the automotive-electronics business of Motorola Inc. for $1 billion, boosting its presence in the American market." The Journal continues, "Continental said the deal would be completed in the first half and is subject to approval by antitrust authorities." The Journal adds, "Car manufacturers are using increasingly advanced electronics systems. The Motorola operation, which supplies auto makers such as General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co., DaimlerChrysler AG and BMW AG, focuses on the development and supply of telematics, products that enable communication from the car to external networks. For Motorola, with total sales of $36.8 billion last year, the automotive-electronics unit was a small part of its overall business. … For Continental, the deal marks part of a drive to expand through acquisitions. The German company reiterated earlier this month that it has about €4 billion, or nearly $5 billion, available for acquisitions. In the past it has signaled an interest in acquiring parts of U.S. auto-part suppliers Delphi Corp. and Dana Corp., which are operating under Chapter 11 protection."

Maytag Chairman To Step Down. Dow Jones (4/4) reports, "Ralph F. Hake, who as Maytag Corp.'s chairman and chief executive presided over the appliance maker's sale to industry leader Whirlpool Corp., announced his pending resignation Monday. … 'I will not be staying with the company - by choice - as Whirlpool already has the leadership required,' Hake said during a teleconference with Whirlpool and Maytag employees." Dow Jones continues, "Whirlpool completed its acquisition of Maytag late Friday, capping a week in which the Justice Department said it wouldn't oppose the takeover. … Hake, 56 years old as of Maytag's latest proxy statement, was recruited in 2001 by a board anxious to rejuvenate the nation's No. 3 appliance maker. … But during his tenure earnings declined, then turned into losses, eventually leading to an auction of the Newton, Iowa, company. In fiscal 2005, it reported a loss of $81.9 million on sales of $4.9 billion." Dow Jones notes, "Separately, Whirlpool said Monday its North American president, David L. Swift, would hold a news conference in Newton Tuesday. He also is expected to meet with Iowa and civic leaders about Whirlpool's intentions for Maytag's plants and employees. … A spokesman for the Benton Harbor, Mich., company, Steve Duthie, said Whirlpool plans to 'move ahead with integration (of the two companies) as quickly as possible. Within 60 days we should have a reasonable idea of the direction we're taking.' … During the Justice Department's antitrust division review of the pending acquisition, executives from the two companies were prohibited from discussing Maytag's future as part of Whirlpool, Duthie said."

Approval Of Boeing-Lockheed Rocket Deal Expected This Month. Dow Jones (4/3) reports, "Boeing Co. and Lockheed Martin Corp. should finally win regulator approval to merge their rocket launch business this month, analysts said Monday." Dow Jones continues, "The two companies want to form the United Launch Alliance to save on back- office costs and end a messy legal battle. But the Federal Trade Commission hasn't said whether or when it will endorse the deal. Pentagon officials have been unofficially supportive. … Now the two companies are in the final stretch, said analysts who have been watching the transaction. 'They're expecting that the government will publicly disclose its approval of the transaction, with conditions, this month,' said Lexington Institute defense analyst Loren Thompson, who provides consulting services to Lockheed Martin and other contractors." Dow Jones adds, "Conditions on the deal will probably affect the joint venture's impact on the broader defense agency. Northrop Grumman Corp., which competes with Boeing and Lockheed to build government satellites, has expressed concerns about the deal, as have other companies that hope to enter the rocket launch business someday. Boeing and Lockheed Martin currently split Pentagon rocket launch contracts."

EU To Charge Countries Over Energy Reform Delays. Dow Jones (4/3) reports, "European Union regulators will Tuesday escalate efforts to cut the bloc's energy prices, charging several countries for not following energy laws agreed in 2003." Dow Jones continues, "The charges will range from failing to break up electricity and natural gas monopolies to keeping insufficient emergency oil stocks, the European Commission's energy spokesman Ferran Tarradellas said. … He declined to name the countries that will be charged, but said the regulator investigated over 100 cases where it suspected countries weren't following E.U. rules. … 'Our main problem is that it is impossible to see if our energy (regulation) is working, because many of the (laws) haven't been implemented or have not been implemented correctly,' Tarradellas said." Dow Jones adds, "Brussels regulators have been struggling to change the E.U.'s energy market, long controlled by state-owned monopolies that fix prices and force customers into long-term contracts. … Tuesday's move is unlikely to spur immediate changes, as the Commission must send countries a series of sternly worded letters before asking E.U. courts to enforce compliance. Still, the Commission has been making steady progress against recalcitrant countries. Last July, the regulator charged 11 countries for failing to include the E.U.'s 2003 policies in their national laws. At the moment, only Spain and Luxembourg still haven't complied with the Commission's demands, Tarradellas said."

DOJ_NMG_0025094

Key Washingtonians Lobbying To Boost Patent Protections. In a Bulletin exclusive, US News & World Reports reports, "A 'Dream Team' of sorts has been formed to help the American Innovators Alliance, composed of Microsoft, Micron, Oracle, Apple and Intel, on key patent issues and to work on the 'eBay v. MercExchange' case before the Supreme Court. The team includes former Whitewater prosecutor Ken Starr; former Solicitor General Ted Olson; Mark Corallo, former Justice spokesman; Noam Neusner, former OMB spokesman and Bush speechwriter; and Makan Delrahim, an antitrust deputy assistant attorney general. The lobbying and communications effort they are heading is focused on pushing legislative initiatives that reform the patent system and protect high-tech innovators. Olson and Corallo have teamed before, to help the recording industry's fight against piracy."

ENVIRONMENT:

EPA Regional Offices Opposed To Emissions Rule. The Washington Post (4/4, A4, Eilperin, 744K) reports, "A proposal to revise how the Environmental Protection Agency regulates airborne toxic emissions from industrial plants has sparked an outcry from the agency's regional offices, with a majority suggesting that the change would be 'detrimental to the environment.'" The proposed rule, "whose wording was disclosed yesterday by the advocacy group Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC), would change the emissions standards for oil refineries, hazardous waste incinerators, chemical plants, steel mills and other plants that discharge thousands of pounds of airborne toxins such as arsenic, mercury and lead." The Post adds, "An internal EPA memo summarizing the position of eight of the agency's 10 regional offices, dated Dec. 13, contended the change could conceivably result in an increase in toxic emissions. Seven of the offices agreed that the proposal would allow polluters to 'virtually avoid regulation and greatly complicate any enforcement.'"

The New York Times (4/4, Janofsky, 1.19M) says "officials in 9 of the agency's 10 regional offices raised their concerns in an internal memorandum to EPA officials." The memorandum, "written by Michael S. Bandrowski, chief of the air office in San Francisco, said he and his colleagues had 'varying degrees of concern' about the proposal, which he characterized as a 'drastic change in interpretation' of existing regulations under the Clean Air Act."

California Bill Would Cut Emissions Of Greenhouse Gases. The New York Times (4/4, Holusha, 1.19M) reports, "California may become the first state to impose limits on the emissions of all greenhouse gases, under legislation introduced yesterday in the State Assembly." The bill "requires that emissions of carbon dioxide and other gases linked to global warming be reduced by 145 million tons, or 25 percent less than the current forecast, by 2020. That would bring the emissions back to the 1990 level."

NYTimes Criticizes Fuel Efficiency Standards, Says They Challenge California Bill. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) editorializes on the Bush Administration's "new standards for SUV's and other light trucks," which it calls "a baby step toward President Bush's goal of reducing America's dependency on foreign oil." The Times adds, "Buried deep in the rules is one other disappointment: a reassertion of the administration's view that only the federal government has the authority to set fuel efficiency standards and that any state program that has the effect of changing these standards is illegal. This is a direct challenge to a recent California law requiring automakers to cut greenhouse gas emissions from new cars by 30 percent by 2016." The Administration "has missed another opportunity to address the twin problems of oil dependence and warming.

Obama Hits Bush "Stubborn Refusal" To Address Climate Change. At the Associated Press' annual luncheon yesterday, Sen. Barrack Obama said yesterday that Democrats should stress energy independence, education improvement and science investment in the 2008 presidential race. The AP (4/4, Espo) reports, "Obama, a first-term Democrat, also said he doubts Congress will pass immigration legislation this year, but he added that if the Senate can clear a bill, 'it lays the groundwork' for 2007." Obama also "accused President Bush of a 'stubborn refusal' to attack the causes of climate change, and said tougher fuel standards, stricter curbs on oil imports and more investment in cleaner energy are essential to avert global catastrophe."

DOJ_NMG_0025095

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Air Marshals Plead Guilty To Cocaine Smuggling. The AP (4/4) reports, "Two U.S. air marshals pleaded guilty Monday to accepting money to smuggle cocaine on a flight to Las Vegas and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors." The AP continues, "The marshals admitted they accepted $15,000 to use their positions as air marshals to bypass airport security and smuggle 15 pounds of cocaine." The AP adds, "Shawn Ray Nguyen's attorney, Kent Schaffer, said his client pleaded guilty because 'he felt that the best way to ... demonstrate his repentance about his conduct was to take a guilty plea as early as possible.' … George Parnham, an attorney for Burlie Sholar III, said the plea was the best alternative. 'We want to save ourselves as much of his future as we can,' he said." The AP notes, "Homeland Security spokesman David Adams said that Sholar and Nguyen remained on indefinite suspension without pay. … According to the criminal complaint, Nguyen, 32, smuggled two envelopes containing drug money and fraudulent government documents past airport security in December. … Nguyen then discussed with the informant smuggling large loads of cocaine and bringing in others to help, according to the complaint. … Authorities had said Nguyen recruited Sholar, 38, for the plan."

The Houston Chronicle (4/4) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark McIntyre "said the investigation was continuing, but cautioned against the expectation of more arrests. … The possibility of wrongdoing by other air marshals was evident in February when a third air marshal admitted during a dramatic courtroom confrontation to sharing a room with Sholar so he could bill the government for a second hotel room."

Missouri Woman Sentenced For Meth Conspiracy. The Carthage (MO) Press (4/3) reports a Carthage woman was sentenced in federal court Monday for her role in a conspiracy to "distribute between five and 15 kilograms of methamphetamine in southwest Missouri. The conviction is the result of Operation Ice Storm, a long-term investigation into the illegal distribution of large quantities of methamphetamine in southwest Missouri. Ricki J. Gomez…was sentenced by U.S. District Judge Ortrie D. Smith…to four years and nine months in federal prison without parole." The Carthage Press notes that the DEA took part in the investigation.

Illinois Man Gets 20-Year Sentence For Dealing Crack. The Southern (4/3) reports a 22-year-old Carbondale man "has been sentenced to 20 years in prison on federal charges of dealing crack cocaine and unlawful possession of a firearm. Brandon McDade previously pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute crack. … The conspiracy was investigated by the Southern Illinois Enforcement Group, Jackson and Perry County sheriffs' offices, Carbondale and Pinckneyville police departments, DEA and ATF."

Maryland, DC Seen As "Magnets" For Meth Dealers. The Washington Post (4/4, B5, Paley) reports Maryland and the District "are among the few jurisdictions in the country that have no restrictions on the sale of pseudoephedrine… making them magnets for meth dealers desperate to get the drug. At least 41 states place controls on the drug. … A federal law that takes effect Friday will make it illegal to purchase more than 3.6 grams, or about 120 pills, of the drug in one day, but law enforcement groups said they will continue to lobby for passage of state laws so local officials have their own tools to combat meth. … After Virginia required last fall that pseudoephedrine-based cold medications be placed behind the counter, drug dealers began crossing into Maryland and the District to buy the drug, according to Scott Burns."

Louisiana Jailer Faces Drug Distribution Charges. The Natchez (MS) Democrat (4/4) reports U.S. District Judge James Kirk "found probable cause Monday in Alexandria to proceed with prosecution of Concordia Parish Sheriff's Office jailer Dave Spurs. Spurs, of Ferriday, was arrested Thursday on three counts of distribution of crack cocaine. … The bust, part of an ongoing investigation between the DEA and the Louisiana State Police, netted three others."

California County Supervisor Seeks To Ban Marijuana-Flavored Candy. The Enterprise-Record (4/3) reports Alameda County Supervisor Nate Miley "wants to protect your kids from Chronic and Hydro and Sticky Icky Buds. All three are part of a line of marijuana- and hemp-flavored candy that Miley wants banned. The Board of Supervisors is set to discuss a ban on the sale of such products."

Lawyer Says Marijuana-Flavored Candy Undermines Drug Laws. In the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (4/4), Washington lawyer Michael C. Barnes writes, "Kudos to Georgia state senators who voted in favor of a bill to prevent the sale of marijuana-flavored candy. Members of the Agriculture and Consumer Affairs Committee realized that the availability of hemp candy on store shelves is harmful to our children and undermines Georgia's anti-drug laws."

Canada's Prime Minister Scraps Legislation Decriminalizing Marijuana. The New York Times

DOJ_NMG_0025096

(4/4, Krauss) reports Prime Minister Stephen Harper "announced Monday that he was scrapping draft legislation to decriminalize possession of small amounts of marijuana, a measure that had been strongly criticized by the Bush administration. … Harper announced the move during a speech to the Canadian Professional Police Association in which he pledged to toughen sentences for drug and gun crimes, tighten parole rules, strengthen controls on child pornography and expand the national databank of DNA samples for convicted criminals."

Canada's CTV (4/4) reports on its Web site that a lawyer "fears stepped-up prosecution of medical marijuana users now that the Conservative government has signaled it won't pass a Liberal law decriminalizing the possession of small quantities of pot."

US Seeks To Shut Down California Gun Dealer. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/3, Lee) reports, "The federal government wants to shut down one of Northern California's largest firearms dealers because the San Leandro business, which has a history of run-ins with firearms regulators, cannot account for nearly 2,000 guns." The Chronicle continues, "The decision by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to revoke Trader Sports' federal license to sell firearms on June 1 follows an audit that revealed owner Tony Cucchiara cannot document the weapons' whereabouts, the agency said in documents filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco. … Cucchiara blames the problem on clerical errors made by store employees who duplicated entries or transposed digits when completing required records noting the acquisition or sale of a weapon, his attorney, Malcolm Segal of Sacramento, said today. … Segal said ATF inspectors 'were instructed to go in and search all the way and find these hypertechnical violations.'" The Chronicle adds, "The government doesn't buy Cucchiara's explanation, saying in court papers that his store willfully violated the law after repeatedly being told what it needed to do. … Cucchiara, who has been selling guns since 1958, plans to appeal the planned revocation at a May 25 hearing in federal court."

IMMIGRATION:

Senators Seek Compromise On Immigration Bill. Republican senators met in Majority Leader Bill Frist's office to hammer out an acceptable compromise on the immigration bill with the hopes of finalizing a measure by Friday. However, the goal of reaching a filibuster-proof deal appeared unlikely, with vote counts showing a possible compromises receiving fewer than 60 votes in favor. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Reynolds, Gaouette, 958K) reports, "Facing a self-imposed Friday deadline for reaching agreement on the thorny issue of immigration, GOP senators worked Monday toward a possible compromise that would permit some illegal immigrants to remain in the country and apply for citizenship but would deny that opportunity to others." Frist "launched what participants said would be a series of closed-door negotiations to bridge a divide between Republicans who favored providing a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants and those who opposed it." Senators said "the Republican negotiations would continue today, and they expressed determination to pass a bill before the two-week Easter recess, which is scheduled to begin when the Senate adjourns Friday." A number of Republicans "who oppose options that would legalize illegal immigrants already in the country went to the White House on Monday for a meeting with Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove."

The AP (4/4, Gamboa) reports the lawmakers "considered allowing illegal immigrants who have been in the country more than five years or have other connections to the United States to remain legally and eventually seek citizenship." Sen. Arlen Specter said, "We're looking at the roots concept, and that is if they have been here more than five years. That is a reasonable line as to people who have roots who ought to be treated differently. And if they have been here less then five years, they do not have roots to the same extent and can be treated differently, and that is what we're looking at." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, A4, Rogers, 2.11M) reports Republican leaders "bluntly warned Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) that his bill will get no more than 58 votes to cut off debate. And Mr. Specter said later, 'We're going to add some more hurdles to move farther away from the concept of amnesty.'" The leadership "was promoting ideas put forward" by Sen. Chuck Hagel "that would treat those illegal immigrants -- who have entered the U.S. in the past five years -- more as guest workers, without a clear path to citizenship."

The Washington Times (4/4, Hurt, 90K) reports another proposed compromise "floating around would allow only those who have overstayed their visas to apply directly for citizenship. Anyone who had sneaked across the border would be required to return. But neither of the proposals would satisfy Senate conservatives."

CQ (4/3,Sandler) reports Frist was "racing to find middle ground before the end of the week on a complex overhaul of immigration policy that has divided his party." Frist plans to "hold a meeting of the Republican Senate caucus early Tuesday morning to share some of the proposed ideas." Frist said, "There are probably four different approaches [being discussed]. I'm going to be working with each of the groups to see what we can take to the floor." CQ adds that earlier in the day, "Frist, John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., met with Bush adviser Karl Rove at the White House. Frist then met with Cornyn and others, who favor a proposal that would require illegal immigrants to leave the country before being eligible for a temporary worker program that would not lead to citizenship."

DOJ_NMG_0025097

The Washington Post (4/4, A9, Weisman, 744K) reports the talks, "led by Sens. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) and Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), are aimed at finding a formula that would persuade a majority of Republicans to support an immigration bill now backed largely by Democrats." Majority Leader Frist "plans to push for a final vote on immigration legislation this week, but it is not clear whether any measure can muster the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster."

Frist, Cornyn, Kyle Met With Rove And Card To Discuss Strategy. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Bash) reported that the GOP Senate leadership "is trying to figure out how to make sure that the deep divisions within their party over immigration doesn't end up in total deadlock when it comes to legislation on immigration and to that end we understand that the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist went to the White House this afternoon with a couple other Republican senators. Senator John Cornyn of Texas and also Senator Jon Kyle of Arizona. … They met with Karl Rove, the President's Deputy Chief of Staff and the White House liaison to Congress Candy Wolfe. Now sources familiar with that discussion say it was essentially a strategy session. What they are trying to figure out is how to make sure the divisions especially when it comes to a so-called guest worker program don't just end everything right here in the Senate."

Senate Conservatives Seen As Likely To Buck Leadership. Roll Call (4/4, Stanton, Yachnin) reports House conservatives "are threatening to derail a budget measure that's far too expensive for their taste unless leadership cooperates on a series of reform measures, while Senate conservatives may derail efforts to pass an immigration bill this week, pushing the thorny issue further into an already tight election cycle." The "likelihood of a House revolt over the budget is unclear, but the chances for a showdown in the Senate are considered higher." Majority Leader Bill Frist "could have his hands full preventing a dispute between conservative and moderate Republicans over a guest worker proposal that could scuttle his plan of finishing the bill this week." While Frist "has said he does not support a Judiciary Committee-passed version of the proposal, he hasn't entirely thrown his lot in with conservatives, either. Instead, he is looking to find a middle ground."

14% See Illegal Immigration As Most Important Election Issue This Year. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Blitzer) reported, "In a new CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation, 14 percent say illegal immigration will be the single most important issue affecting their vote this year, 43 percent call it very important, 31 percent call it somewhat important. Just nine percent say it's not important." CNN added that 47 percent favor proposals "to build fences along the Mexican border with the United States and toughen criminal penalties for illegal immigrants and those who hire or help them." Meanwhile 24 percent "say they are very sympathetic" to illegal immigrants, 46 percent "say they are somewhat sympathetic. On the other hand 12 percent are somewhat unsympathetic, 14 percent in this new CNN poll say they are very unsympathetic."

Senators' Personal Backgrounds Play Important Role In Debate. The New York Times (4/4, Swarns, 1.19M) reports Sen. Pete Domenici recounted on the Senate floor how his mother, an illegal Italian immigrant, was detained during World War II. His "powerful account reflects a broader reality that has gone almost unnoticed as Republicans feud over whether to legalize the nation's illegal immigrants. Among the most passionate Republican voices in this debate are lawmakers with strong immigrant ties, who have woven the strands of family history into an outlook that has helped shape their legislative positions. The close connection has convinced some lawmakers of the importance of providing citizenship to illegal immigrants, while others say it should be granted more sparingly." Sen. Arlen Specter "said his parents came to the United States from Russia in the early 1900's," while Sen. Jon Kyl "said he grew up listening to the stories of his grandparents, who arrived from the Netherlands sometime before 1910." Sen. Mel Martinez "fled Cuba for Florida in 1962, when he was 15, and lived in orphanages and with foster families until he was reunited with his family four years later."

Undocumented Immigrants' Plans To Come Forward Depend On Nature Of Final Bill. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Paulson, 61K) reports though "many immigrants prefer the Senate's more open-armed bill, it can't yet answer their most urgent question: Who'd get to stay and who'd be sent home?" How senators "would resolve" complicated cases for immigrants who don't fall into neat categories "may be what determines whether most undocumented immigrants living and working in the US step forward to be counted - a major goal of the legislation - or remain in the shadows." Senators are "debating what waivers to include" for those "who have previous immigration violations."

Immigrant Rights Organizers Call For National Boycott. The Washington Times (4/4, Seper, 90K) reports immigration rights organizers "today will call for a nationwide boycott of work, school and shopping on May 1 to protest congressional efforts to clamp down on illegal aliens as part of pending immigration-reform legislation." The "Great American Boycott of 2006" is "only one in a series of large-scale events the protesters hope will sway lawmakers to put millions of illegal aliens on track toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship." Boycott organizers "think the Senate Judiciary Committee, under the pressure of massive protests last week, adopted a series of reforms in sharp contrast to the House-approved bill."

DOJ_NMG_0025098

Protest Organizers Encourage Followers To Not Use Latin American Flags. The Washington Times (4/4, Summers, 90K) reports the "organizers of an upcoming pro-immigration rally on Capitol Hill and in at least 10 other cities are encouraging protesters to leave their Latin American flags at home." Mexican, Salvadoran and Guatemalan "flags and slogans at pro-immigration rallies across the country have sparked controversy between Americans who say the flags represent immigrants' and illegal aliens' disdain for U.S. laws and pro-immigration advocates who say the flags represent ethnic pride."

ACLU Seeks Apology From Principal Over Pro-Latino Slogan T-Shirts. The Washington Times/AP (4/4, Sampson) reports the American Civil Liberties Union "asked a Northern Virginia elementary school principal to apologize to two students for keeping them out of class because they wore T-shirts bearing the slogans 'Latinos Forever' and '100% Latinos.'" The state ACLU "also wants the principal to clear the incident from the boys' records and to assure that the Woodbridge school won't violate students' free-speech rights by issuing a statement indicating that such clothing will be allowed henceforth."

Talk Radio Host Sees Border Security As Key Issue. In a Washington Times op-ed (4/4), talk radio host Rick Amato says, "America's borders are a mess and are urgently in need of a policy which is not only coherent, but also equips those entrusted to protect our borders with the proper tools and manpower needed to do so. While illegal immigration may be on everyone's mind now, border protection will be the hot-button issue heading into the 2006 congressional campaign." It "should come as a surprise to no one that the Mexican government cannot be relied upon to secure the problem on its side of the border."

Enhanced Border Enforcement Said To Prevent Return Migration. In a New York Times op-ed (4/4), Prof. Douglas S. Massey of Princeton says, "The rate of undocumented migration" from Mexico "adjusted for population growth, to the United States has not increased in 20 years. That is, from 1980 to 2004 the annual likelihood that a Mexican will make his first illegal trip to the United States has remained at about 1 in 100. What has changed are the locations and visibility of border crossings. And that shift, more than anything, has given the public undue fears about waves of Mexican workers trying to flood into America." In addition, the US is "now locked into a perverse cycle whereby additional border enforcement further decreases the rate of return migration, which accelerates undocumented population growth, which brings calls for harsher enforcement."

Nebraska Said To Demonstrate Immigration's "Scrambled Politics." In her Washington Post column (4/4, A23), Ruth Marcus says Nebraska "illustrates the new geographic reality of illegal immigration: They're not just in Texas (or California or Florida) anymore. In recent years the most rapid growth in the population of undocumented migrants (as well as legal immigrants) has taken place in states that previously had only a handful of foreign-born residents." Nebraska "underscores the scrambled politics of immigration: Where a politician will come down on the issue isn't necessarily predictable based on party affiliation or geography." Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel "is a leader in backing comprehensive immigration reform. The state's Democratic senator, Ben Nelson -- up for reelection this year -- has been taking an enforcement-comes-first line; he touts a 'get-tough border security bill' that features a fence extending from the Pacific to the Gulf of Mexico."

Zakaria Says European Approach To Immigration Breeds Radicalism. In his Washington Post column (4/4, A23), Newsweek International editor Fareed Zakaria says, "Many Americans have become enamored of the European approach to immigration -- perhaps without realizing it. Guest workers, penalties, sanctions and deportation are all a part of Europe's mode of dealing with immigrants. The results of this approach have been on display recently in France, where rioting migrant youths again burned cars last week. Across Europe one sees disaffected, alienated immigrants, ripe for radicalism. The immigrant communities deserve their fair share of blame for this, but there's a cycle at work. European societies exclude the immigrants, who become alienated and reject their societies." Compared with "every other country in the world, America does immigration superbly. Do we really want to junk that for the French approach?"

Dobbs' Opposition To Illegal Immigration Satirized. In his New York Times column (4/4), John Tierney satirizes CNN anchor Lou Dobb's crusade against illegal immigration with a mock newscast: "First, more bad news from Washington. Despite my personal trip to Cancún for last week's summit meeting, President Bush remains hostage to foreign interests. My soaring ratings apparently mean nothing to the White House or the Senate Republicans working on an amnesty plan for the illegal immigrants now carrying Mexican flags through our streets."

TAX:

Bidder Protests Could Delay Tax Collection Outsourcing. Government Executive (4/4, Mandel) reports, "Protests filed by unsuccessful bidders may cause delays in an Internal Revenue Service initiative to hire private sector companies to help collect tax debt." GE continues, "Livermore, Calif.-based Diversified Collection Services and Houston, Texas-based GC Services have filed protests with the Government Accountability Office over the IRS' process for selecting three collection companies to carry out the first phase of the initiative." GE adds, "The protests were filed on March 17 and March 20, according to GAO Senior Attorney Edward Goldstein, shortly after the March 9 announcement of the contract award. IRS spokesman John Lipold said it is not yet clear whether the protests will affect the timeline for work on the contract. … The contents of the DCS protest were not public, but Maria Perrin, senior vice president of business development with the firm, said the protest was aimed at understanding the criteria used in the selection process. 'Once we get more information, it will become either "OK, we understand the procedure we went through," or "no, we don't agree," ' she said. … One of two protests filed by GC Services focused on the history of Austin, Texas-based Linebarger Goggan Blair & Sampson, one of the firms awarded a contract. A former partner with that firm, Juan Pena, pleaded guilty in September 2004 to federal charges of conspiracy and bank fraud in connection with a bribery case. … Pena was one of four defendants involved in paying bribes to two San Antonio city councilmen in return for a contract to collect fines and fees for the city, according to a Justice Department statement announcing Pena's plea."

DOJ_NMG_0025099

USA Today Urges Tighter Rules On Taxpayer Privacy. USA Today (4/4) editorializes, "It's April 4: Do you know where your tax return is? … If you used a commercial tax preparer, your data could be at a lot of places other than the IRS — a bank, a mortgage company or some other business that wants to sell you something." USA continues, "While many taxpayers assume their returns are private, IRS rules adopted in 1974 allow the tax preparers to share information from returns with affiliates, or sell it to third parties, with the taxpayers' permission. Millions of taxpayers sign away privacy each year when their returns are prepared. … Companies can then try to sell them everything from retirement accounts to controversial loans, often at rates that would make a loan shark blush." USA adds, "Now, the IRS wants to change the rules, and at a hearing today in Washington, the agency is bound to get an earful. Consumer advocates have criticized the IRS for what they see as plans to loosen the rules. Major tax preparers have blasted the agency for adding what they regard as needless confusion. … H&R Block, the nation's largest preparer of individual tax returns, argues that disclosing information to affiliates allows it to offer 'customized products based on an integrated view' of the customer's finances. Perhaps. But if taxpayers want a product, they can go to a bank or mortgage company and share whatever tax information they wish. … At the least, taxpayers deserve explicit consent forms explaining what information they're giving up and warning of the possible dangers. Better yet, if Congress has any interest in protecting its constituents rather than its campaign contributors, it might want to require that preparers stick to doing taxes, instead of turning tax time into a bazaar for selling other financial products."

USA Today (4/4) notes that "H&R Block declined to provide an opposing view to this editorial. Jackson Hewitt Tax Service did not return calls seeking an opposing view." USA includes excerpts from written comments that H&R Block and Jackson Hewitt have filed with the IRS.

Congressional Report Highlights Tax Preparation Firms' Frequent Mistakes. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 8, 2:10, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Congressional investigators will release an unnerving report. An estimated 60% of all tax returns are completed by professional preparers. But according to an investigation, you might do at least as well figuring out your own taxes." ABC (Wiener) added, "The investigators encountered a shocking lack of knowledge about very basic tax issues -- bad advice that could get taxpayers in major trouble with the IRS." Legislation "pending in Congress would require new preparers to take an entry test. Then, take brushup courses." Sen. Charles Grassley: "If it isn't done right, it's the taxpayer that's left holding the bag, to pay a penalty, a fine. And in some egregious cases, maybe even go to jail."

NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 7, 2:45, Thompson, 9.87M) reported an NBC hidden camera investigation found tax preparation firms were willing to encourage cheating on tax returns to increase refunds. NBC added, "So why would any tax preparer encourage cheating to get you that big refund?" Sen. Max Baucus, Montana: "There is a tendency for a lot of preparers to line their pockets, frankly, by charging hidden additional fees." Thompson: "A federal study to be released Tuesday by the Government Accountability Office found exactly what we did — tax preparers at major chains in one city encouraging cheating. Half the time, they did not report side income or they claimed an ineligible child."

WSJournal Criticizes Perry's Proposed Tax On Business Receipts. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M), "The National Taxpayers Union reports that Texas is one of at least 20 states…where homeowners are rebelling against soaring assessments that in some cases are taxing people out of their homes. … Texas is the epicenter of this backlash, because property tax bills in some localities have doubled in seven years, according to the taxpayer group Americans for Prosperity." Gov. Rick Perry "embraced a tax plan that cuts the property tax by one-third in many localities and eliminates the state's hated business franchise tax, which is a disguised business income tax on capital-intensive industries." But Perry would pay for the cuts with a 1% business tax on gross receipts. Perry says his goal is to make Texas "the top performing economy in the nation."

DOJ_NMG_0025100

Cutting "the stampeding cost of property taxes will help accomplish that goal. But raising taxes on the very businesses that he's trying to attract surely won't."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

More White House Staff Changes Expected. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Malveaux) reported that President Bush "is looking for heavy hitters since Josh Bolten will be taking over as chief of staff." Sources say Bolten is "looking at three areas, one White House communications, legislative affairs and of course Treasury. White House communications a lot of discussions over strategy as well as the message from the podium, that of course would impact most greatly White House press secretary Scott McClellan. Whether or not he would be taking on a different role and perhaps someone in his place…. Other sources I talked to say that they feel his job is very much secure. He's very close to the president. And that this is a speculation. Of course, legislative affairs, they are looking for an elder statesman type of person to fill that role to reach out to Republicans in Congress, some of the numbers -- or the names rather on the short list including former Representative Bill Paxon (ph) of New York as well as former Senator Phil Gramm and then finally when it comes to the Treasury Secretary, of course, the White House again as recently as today expressing a great deal of confidence in Treasury Secretary John Snow at the same time sources inside and outside the administration saying that the President is looking for what they call an alternative replacement. As recently as a couple of weeks ago extending that offer to the CEO of Time Warner, Dick Parsons who sources say turned it down."

DeLay Won't Run For Reelection, Will Resign From House Seat. Rep. Tom DeLay will not run for reelection in November. Instead, the congressman is expected to resign from the House within the next few months. DeLay, who will make an official announcement today, granted an interview to Galveston County Daily News (4/4, Aulds), in which he said "his decision was best for his district and based on troubling internal polling numbers." Internal polls "showed him beating Democrat Nick Lampson in the general election but in a race that would be too close for comfort, DeLay said." DeLay's exit, says the Daily News, "robs Democrats of a handy target for national attacks on the Republican Party and may take the national spin off the race." DeLay told the paper, "I would assume, being the realist I am that Mr. Lampson is going to have a hard time keeping this a national race."

DeLay also spoke to Time, which runs the interview on its website (4/3, Allen). DeLay said, "I'm a realist. I've been around awhile. I can evaluate political situations. And it was obvious to me that the 22nd District needed an election that discussed issues. It was obvious to me that this election had become a referendum on me. … I just felt like I didn't want to risk the seat and that I can do more on the outside of the House than I can on the inside right now." DeLay also said, "I've been fighting this strategy of personal destruction for going on 10 years. I'm not whining. The Democrats even publicly announced that they were going to destroy my reputation and an effort to do that."

The story is receiving extensive coverage in major Texas and national papers. The Dallas Morning News (4/4, Gillman) calls DeLay's decision "unexpected," and says it was taken with "his power diminished and his legal troubles mounting." DeLay, adds the Morning News, "will quit Congress by mid-June." The decision "shocked Texas Republicans." The Morning News says "the final straw was apparently the plea deal entered Friday by a former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, the third confidant to turn government witness in an ongoing federal corruption inquiry centered on super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Legal experts have speculated that these former aides and allies could provide damaging evidence against the congressman, though Mr. DeLay has vigorously denied any wrongdoing." The Houston Chronicle (4/4, Mason, Hedges, 581K) also reports on "the shocking move," adding "the embattled congressman…was expected to withdraw from the race, step down from Congress and be gone by May."

USA Today (4/4, Stone, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports DeLay "plans to change his legal residency to Virginia, where he has long had a home, to allow GOP leaders back in his Texas district to replace his name on the ballot, Forti said." His decision "concludes a dramatic fall from the heights of power."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Simon, Hook, Curtius, 958K) says "DeLay's decision stunned Capitol Hill." Stuart Roy, a former DeLay aide, "said he thought his former boss was deterred by the prospect of a tough fight and -- even if he were reelected -- life in Congress without a major leadership position. 'As much as he is ideologically driven and cause-oriented, he's also very much a pragmatist when it comes to the art of the possible,' Roy said." The Times also says DeLay's "efforts to consolidate Republican power and build a lasting political majority were the root of his downfall." Meanwhile, the New York Times (4/4, Hulse, 1.19M) says "one Congressional official with knowledge of Mr. DeLay's plans" who "did not want to be identified" told the Post, "He just decided that the numbers and the whole political climate were against him and that it was time to step aside." The Washington Times (4/4, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (4/4, Mullins, 2.11M) run similar reports.

The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Weisman, Cillizza, 744K) reports DeLay "said he informed President Bush of his decision yesterday afternoon." The Washington Post (4/4, A7, Smith, 744K) runs a second story titled "Federal Probe Has Edged Closer to Texan," reporting that the resignation "comes amid a federal criminal investigation that already has reached into his inner circle of longtime advisers."

DOJ_NMG_0025101

The AP (4/4, Sidoti) notes House Majority Leader John Boehner "called his predecessor 'one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known.' 'He has served our nation with integrity and honor, and I'm honored to call him my colleague and friend,' Boehner said."

Thirteen House Republicans Returning Rudy Contributions. The Hill (4/4, Schor) reports, "Thirteen House Republicans already have returned or plan to return contributions they took from lobbyist Tony Rudy, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy last week and joins former cohort Jack Abramoff as a possible witness in the government's expanding corruption probe of lawmakers and their aides." Of the "34 House Republicans whose campaigns or PACs received money from Rudy since 2001, the offices of six members told The Hill they do not plan to return the contributions or donate them to charity." Rudy "pleaded guilty Friday to one count of conspiracy, agreeing to cooperate with the Justice Department's investigation into a widespread bribery and fraud scheme spearheaded by disgraced GOP lobbyist Abramoff." Rudy "spread his contributions among a wide swath of the GOP conference, giving $48,500 since 2001 to four members of leadership, two committee chairmen and then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Rudy's boss from 1995 to 2000."

WSJournal Says Republicans Have "Sense Of Entitlement." An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) says, "Clearly a sense of entitlement set in among some Republicans, who forgot why they were elected and began to believe that power was its own reward. … The Abramoff story still has a long way to run this election year, and one way or another the Members themselves will not emerge unscathed. If Republicans lose their House majority because GOP voters stay home in disgust, Team DeLay will be one of the reasons."

Abramoff Sought Contract With Sudan. Two eyewitnesses say Jack Abramoff sought to sell his services to Sudan to help the embattled nation improve is reputation in the US. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Hamburger, Silverstein, 958K) reports, "Khidir Haroun Ahmed, Sudan's ambassador to the United States, said in an interview that Abramoff proposed a multimillion-dollar lobbying contract in late 2001 but that the proposal was 'never seriously considered' by the Sudanese. He declined to elaborate. … A spokesman for Abramoff, Andrew Blum, confirmed that a conversation took place between Abramoff and the ambassador but said Abramoff never sought a contract and rejected working for the Sudanese because of that country's human rights record."

"New, Edgier" Lott Said To Be "Merciless" When It Comes To Bush, Frist. USA Today (4/4, Lawrence, 2.31M) this morning runs a very positive profile of GOP Sen. Trent Lott, who "lost his job as Senate majority leader and then he lost his Gulf Coast house to Hurricane Katrina. The one-two punch didn't knock him out. Instead, it has unleashed his tongue. Long known for his passion for order…the Mississippi senator has traded iron discipline and party loyalty for a more freewheeling take on life and fellow Republicans." Lott "says in an interview that he's always been inclined to say what he thinks -- but he also allows, 'I do have a certain amount of independence and freedom now that I didn't have when I was leader.'" USA Today refers to a "new, edgier Lott," who is "merciless when it comes to President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., the men Lott says forced him out as leader in 2002." Scott Reed, "a GOP strategist who ran the presidential campaign of another Republican Senate majority leader, Bob Dole, says Lott's 'style of leadership has been missed. He gave the party direction." Phil Singer of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee retorted, "Only Bill Frist could make Republicans yearn for the days of Trent Lott."

House Vote On 527s Could Be Very Close. Roll Call (4/4, Newmyer, Bresnahan) reports, "House Republican leaders are bracing for a close vote on their push to rein in the free-spending nonprofit groups known as 527s, even as the details of the legislation the House plans to vote on Wednesday remain in flux." In "what might otherwise be a party-line vote," some members of the conservative Republican Study Committee "are raising concerns about the measure, complaining it doesn't go far enough to simultaneously roll back other campaign finance restrictions. If enough RSC members buck their leadership when the measure comes to a vote on the House floor Wednesday, they could sink the 527 bill."

GOP Unity Strained Again Over Budget Plan. The Washington Post (4/4, A21, Weisman, Murray, 744K) reports, "It has been just over three months since moderate Republicans squared off with House Republican leaders over the federal budget, but this week, with those wounds still fresh, they will be at it again. If they can round up the votes, House leaders will bring a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint to the floor, probably on Thursday." Republicans "hope to tout the measure as a testament to the party's commitment to fiscal discipline, at least on one corner of the federal budget -- non-security discretionary spending." But "to accommodate a 7 percent increase in military spending and a 3.6 percent boost to homeland security programs, domestic programs would have to be squeezed. Moderate Republicans are again balking. … At least half a dozen moderate Republicans have declared their opposition to the budget, as written, and with Democrats united in opposition, GOP leaders cannot afford many more defections." But "conservatives are just as resolute that Republicans hold the line on spending, lest the GOP's base voters abandon a party that has overseen the most dramatic fiscal shift from surpluses to deficits in the nation's history."

DOJ_NMG_0025102

Democrats Evoke "Do Nothing Congress" Nickname. Congress plans to meet fewer days this year than in 1948, when President Harry Truman dubbed the body the "Do Nothing Congress." The Washington Times (4/4, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "The average number of days lawmakers spend in session has dwindled over the decades, but legislators are on track to be in Washington fewer than 130 days in 2006. … Democrats, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, are evoking the nickname as they try to win back control." The Times adds, "Sean Spicer, spokesman for the House Republican Conference, said the number of days members spend in Washington is not a good indicator of the quality of work. … Rep. Thelma Drake, Virginia Republican, argued that this Congress has been more effective than previous ones, pointing to recent bills changing bankruptcy, energy and immigration policy."

Bush, Senate At Impasse Over Social Security, Medicare Trustees. The New York Times (4/4, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush and the Senate are at an impasse over the appointment of trustees for Social Security and Medicare, crippling the panel that supervises the two programs. This, in turn, has delayed the annual reports on the financial condition of the programs, which together account for more than one-third of all federal spending. Under federal law, the reports are supposed to be sent to Congress by April 1." The Times adds, "Since 2000, Social Security and Medicare have had two public trustees: John L. Palmer, former dean of the Maxwell School at Syracuse University, and Thomas R. Saving, an economist at Texas A&M." Their terms "have expired, and Mr. Bush has renominated them, but the Senate has taken no action. Senate leaders of both parties say they want to follow the precedent of having the public trustees serve no more than one term." But "the White House said Monday that the Senate should approve the president's nominees. … In the absence of public trustees, the administration has delayed sending the 2006 reports to Congress."

Firms Try To Save Conflict Of Interest Changes In Pension Bill. Financial services companies want to preserve a provision in a pension bill to repeal some conflict of interest rules, making it easier for all street firms to sell financial products to pension funds. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports, "The provision, pushed by the Securities Industries Association and Fidelity Investments, is in the House version of the pension bill, but is opposed by Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, a member of the House-Senate conference committee. … The section of the pension bill dealing with conflicts of interest is one of several stumbling blocks to a compromise. While the Bush administration hasn't taken a formal position on the provision, the Labor Department has been advising conferees on the need to narrow the change, according to committee staff."

Survey Finds Americans Confident, Naive About Retirement Prospects. New research indicates that Americans remain confident about their retirement prospects, but the Wall Street Journal (4/4, Greene, 2.11M) reports that they may be "dangerously naïve" about the subject. The Retirement Confidence Survey, which is scheduled for release today by the Employee Benefit Research Institute notes that while 40% of working couples are covered by traditional pension plans, 61% of surveyed workers "expect to get income from such a plan in retirement." The Journal adds, "The responses in the survey, conducted annually for the past 16 years, reflect few worries about the spreading curtailment of pension plans. Twenty-four percent of the survey's participants said that they are very confident that they will have enough money to live comfortably in retirement -- virtually the same number as last year -- and 44% of those surveyed said they are somewhat confident about their financial prospects in later life, an increase of four percentage points from last year."

51 Federal Agencies Have Offered Cash Buyouts Since 2002. The Washington Post (4/4, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Since November 2002, 51 federal agencies -- about half of the executive branch -- have offered cash buyouts and early retirements to reshape their workforces, according to a recently released report from congressional auditors. The findings confirm what many federal employees have suspected -- that buyout offers have been increasing in recent years. The report by the Government Accountability Office counted at least 22,600 employees who left the government after accepting a buyout, early-out or combined package during fiscal years 2003 through 2005."

Stem Cell Research Spreads Despite Federal Funding Limits. Stem cell research in the US is gaining steam despite President Bush's decision over four years ago to limit public funding for studies of embryonic stem cells. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Regaldo, 2.11M) reports that according to the NIH, "the federal government's spending on such research hit a high of more than $37 million last year, according to the National Institutes of Health. … Last year, NIH grants and contracts supported about 154 research projects involving the administration-approved stem cells."

DOJ_NMG_0025103

Bush Throws First Pitch On Opening Day In Cincinnati. All three networks last night reported on President Bush throwing the first pitch for the Reds' opening game against the Cubs. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 11, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "drew a standing ovation," adding "Bush continues a tradition that began in 1910, with President William Howard Taft." The CBS Evening News (4/3, story 9, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Taking the mound in Cincinnati was Number 43, right-hander George W. Bush, called up from Washington to throw out the first pitch as the Reds played the Cubs. The President described his toss as kind of a slow ball, but it did have a nice arc to it." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 10, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) said, "Marking the occasion today, former Texas Rangers owner and current President of the United States, George W. Bush. He was accompanied to the mound at Cincinnati's opener against the Cubs by two Iraq war veterans, and the father of a fallen veteran in the war in Afghanistan."

The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that "Bush, whose political world of late has been as chilly as Cincinnati's 50-degree opening day temperature, landed his pitch in the vicinity of home plate, despite a stiff breeze. It was just wide enough to be considered a brushback on a right-handed hitter."

The New York Times (4/4, Times, 1.19M) reports, "Even President Bush's most ardent supporters concede he has been having a hard time getting many pitches over the plate in recent months. He came closer on Monday." The Reds' new chief executive, Bob Castellini, "was one of the investors with whom Mr. Bush bought the Texas Rangers in 1989."

The Washington Times (4/4, Dinan, 90K) says Bush became "the first sitting president to throw the opening pitch in the home of the first professional baseball club." The Washington Post (4/4, A21, Frommer, 744K) reports the White House "has not said whether Bush will do the honors at the Nationals' home opener next Tuesday."

Book Challenges Allegation First Lady Used Drugs. The Washington Times (4/4, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that in his new book "Laura Bush: An Intimate Portrait of the First Lady," author Ronald Kessler takes on kitty Kelley's "claims about past drug use by first lady Laura Bush. In her book, Mrs. Kelley claimed Mrs. Bush was 'known in her college days [at Southern Methodist University] as a go-to girl for dime bags of marijuana.' The charge provoked uproarious laughter among Mrs. Bush's friends from SMU, according to Mr. Kessler's book, which is the first biography of the first lady to be written with White House cooperation. 'If she was the go-to, I missed that,' Mr. Kessler quotes Pamela Nelson, Mrs. Bush's Theta Kappa Alpha sorority sister at SMU. 'I was there. She was the go-to for a lot of things that were uplifting.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Manufacturing Activity Declined In March. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "A closely watched reading of the manufacturing sector weakened in March, but still points to solid economic growth in the months ahead." The Institute for Supply Management "said its index of manufacturing activity dropped to 55.2 in March from 56.7 in February, pushed lower by a decline in new orders and employment. Nevertheless, readings over 50 indicate expansion, so the data suggest that the nation's factories in March enjoyed a 34th consecutive month of growth. At 55.2, the ISM index for March was only slightly lower than the 55.4 monthly average over the past year."

Rise In Long-Term Interest Rates Could Slow Economy. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, A1, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "After stubbornly resisting nearly two years of prodding by the Federal Reserve, long-term interest rates are on the rise, a trend that could eventually slow the nation's expansion. Yesterday, the yield on the 10-year US. Treasury note -- the foundation for long-term interest rates -- rose as high as 4.905%, matching a two-year peak set in May 2004. Some analysts believe the yield is on a run that will take it above 5%." The upturn, "spurred by deepening economic growth in the US and abroad, is pushing up the cost of a widening range of consumer and business loans -- including 30-year mortgages and corporate bonds -- from extraordinarily low levels."

Gasoline Prices Rise To $2.59 For Regular Unleaded. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 10, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Energy Department reports that the price of gasoline shot up nine cents to $2.59 for regular unleaded. That's the highest price since late October, when one-third of the nation's oil-refining capacity was offline because of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Mufson, 744K) says that "with political tensions propping up crude oil prices and oil demand running strong in the United States and rising in China, gasoline prices could remain at these levels for the foreseeable future."

Electric Bills Not Expected To Rise Much This Summer. USA Today (4/4, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Finally, some good news for consumers about energy prices. With electricity costs expected to be up only slightly this summer from last, air conditioning bills likely will not be a shock to the wallet this year, according to data from the Energy Department." The nationwide average retail electricity price "is expected to be up 3% during June, July and August from the same time in 2005. That's about in line with inflation and follows a 4.3% gain last summer, according to the Energy Information Administration, the statistical arm of the Energy Department."

DOJ_NMG_0025104

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. USA Today/AP (4/4, Wang) reports that yesterday "the Dow gained 35.62 points, or 0.3%, to 11,144.94, after ending the first quarter Friday with a 3.7% gain. Broader stock indicators were mixed. The S&P 500 rose 2.98 points, or 0.2%, to 1297.81. The Nasdaq dropped 3.05 points, or 0.1%, to 2336.74." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Patterson, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

Some In Hollywood Critical Of Hillary Clinton. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, Daunt, 958K) reports, "Depending on whom you talk to in Hollywood these days, Hillary Clinton is either too conservative, too polarizing, too famous, too stiff or -- keep this to yourself! -- too sexy. And those are just the opinions of the celebrities who vote Democrat. (Don't even ask what the few Republicans had to say.)" The Times adds, "Once the darling of the industry's liberal set, Clinton has come under attack from some as she starts to line up support for what many feel will be a run for the presidential nomination." The "chatter started quietly last year, when the Hollywood political crowd began speculating that Clinton could be a 2008 contender. … For months, few were willing to say anything negative on the record, for fear of offending Clinton and her husband," but "Hollywood is a fickle place; behind-the-scenes feuding and gossiping are just part of the game."

Clinton Challenger To Launch Fundraising Drive. The New York Times (4/4, Healy, 1.19M) reports, "John Spencer, the former Yonkers mayor running against Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, is planning a 30-state fund-raising drive to try to rally the national Republican Party to defeat her re-election bid this year, and has already secured support from some prominent conservatives." Even though Spencer "is still competing for the Republican Party's nomination against another candidate, Kathleen Troia McFarland, a former spokeswoman in the Reagan Pentagon, some conservatives have signaled early support for him." They "include Senator George Allen, a Virginia Republican who is seen as a possible presidential candidate, and Representative Tom Feeney, a Florida Republican who is chairman of the House Conservatives Fund, a political action committee, according to aides to all three men."

Bill Clinton To Help DNC Effort To Boost State Parties. The Washington Times (4/4, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Former President Bill Clinton has signed on to help Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean's drive to revitalize state Democratic parties across the country." Clinton "will begin the effort next week, by hosting an April 10 fundraiser for the DNC." The Times adds, "The former president reportedly had doubts about Mr. Dean's plan, but was convinced of the project's value and agreed to lend his assistance after a February meeting with the DNC chairman."

Frist Team Reaches Out To Washington "Chattering Class." The Hill (4/4, Bolton) reports, "Allies of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) are waging a quiet campaign to rehabilitate his image among opinion makers to ensure that members of D.C.'s 'chattering class' who mold the national conventional wisdom do not dismiss his presidential prospects." Frist" had breakfast with a small group of political handicappers last week and recently sat down with The New York Times to discuss his 2008 hopes. And his staff last month sent an e-mail to supporters asking them to rank Frist first and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) last in a survey gauging support for the top Republican presidential hopefuls, according to a copy obtained by The Hill." The Hill adds, "On Friday, too, his senior staff met with a handful of conservative leaders to assuage their concerns about the slow progress of President Bush's judicial nominees through the Senate -- a process that has reached a near standstill since the confirmation of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court, according to familiar sources."

Allen's 2006 Challenger Is Friend Of McCain. The Hill (4/4, Allen) reports, "Sens. George Allen (Va.) and John McCain (Ariz.) could square off for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination -- if an old McCain friend doesn't get to Allen first." Former Navy Secretary James Webb, "one of McCain's 'oldest friends,' is vying for the Democratic nomination to take on Allen in his reelection bid this November. Although Webb must first get past lobbyist Harris Miller in the Democratic primary, political analysts say his candidacy could end up hampering Allen's presidential aspirations and bolstering McCain's. … Despite the longtime friendship between McCain and Webb, a former Republican, the Arizona senator said he is backing Allen. Even so, in an interview outside the Senate chamber last week, McCain called Webb 'a war hero' and 'a great patriot.'"

MoveOn Criticizes NBC For Refusing To Run Its Ads. The Hill (4/4, Young) reports, "Two NBC-owned television stations have refused to carry advertisements sponsored by MoveOn.org's PAC that accuse four incumbent Republicans of selling out to energy interests." WVIT-TV in Hartford, CT, and WCMH-TV in Columbus, OH, "will not air the ads, which target Republican Reps. Nancy Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0025105

(Conn.), Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Chris Chocola (Ind.) and Thelma Drake (Va.). NBC Universal, a unit of General Electric, owns both affiliates." MoveOn PAC said, "We expected Republicans to respond, but we didn't expect two local NBC stations owned by GE to refuse to run our ad. … This smells of NBC pursuing its own political agenda at the expense of free speech and balance." NBC Universal, WVIT and WCMH "did not respond to requests for comment by press time yesterday."

O'Connor To Join Board Of Rockefeller Foundation. Retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor will join the board of the Rockefeller foundation in June. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) reports, "Justice O'Connor will become one of 15 members of the board, which includes Raymond W. Smith, chairman of both Rothschild North America and Arlington Capital Partners, whose appointment was also announced. … In a statement, Justice O'Connor said the foundation was 'constructively involved in providing creative and insightful aid to vulnerable groups around the globe.'"

Deal May Be Close For Couric To Anchor CBS Evening News. The New York Times (4/4, Carter, 1.19M) reports, "CBS's long courtship of Katie Couric has moved close to a conclusion. A deal to recruit her away from NBC's 'Today' show and into the nightly anchor chair at CBS News may be completed as early as this week, people close to the negotiations said yesterday." The Washington Post (4/4, A1, Kurtz, 744K) says "NBC executives expect Katie Couric to leave the 'Today' show and accept an offer from CBS to become the first woman to anchor an evening newscast on her own, with an announcement of her departure likely as early as this week." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) runs a similar report.

USAF Cargo Plane Crashes, Nobody Killed. The New York Times (4/4, Wald, 1.19M) reports that the crash of a USAF C-5B Galaxy "near a runway at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware early this morning" caused several injuries among the 17 personnel aboard but no deaths. ABC World News Tonight (4/3, story 3, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the C-5 "was trying to make an emergency landing when it hit the ground." An Air Force spokeswoman said "she did not know what the emergency was, or what cargo was on board." The plane had been bound for "the Naval Air Station in Rota, Spain, and then Kuwait." NBC Nightly News (4/3, story 3, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) called the C-5 "one of the safest aircraft in the US Air Force."

Speech Patterns Seen As Key Influence In Presidential Vote. In his Washington Post column (4/4, A2), Richard Morin says, "What really may have decided the last presidential election" is that President Bush and Vice President Cheney "sounded more presidential than their Democratic counterparts. Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) seemed the most depressed or suicidal. And Kerry's running mate, Sen. John Edwards (N.C.), sounded the most like a 'girly man.'" Researchers at the University of Texas at Austin "collected transcripts of 271 televised interviews, news conferences, town hall meetings and candidate debates conducted in 2004. The speech samples -- more than 400,000 words in all -- were run through a computer text-analysis program."

Blix Says Iran Years Away From Nuclear Weapon. The AP (4/3) reported former IAEA head and UN weapons inspector Hans Blix "said Monday that Iran is at least five years away from developing a nuclear bomb, leaving time to peacefully negotiate a settlement. Blix…said he doubted the US would resort to invading Iran" and "said there is still time for dialogue over Iran's nuclear enrichment program, which Tehran insists is for peaceful purposes but the West fears is part of a secret nuclear weapons program."

In an analysis of Tehran's torpedo test over the weekend, the AFP (4/3) said Iran was "flexing its military muscle" and had warned "the West not to 'play with fire' at a time of mounting tensions over its nuclear program." The test "coincides with a critical phase in the dispute over its nuclear ambitions, which the United States alleges is cover for a weapons program. Tehran denies the charges and officials said the success of the war games showed that the Islamic republic would never back down in the atomic standoff."

Iran Tests New High-Speed Torpedoes. CNN's The Situation Room (4/3, Ensor) reported that Iran has tested "two new types of high-speed torpedoes, capable, Iran said, of going over 200 miles an hour underwater to hit a submarine at any depth and to break a surface warship in two. Tests came as part of a large Iranian naval exercise in the Gulf dubbed 'The Great Prophet.' Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman in a statement said, 'It is not surprising that they have tested this weapon.' He said, 'The Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities.'"

The Washington Times (4/4, Gertz, 90K) reports, "Iran tested an older Scud missile variant last week and often exaggerates its military developments, the Pentagon said yesterday in response to Tehran's reported testing of new advanced weaponry. 'We know that the Iranians are always trying to improve their weapons systems by both foreign and indigenous measures,' Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said." He added that "the Iranians have been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities."

DOJ_NMG_0025106

Missile Test Sparks Jump In Oil Futures. The Financial Times (4/4, Hoyos, Smyth) reports, "Crude oil prices jumped to their highest level since Hurricane Katrina on Monday amid uncertainty about Nigerian supplies and as Iran announced it had tested new weapons during war games in the Strait of Hormuz." Tehran's "declaration that it had test-fired a missile and a newly developed torpedo in the strait, the world's main oil shipping route, propelled Brent crude oil futures nearly $2 higher to $67.93 a barrel, before prices settled 93 cents higher at $66.84."

Launching Of Iranian Satellite Worries Government Analysts, Experts. The New York Times (4/4, Broad, Sanger, 1.19M) reports that "with last year's launching" of a satellite "and another planned in the next few weeks, Tehran has become the newest member of the international space club. The question now asked in Washington and other capitals is whether Iran's efforts are simply part of its drive to expand its technical prowess or an attempt to add another building block to its nuclear program. In that sense, it is the newest piece of the Iranian atomic puzzle." The Times adds, "To some government analysts and other experts in the West, Iran's space debut is potentially worrisome."

Iranian Bootleggers To Face 74 Lashes, Fine, Up To Year In Prison. The New York Times (4/4, Fathi, 1.19M) reports, "For more than 27 years, Iran's Islamic leaders have waged an uphill battle to cleanse the country of bootleg liquor. Since the 1979 revolution, the government has banned alcoholic drinks and frequently flogged those who drank them. The small community of Christians and Jews was exempted, but could not sell alcohol to Muslims." The Times adds, "In the latest effort to curb the widespread consumption and distribution of alcohol, the new conservative Parliament recently increased the punishment for selling or drinking it. Offenders still get 74 lashes, but now also receive a hefty fine and from three months to a year in prison, twice the maximum sentence than under the old law."

Rice's Wednesday Hill Testimony On India Nuclear Deal Previewed. The AP (4/3, Schweid) reported, "In a preview of the line" Secretary Rice "will take over two days of House and Senate testimony, [Spokesman Adam Ereli] acknowledged the deal had generated concern on Capitol Hill. Rice and other top administration officials, who have been buttonholing members of Congress for weeks, hope to build consensus for the agreement, Ereli said." The AP noted support for the deal will be complicated by two recent Iranian ship visits to Indian ports. The AP said Ereli "rejected the notion that the administration cut the deal with India to help build up the world's largest democracy as a counterweight to a rising China." Undersecretary Burns is quoted saying, "India can be trusted."

Venezuela Takes Control Of Oil Fields Operated By Foreign Companies. The Financial Times (4/4, Webb-Vidal) reports, "Venezuela has taken control of two oilfields operated by Eni and Total, the Italian and French energy companies, cranking up tensions with multinationals operating in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter." Rafael Ramírez, energy minister, "said on Monday the government had taken over the operations at the weekend because the two companies had failed to meet an April 1 deadline to comply with new legislation." The Wall Street Journal (4/4, Bahree, 2.11M) says "Venezuela stepped up its battle to extract more-favorable terms from big international oil companies." The two companies "said they had failed to reach an agreement with the government to cede majority ownership in the two fields -- called Jusepin and Dacion -- to Petróleos de Venezuela SA, or PdVSA, the state-owned oil company, by a deadline at the end of last month."

Chavez Said To Use Oil Revenues To Buy Influence. The New York Times (4/4, Forero, 1.19M) reports, "President Hugo Chávez is spending billions of dollars of his country's oil windfall on pet projects abroad, aimed at setting up his leftist government as a political counterpoint to the conservative Bush administration in the region." Chavez's "new spending has given more power to a leader who has been provocatively building a bulwark against what he has called American imperialistic aims in Latin America." The Times says Chavez "is more than an irritant. He is fast rising as the next Fidel Castro, a hero to the masses who is intent on opposing every move the United States makes, but with an important advantage" – oil revenue.

The AP (4/3, Toothaker) reported, "Chavez accused the United States of being behind an effort to make it appear that Venezuela has territorial designs on some countries in the region," including the Netherlands Antilles. He "has previously suggested the Dutch islands off Venezuela's coast could be used as a launching pad for a U.S. invasion. … Chavez insists his government is democratic and accuses Washington of conspiring against him. He says the United States was behind a short-lived 2002 coup."

UN Human Rights Envoy Protests His Exclusion From Sudan. The New York Times (4/4, Lacey, 1.19M) The government of Sudan today blocked a planned visit by the United Nations' top humanitarian official to the western Darfur region, prompting the official, Jan Egeland, to accuse Khartoum of attempting to hide the dire conditions there." The Sudanese Foreign Ministry said they delayed the visit to deconflict it with the birthday of the Prophet Mohammed. An official also said "it would not have been safe for Mr. Egeland, a Norwegian, to visit the country given the recent controversy over cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad published in a Danish newspaper." The Times says "relations between the Sudanese and the United Nations are particularly sensitive now because of the world body's plans later this year to take over the running of the African Union peacekeeping mission currently under way in Darfur." Although Egeland "has stopped short of calling the conflict a genocide, as the Bush administration has done, [he] has laid much of the blame for the suffering there at the feet of government officials."

DOJ_NMG_0025107

Taylor Enters Not Guilty Plea. The New York Times (4/4, Nichols, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "In his first appearance before a special international tribunal, Charles G. Taylor, the former Liberian president, pleaded not guilty to 11 counts of war crimes, but not before refusing to recognize the court's jurisdiction and accusing it of attempting to meddle in the region's affairs.'" The AP (4/4, Faul) adds, "The former Liberian president initially said he could not plead on the charges, which stem from his alleged role in Sierra Leone's civil war, because he did not recognize the court. ... But after Justice Richard Lussick insisted, Taylor said calmly: 'Most definitely, your honor, I did not and could not have committed those acts against the sister republic of Sierra Leone.'"

Russia Hopes To Weaken Western Influence In Former Soviet States. The Christian Science Monitor (4/4, Weir, 61K) reports that "Russia is mulling its options" in the post-Soviet neighborhood. Russia is heartened by the pro-Russian party's victory in Ukrainian parliamentary elections but fears the Ukrainian "insistence that it will apply for NATO membership as early as 2008." The Kremlin increasingly sees violent repression of protests, such as in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, and Belarus as "an acceptable alternative to more Ukraine-style pro-democracy shifts."

Melloan Urges Harder Line With Putin. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (4/4, Melloan, 2.11M) that President Bush needs to admit that "Vladimir Putin is a hopeless case for any help in promoting world peace and freedom." Russian behavior in Iran and Iraq suggests that Putin "has never quite acknowledged that the Cold War is over."

EU Resents Polish Push For Strong US Ties. The Washington Times (4/4, Borowiec, 90K) reports that the conservative new Polish government has annoyed the EU "with an assertive anti-Russian, pro-American foreign policy" that undermines EU efforts at unanimity. Polish officials believe "the United States is much better able than the European Union to offer military security to Poland and other former Warsaw Pact members."

US-China Trade To Take Center Stage. The USA Today (4/4, 2.31M) reports that several "politically charged events" in April will make US-Chinese trade discussion central. They include "the April 20 summit [of Bush and Hu], a high-level meeting of the countries' Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade and the expected release of a U.S. Treasury Department report that could for the first time accuse China of manipulating its currency." However, China specialist Nicholas Lardy says that "Bush lacks leverage to compel action," given American indebtedness to China.

Berlusconi And Prodi Clash In Debate. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) reports that the Italian rivals "traded insults and statistics" in their second televised debate. They discussed numerous issues, "but the economy was the topic the two repeatedly discussed." Incumbent Berlusconi is "trailing in the polls by at least three percentage points."

Thai PM Hails Vote. The New York Times (4/4, Fuller, 1.19M) reports that Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra "claimed victory on Monday in national elections, which were boycotted by opposition groups." In a concession to the opposition, he "offered to set up an independent committee to judge his fitness to rule." The Times reports that "data from the Election Commission indicated that about 10 million voters checked the 'abstain' box on their ballots, a record number that opposition groups said showed the depth of disaffection."

London Mayor Demands US Ambassador Pay Traffic Congestion Charge. The Los Angeles Times (4/4, McWalters, 958K) reports that London Mayor Ken Livingstone "has people on both sides of the Atlantic tut-tutting over his latest accusation: that the U.S. ambassador, whom the mayor called a 'car salesman,' is behaving like a 'chiseling little crook' by refusing to pay traffic charges." Livingstone demanded over the weekend that Ambassador Robert H. Tuttle and other U.S. Embassy commuters "pay the $14 charge to enter central London by car." The fee is known as a "congestion charge." British officials say the embassy staff members owe about $250,000 in fines for refusing to pay the fee." US officials in London "say they consider the fee a tax, from which they are exempt under the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. … The US Embassy would not comment on Livingstone's complaint."

Pakistan Criticized For Seeking To Silence Women's Advocate. In his New York Times column (4/4), Nicholas Kristof profiles Pakistani women's advocate Mukhtar Mai, who "has become an international celebrity. Her autobiography is the No. 3 best seller in France and is coming out this fall in the U.S., movies are being made about her, and she has been praised by dignitaries like Laura Bush and the French foreign minister." But "best of all, her campaign is really working: more women seem to be prosecuting rapes and acid attacks, and there's some evidence that such violence is dropping. But partly because of her success, there's a good chance that Mukhtar will be murdered." President Pervez Musharraf "seems to feel that Mukhtar is casting a spotlight on Pakistan's dark side, so he is leading an effort to bully her into silence."

DOJ_NMG_0025108

Schroder Criticized For Gazprom Deal, Gag Order. The New York Times (4/4, 1.19M) says in an editorial that a Hamburg court "confirmed a gag order yesterday that reins in a German politician's criticism of the former chancellor, Gerhard Schröder, for taking a lucrative job as head of a Russian-led gas pipeline project." Guido Westerwelle, leader of the Free Democrats, "is no longer permitted to say" that Schröder "cut a deal on the project with the Russian gas giant Gazprom while he was chancellor and then went to work for Gazprom immediately on leaving office. Now it emerges that Mr. Schröder's government guaranteed financing of more than a billion dollars for the pipeline. Mr. Schröder insists that he knew nothing about that." Like "many other politicians who can't wait to cash in on their public service, Mr. Schröder seems not to understand — or pretends he doesn't — that 'wrong' is not the same as 'illegal.'"

Treasury Department Praised For Branding Hezbollah TV Station. The Wall Street Journal (4/4, 2.11M) says in an editorial that "between 10 and 15 million Arabic speakers in Europe, North Africa and the Middle East tune into Al-Manar (the Beacon), the television channel produced in Beirut by the terrorist group Hezbollah. The station's purpose, an Al-Manar official told researcher Avi Jorisch of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, is to 'help people on the way to committing what you call in the West a suicide mission.'" That's why "it's good news that last month the Treasury Department named Al-Manar as a Specially Designated Global Terrorist entity. The designation prohibits financial transactions with Al-Manar and its parent company, the Lebanese Media Group, and enables the government to level penalties against U.S. financial institutions (or foreign institutions that transact business in the U.S.) doing business with them."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"DeLay Quits His Drive For Re-Election."
"Bruins Are Gator Bait."
"The Right Sound For The Scene."
"Terrorist A Step Closer To Death."
"Lab-Grown Bladders Successful In Humans."
"New Battle On The Home Front."
"Pellicano Inquiry Expands To Snare Director Of 'Predator.'"

USA Today:
"DeLay To Drop Out Of Race, House."
"Medicine Goes Mobile: The House Call Returns."

New York Times:
"DeLay Is Quitting Race And House, Reports Assert."
"Justices Decline Terrorism Case Of A US Citizen."
"Jurors Permit Death Penalty For Moussaoui."
"An Immigration Debate Framed By Family Ties."
"Chavez Uses Aid To Win Support In The Americas."
"With Yoga, Comedy And Parties, Synagogues Entice Newcomers."

Washington Post:
"DeLay To Resign From Congress."
"Moussaoui Found Eligible For Death."
"Gas Prices Up Sharply Ahead Of Peak Season."
"CBS Prepares To Land A New Anchor."
"First Bladders Grown In Lab Transplanted."
"On IM, Keeping Tabs And Keeping Up Appearances."

Washington Times:
"Death OK'd For Moussaoui"
"Boycott Set To Support Illegals."
"Nats Fall To Mets In Season Opener."
"DeLay To Quit Campaign, Step Down From Congress."
"Obesity is A Growing Road Hazard For Children."
"Phone Menus Press Callers' Hot Buttons."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM Shows Its Faith In Wagoner."
"$2.65? Gas Is A Bargain For Now."
"Cancer Program On Shaky Grounds."
"State To Get Language Grant."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"9/11 Plotter Eligible For Death."
"Theater Trailer For 'United 93 A Painful Jolt For Some Viewers."
"Embattled DeLay Says He'll Leave Congress."
"'My Fellow Italians' – Turner Kin's Hat In Faraway Ring."

Houston Chronicle:
"Embattled DeLay Will Quit The Race."
"Many Show Interest In Seat."
"Astros Bask With Big Assist From The Fans."
"Jury Finds Moussaoui Eligible For Execution."
"Defense Witness Testifies Perjury Was Committed."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Moussaoui Verdict; Midwest Tornadoes; Cargo Plane Crash; Iraq-US KIAs; Rice-Iraq; Carroll Homecoming;

DOJ_NMG_0025109

Tornado Season; Tax Preparer Mistakes; Airline Quality; Gas Prices; Bush-First Pitch; Regenerative Medicine.
CBS: Moussaoui Verdict; 9/11 Victim-Parents; Carroll Homecoming; Iraq-US KIAs; Midwest Tornadoes; Cargo Plane Crash; Standardized Testing- Scoring Pressures; Los Angeles-Klimt Painting; Bush-First Pitch; NCAA-Wheelchair Basketball Championship.
NBC: Midwest Tornadoes; Moussaoui Verdict; Cargo Plane Crash; Iraq-US KIAs; Rice-Iraq; Carroll Homecoming; Tax Preparer Cheating; Red Cross Reform; Airline Quality; Bush-First Pitch; Undersized Car Seats.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: DeLay Resignation; Moussaoui Sentencing; NCAA Men's Championship; TN-Tornadoes.
CBS: DeLay Resignation; Moussaoui Sentencing; TN-Tornadoes; NCAA Men's Championship; Bonds-Steroid Use; Wall Street.
NPR: DeLay Resignation; TN-Tornadoes; Belarus-Lukashenko Swearing In; Foreign Stock Markets; Sudan-Aid Efforts; Moussaoui Sentencing; NCAA Men's Championship; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a meeting on health care initiatives, Roosevelt Room; attends Republican National Committee Finance luncheon, Closed press. Evermay, 1623 28th St. NW.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Meets with youth at a Helping America's Youth event, St. Charles, Mo.; speaks at a Jim Talent for Senate luncheon, St. Louis.

US Senate: 10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Strategic Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the missile defense programs. Defense Undersecretary Eric S. Edelman; Gen. James E. Cartwright, commander, U.S. Strategic Command; Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director, Missile Defense Agency; David W. Duma, acting director, Operational Test and Evaluation, DoD. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

10 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on money laundering and terrorist financing threats. Undersecretary of the Treasury Stuart Levy; Undersecretary of State E. Anthony Wayne; James Burris, Jr., FBI; Kevin Delli-Colli, DHS. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on aviation security. Assistant DHS Secretary Edmund Hawley; Cathleen Berrick, GAO; Gregory Principato, Airports Council International-North America. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on the costs of tax preparations for taxpayers. Michael Brostek, Director, Strategic Issues Team, GAO; Paul R. Desaulniers, Special Agent, GAO; Christine A. Hodakievic, Special Agent, GAO; Bert DuMars, Director, Electronic Tax Administration, IRS; Nina E. Olson, National Taxpayer Advocate, Taxpayer Advocate Service; Robert A. Weinberger, Member, Free File Alliance, LLC; Francis X. Degen, EA, President, National Association of Enrolled Agents; Harley Duncan, Executive Director, Federation of Tax Administrators. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Internatioknal Operations and Terrorism Subcommittee. Closed briefing on counterterrorism priorities. Location: Room S-407, Capitol.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Fu7ll Committee. Markup of FY06 supplemental appropriations for hurricane relief and operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Personnel Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 budget for health benefits for military personnel. Air Force Vice Chief of Staff Gen. John Corley; Undersecretary of Defense David Chu; Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed hearing on intelligence issues. Members only. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Housing and Transportation Subcommittee. Hearing on the reform of the FHA's Title I Manufacturered Housing Loan Programs. Assistant HUD Secretary Brian Montgomery; Michael Frenz, Ginnie Mae; Kevin Clayton, Clayton Homes. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Seapower Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the U.S. Transportation Command. Gen. Norton Schwartz, commander of the command, and Gen. Duncan McNabb, commander, Air Mobility Command. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. Meets for morning hour and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (6 bills): 1) H.J.Res. 81 - Providing for the appointment of Phillip Frost as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 2) H.J.Res. 82 - Providing for the reappointment of Alan G. Spoon as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; 3) H.Con.Res. 355 - Recognizing the benefits and importance of school-based music education, and for other purposes; 4) H.Res. 703 - Recognizing the 20th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster and supporting continued efforts to control radiation and mitigate the adverse health consequences related to the Chernobyl nuclear power plant; 5) H.Res. 744 - Expressing support for the Good Friday Agreement of 1998 as the blueprint for lasting peace in Northern Ireland and support for continued police reform in Northern Ireland as a critical element in the peace process; 6) H.Res. 692 - Commending the people of the Republic of the Marshall Islands for the contributions and sacrifices they made to the United States nuclear testing program in the Marshall Islands, solemnly acknowledging the first detonation of a hydrogen bomb by the United States on March 1, 1954, on the Bikini Atoll in the Marshall Islands, and remembering that 60 years ago the United States began its nuclear testing program in the Marshall Islands.

DOJ_NMG_0025110

9 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Projection Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on the U.S. shipbuilding industry. Acting Undersecretary of Defense Gary Powell; Deputy Assistant Navy Secretary Allison Stiller; Vice Adm. Paul E. Sullivan, commander, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rear Adm. Charles S. Hamilton II, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rick Self, National Shipbuilding Research Program; Cynthia L. Brown, American Shipbuilding Association; Mark L. Montroll, National Defense University. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Supreme Court. Justices Anthony Kennedy and Clarence Thomas. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on sexual predators and the Internet. Sharon Cooper, University of North Carolina; Justin Berry, Bakersfield, Calif.; Ken Gourlay, Royal Oak, Mich.; Ernie Allen, executive director, National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Alexandria, Va.; Parry Aftab, executive director, Wired Safety, Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y.; Shannon Sullivan, teen angel, Wired Safety, Irvington-on-Hudson, N.Y.; Teri Schoeder, president and program director, I Safe America, Carlsbad, Calif.; Moni Sallam, mentor, Safe America, Carlsbad, Calif. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Hearing on visa processing delays. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Tony Edson; Jess T. Ford, GAO; Yo-Yo Ma, artistic director, The Silk Road Project Inc.; Sandra L. Gibson, president and CEO, Association of Performing Arts Presenters; Dennis J. Slater, president, Association of Equipment Manufacturers; Kevin Schofield, general manger, Strategy and Communications, Microsoft Research; Elizabeth C. Dickson,Ingersoll-Rand Co. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Concsitution Subcommittee. Hearing on lobbying reform. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

12 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Commercial and Administrative Law Subcommittee. and Constitution Subcommittee. Joint hearing on government acquisition of personal information bought through information resellers. Linda D. Koontz, GAO; Maureen Cooney, acting chief privacy officer, Homeland Security Department; Peter Swire, Moritz College of Law, Ohio State University; Stuart Pratt, president and CEO, Consumer Data Industry Association. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on defense health programs. Location: Room H-143, Capitol.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Office of Science and Technology Policy. Location: Room H-309, Capitol.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Tactical Air and Land Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on combat systems and protection initiatives. Paul L. Francis, GAO; Janet St. Laurent, GAO; Mike Gilmore, CBO; Assistant Army Secretary Claude M. Bolton; Army Deputy Chiefs of Staff Lt. Gen. David F. Melcher and Lt. Gen. James J. Lovelace; Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, commanding general, Marine Corps Combat Development Command. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Hearing on federal workforce issues regarding airport security. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on NRC facility standards since 9/11. Jim Wells, GAO; Nils Diaz, chairman, Nuclear Regulatory Commission; Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal; Danielle Brian, executive director, Project of Government Oversight; Marvin Fetel, vice president and chief nuclear officer, Nuclear Energy Institute; Chris Crane, president and chief nuclear officer, Exxon Generation Co. LLC. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Highways, Transit and Pipelines Subcommittee. Hearing on reliability of Highway Trust Fund revenue estimates. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Foreign Operations, Export Financing and Related Programs Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 budget for the State Department. Secretary Rice. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to set rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

4 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on agency cooperation in the war on terrorism. Joint Chiefs of

DOJ_NMG_0025111

Staff Vice Chairman Adm. Edmund Giambastiani; Amb. Henry Crumpton; Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, National Counterterrorism Center. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

5 p.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Telecommunications and the Internet Subcommittee. Markup. of miscellaneous business. Location: Room 2123, Rayburn.

Other: GERMAN FOREIGN MINISTER FRANK-WALTER STEINMEIER _ Highlights: Schedule includes discussions with senators, a noon news conference and dinner with Secretary of State Rice. Details have not been announced.

PAKISTANI INTERIOR MINISTER AFTAB AHMAD KAHAN SHERPAO _ Highlights: 10 a.m. Meets with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. 11:30 a.m. Meets with Attorney General Gonzales. 1:30 p.m. Meets with Deputy National Securit6y Adeviser J.D. Crouch. White House. 2:45 p.m. Meets with Amb. at Large John Miller. 3:45 p.m. Meerts with Deputy DEA Administrator Michele Leonhart. 5 p.m. Meets with Rep. Ed Royce. Room 2202, Rayburn. 6 p.m. Meets with Undersecretary of Defense Eric Edelman, Pentagon.

BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION _ The Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL-CIO, holds its 2006 Legislative Conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Reps. Robert Simmons, R-Conn.; Steny Hoyer, D-Md.; Stephanie Tubbs Jones, D-Ohio; and Linda Sanchez, D-Calif. John Sweeney, president, AFL-CIO; and Sen. john McCain, R-Ariz. Location: Washington Hilton and Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

HISPANIC BUSINESSES _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce (USHCC) holds its 16th Annual Legislative Conference Immigration reform, telecommunications reform, and advancing federal procurement opportunities are among the key issues that will receive top billing at this years legislative conference. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. Immigration Summit. Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas; Representatives Jim Kolbe and Luis Gutierrez, and Mexican Ambassador Carlos de Icaza will participate. 9:30 a.m. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas. 1 p.m. White House brefing with keynote address by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. 5:15 p.m. Political party briefing with Reps. Joe Baca, Lincoln Diaz-Balart, Luis Fortuno, others. Reagan Trade Center. Location: Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CHINA-INDUSTRIAL SUBSIDIES _ 9 a.m. - 5 p.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission holds a public hearing to assess China's compliance with its World Trade Organization accession on subsidies, examine what constitutes China's subsidy regime, evaluate the level of transparency of China's economic planning process, and identify how China's industrial subsidies negatively or positively affect U.S. companies, investors or workers. Location: Room 2325, Rayburn House Office Building.

CLIMATE-GREENHOUSE GASES _ 9:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Senate Energy & Natural Resources Committees hosts a group of panelists comprised of government, business, and environmental organizations for a bipartisan discussion on climate and how Congress might go about creating a mandatory trading program to control US greenhouse gas emissions. Location: Room G-50, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

JOHANNS _ 8 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks at the Government Performance Summit. Location: Wyndham City Center Hotel, 1143 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

IMMIGRATION SURVEY _ 9 a.m. Pew Hispanic Center Directort Roberto Suro and Pew Research Center Presidenty Andrew Kohut hold a briefing on a new survey on immigration. Location: St. Regis Hotel, 16th and K Sts. NW.

IMMIGRATION-CIVIC ACTION _ 9:30 a.m. Organizers of the March 25 immigration march and rally in Los Angeles hold a news conference to announce their next national action. Location: National Press Club.

MEHLMAN-DENTAL ASSOCIATION _ 10:30 a.m. Republican National Chairman Ken Mehlman addresses the American Dental Association. Location: J.W. Marriott Hotel, Grand Ballroom, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

FINANCIAL LITERACY _ 11 a.m. Treasury Secretary Snow and US Treasurer Anna Cabral, others, launch the National Strategy for Financial Literacy. Location: Room 4121, main Treasury.

WEINBERGER FUNERAL _ 11 a.m. Funeral for Caspar Weinberger. Location: Section 30, Arlington National Cemetery.

SMITH-HUMAN RIGHTS _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., addresses students at American University's Washington College of Law on how to implement a bipartisan approach to human rights. Location: Room 600 of the law school, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

BOEHNER _ 11:30 a.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

CHAMBLISS _ 11:30 a.m. Sen. Saxby Chambliss holds a telephone briefing on immigration reform. Notes: Callin number: 888-396-9929; passcode: Chambliss.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 11:30 a.m. Sens. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., others, hold a press conference on comprehensive immigration reform and the need for improved border security. Location: Senate Radio/TV Gallery.

TERRORISM _ 11:30 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a panel discussion on the transatlantic dialogue on terrorism, with Daniel Benjamin, Marc Sageman, Karin von Hippel and Julianne Smith, all of CSIS. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0025112

HEALTH CARE SAVINGS _ 12 p.m. Bob Litan, a scholar at both the Kauffman Foundation and the Brookings Institution. holds a briefing to present findings from a recent report on how accelerated broadband deployment in the United States could deliver hundreds of billions of dollars to the U.S. economy. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn House Office Building.

HOYER _ 12 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

INTELLIGENCE SUPPORT-MILITARY _ 12 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a meeting on ``Intelligence Support to the Military." Speakers include Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif.; and John McLaughlin, senior fellow, Merrill Center for Srategic Studies, SAIS; former acting director of the CIA. Location: Council on Foreign Relations, 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SENATE-LOUISIANA _ 12:15 p.m. Senate Louisiana delegation and state political leaders will join in urging the Senate to include funding for hurricane protection levees and Louisiana housing in the Supplemental Appropriations bill. Location: Senate Swamp.

DEMOCRATS _ 12:30 p.m. The Democratic Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-211, Capitol. Notes: Gallery escort leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

REPUBLICANS _ 12:30 p.m. The Senate Republican Policy Committee holds a closed meeting. Location: Room S-207, Capitol. Notes: Gallery escort leaves at 11:30 a.m. from the Ohio Clock Corridor.

WHISTLEBLOWERS _ 12:30 p.m. Presentation of the annual Ridenhour Awards to recognize whistleblowers. Location: National Press Club.

US-INDONESIA _ 1:40 p.m. Joint news conference with USTR Rob Portman and Indonesian Trade Minister Mari Pangestu. Location: USTR, 600 17th St. NW.

FAIR HOUSING _ 2 p.m. HUD Secretary Jackson, others, kick off Fair Housing Month. Location: HUD cafeteria, 451 7th St. SW.

DEMOCRATS-SECURITY _ 2:15 p.m. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, Congresswoman Hilda L. Solis, Chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, and Congresswoman Ellen Tauscher, Member of the House Armed Services Committee, will join first responders at a press conference tomorrow to discuss ``Real Security: A Democratic Plan to Secure America and Restore Our Image in the World." Location: Room HC-9, Capitol.

GOP LEADERSHIP _ 3:45 p.m. House Speaker Dennis Hastert joins House Republican Leaders to discuss Border Security, Budget Reform, and 527 Reform. Location: Room H-230 (balcony area), Capitol.

GOP-ENVIRONMENT _ 4:30 p.m. Senator Chaffee and Congressman Boehlert hold an event with Republicans for Environmental Protection. Location: Russell Park.

JOURNALISTS HONORED _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University honors journalists Anne Garrels of NPR, George Packer of The New Yorker, Christiane Amanpour of CNN and Doonesbury creator Garry Trudeau. After the presentation, Amanpour and others will hold a panel discussion on Iraq. Location: Bunn Center auditorium, Georgetown University.

WHITE HOUSE PRESS _ 8 p.m. - 9 p.m. American University's School of Communication will hosts a panel discussion titled, ``The White House Press Corps: Then and Now." Panelists include: Alexis Simendinger, White House correspondent, National Journal; Helen Thomas, Hearst News Service reporter and dean of the White House Corps; Kenneth T. Walsh, Chief White House correspondent, U.S. News & World Report; and Mark McDonald, program director, WAMU 88.5 FM and AU School of Communication broadcast journalist in residence. Location: Mary Graydon Center, University Club, 4400 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

Johansen, Janine (CIV)

From: Johansen, Janine (CIV)

Sent: Tuesday, April 04, 2006 9:21 AM

To: Baroukh, Nader (DHS); Kelliher, Brian (DHS); Levy, Andrew (DHS); Rosenberg, Ron; Wiggins, Mike (DHS); Calvert, Chris (CIV); Christian, Forrest (CIV); Clement, Paul D; Eisenberg, John; Garvey, Vincent (CIV); Gilligan, Jim (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Henry, Terry (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Johansen, Janine (CIV); Katerberg, Robert (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kline, David (CIV); Lawrence, Craig (USADC); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Loeb, Robert (CIV); Marcus, Jonathan L; Marshall, C. Kevin; Miller, Eric (CIV); Monheim, Thomas; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Noronha, Preeya (CIV); Okun, Robert; Patterson, Nicholas (CIV); Perez, Marc (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Salmons, David B; Schwartz, James (CIV); Swingle, Sharon (CIV); Warden, Andrew (CIV); White, Ned (CIV); Becker, Grace Chung; Blazewick, CDR Robert; Bond, Kent; Boomer, MAJ Jane E.; Cdr. Crisfield; Das, Himamauli; Delicante, Tony; Haley, Lt. Lauren; Leff, Capt Oren; Lowery, LTC Kermit; McGarrah, RADM James; McPalmer, CDR Theresa; Mehrer, Bert W.; Miller, Charles S; Price, Capt. Eric C.; Rodriguez-Feo, LCDR Armando; Roehrkasse, Brian; Scolinos, Tasia; Smith, Cynthia; Steinbeck, Maj. Carl; Taylor, TSgt Barbara; Wiegmann, Brad; Wolf, Lt. Ian P.; Dolan, JoAnn; Ferry, Jonathan; Haines, Avril; Martinez, John; Matt Lavine; McNally, Richard; Padmanabhan, Vijay; Barnes, Maj. Kevin; beaverd@dodgc.osd.mil; Brasure, Ian; Couch, LtCol V. Stuart; Davis, Col. Morris D.; French, Christina; galvin, R; Heckerk@dodgc.osd.mil; Hyams, Ross; Jimenez, Frank; loftusk@dodgc.osd.mil; Parke, LTC Stephen; Pearson, Randy; Shawn Gray; Stroble, Kelvin M.; taittj@dodgc.osd.mil; Vitale, LTC Dale T.; wildermp@dodgc.osd.mil

Subject: GTMO Filings

Attachments: Alsaaei Motion for Exedited Entry of PO - Prop Order.pdf; Alsaaei Motion for Exedited Entry of PO.pdf; Al Darby Motion for Expedited Entry of PO - Prop Order.pdf; Al Darby Motion for Expedited Entry of PO.pdf; Khan Motion for Entry of Protective Order - Prop Order.pdf; Khan Motion for Entry of Protective Order.pdf; Khan Motion for Entry of Protective Order - Memorandum.pdf; Order staying J Huvelle cases 3-31-06.pdf; Awad Pets Motion for Entry of PO REPLY.pdf; Said opp - request for expedited ruling.pdf

Please see attached filings in the following GTMO cases:

1) Alsaaei -- Motion for Expedited Entry of Protective Order (no exhibits attached) (3/31/06)

2) Al Darby -- Motion for Expedited Entry of Protective Order (no exhibits attached) (3/31/06)

3) Khan (05-1491) -- Motion for Entry of Protective Order (3/31/06) (no exhibits attached)

4) Doe (05-1458); Mamet (05-1602); Nakheelan; Al Khatemi; Thabid -- Order staying J. Huvelle's cases (3/31/06)

5) Awad -- Pets Reply to Motion for Entry of PO

6) Said -- Resp. Opp to request for Expedited ruling (4/3/06)

Thanks,

Janine Johansen

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

AHMED AL DARBY, et al., Petitioners,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-2371 (RCL)
GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States, et al., Respondents.	)

[PROPOSED] ORDER

Petitioners' Motion for Expedited Entry of the Protective Order is hereby GRANTED. The following orders entered the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases shall be fully applicable in this case as if entered herein: (1) Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, issued November 8, 2004 (344 F. Supp. 2d 174 (D.D.C. 2004)); (2) Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," issued November 10, 2004; and (3) Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, issued December 13, 2004.

SO ORDERED this ___ day of _____, 2006.

_____
ROYCE C. LAMBERTH
United States District Judge

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

AHMED AL DARBY, et al., Petitioners,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-2371 (RCL)
GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States, et al., Respondents.	)

MOTION FOR EXPEDITED ENTRY OF THE PROTECTIVE ORDER

Petitioner Ahmed al Darby, acting on his own behalf and through his Next Friend, Petitioner Mohammed Mohammed Hassen (collectively, "Petitioners"), and through his undersigned counsel, respectfully requests that the Court immediately enter the Amended Protective Orders first entered by Judge Green in the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases and since entered in related habeas proceedings before this Court (the "Protective Order"). See, e.g., Attash v. Bush, No. 05-1592 (RCL) (D.D.C. Sep. 1, 2005).[1] As the Court is aware, the Protective Order includes the following orders entered in the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases:

1. The Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, first issued by Judge Green on November 8, 2004 (344 F. Supp. 2d 174) (D.D.C. 2004)) (attached as Ex. A);

2. The Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," first issued on November 10, 2004 (attached as Ex. B); and

[1] This Motion is made without prejudice to Petitioners' right to seek modification of any particular terms in the Protective Order in the future.

3. The Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, first issued on December 13, 2004 (attached as Ex. C).

Upon information and belief, Petitioner al Darby has been held for over four years, virtually incommunicado, by the United States at Guantánamo Bay Naval Station ("Guantánamo"). Petitioners initiated the instant proceeding by filing a Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus on December 12, 2005. As set forth in that application, Petitioners allege that the imprisonment of Petitioner al Darby at Guantánamo is unlawful and violates his fundamental rights to due process as protected by the United States Constitution, as well as the Alien Tort Claims Act, the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions, United States military law, and customary international law. See Petition (dkt. no. 1).

Additionally, undersigned counsel recently learned that, upon information and belief, Petitioner al Darby is now a key witness in the court martial of Army Pfc. Damien M. Corsetti, involving charges of detainee abuse at the U.S. military base in Bagram, Afghanistan. See Alicia A. Caldwell, Soldier Pleads Not Guilty in Detainee Harm, Wash. Post., Mar. 28, 2006 (attached as Ex. D). Upon information and belief, Petitioner al Darby has accused Army Pfc. Corsetti of hitting detainees and "threatening to sexually assault them." Id. Trial is scheduled to begin on May 30, 2006 at Fort Bliss, Texas. Id. Thus the need for Petitioner al Darby to confer with counsel, which was clear and immediate, is now especially acute.[2]

Petitioners seek to avail themselves of the jurisdiction of this Court as confirmed in Rasul v Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004). Until the Protective Order is entered, however, the Government will not allow privileged communications between undersigned counsel and Petitioner al Darby and will not allow undersigned counsel to meet with Petitioner al Darby at Guantánamo. See In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 344 F. Supp. 2d 174, 184 (D.D.C. 2004) ("[t]o have access to the detainee, counsel must agree to comply fully with these procedures [the Protective Order] and must sign and affirmation acknowledging his/her agreement to comply with them."). Counsel for Respondents refuses to consent to entry of the Protective Order, "in light of the statutory withdrawal of the Court's jurisdiction in the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, as well as the failure to establish proper next friend standing in this action." See email from Preeya Noronha to Veronica Vela (Jan. 23, 2006) (attached as Ex. E). The courts of this District have recognized that neither ground for Respondents' opposition has any merit.

---

[2] As a threshold matter, entry of the Protective Order will also enable undersigned counsel to confirm that Petitioner al Darby is in fact the individual named as the witness in Army Pfc. Corsetti's court martial.

The Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-148, tit. X, 119 Stat. 2680 (2005) (hereinafter "DTA"), is irrelevant to this motion. Addressing this same issue, Magistrate Judge Kay held that the "question of when, and under what circumstances the existing Protective Order permits [Petitioner] to meet with his lawyer has no bearing on the question of which Court has jurisdiction to review the merits of Petitioner's challenge to his detention." Adem v. Bush, No. 05-723 (RWR) (AK), Mem. Op. at 22 (D.D.C. Mar. 21, 2006) (dkt no. 36). Moreover, while entry of the Protective Order will not impact the ultimate disposition of Petitioners' substantive claims or prejudice Respondents in any way, forcing Petitioners to await the higher courts' determination of the applicability of the DTA[3] will delay by several months any contact between Petitioner al Darby and his counsel, "render[ing] his right to counsel meaningless." See Id. at 22 n.25.

---

[3] On March 28, 2006, the Supreme Court of the United States heard oral argument on, inter alia, the applicability of the DTA to currently pending Guantánamo detainee habeas petitions. The applicability of the DTA to currently pending Guantánamo detainee habeas petitions was also argued before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on March 22, 2006.

Several judges of this Court have entered the Protective Order since the enactment of the DTA. See, e.g., Thabid v. Bush, No. 05-2398 (ESH), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 21, 2006); Razakah v. Bush, No. 05-2370 (EGS), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 17, 2006); Wahab v. Bush, No. 05-886 (EGS), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 17, 2006). Furthermore, Respondents have not relied upon the DTA to seek revocation of the Protective Order in the dozens of Guantánamo detainee cases in which judges of this Court have already entered the Protective Order. In those cases, the attorneys continue to communicate with and visit their clients at Guantánamo. Respondents' opposition to entry of the Protective Order here is without merit and plainly arbitrary.

Second, Respondents' challenge to the Next Friend standing of Petitioner Hassen is both unripe for review and misguided, since Petitioner al Darby and undersigned counsel must be able to meet in order for undersigned counsel to obtain proof of its authority to represent Petitioner al Darby. In fact, the Protective Order specifically allows counsel two visits with Petitioner al Darby before "[c]ounsel shall provide evidence of his or her authority to represent the detainee…." In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 344 F. Supp. 2d at 185. Magistrate Judge Kay, addressing the identical question of whether Respondents could challenge the validity of counsel's authorization prior to allowing counsel the two visits with their client as proscribed in the Protective Order, conducted a thorough analysis of the language of the Protective Order and held that a challenge to Next Friend standing is unripe for judicial review until after counsel has had its two visits with the client. See Adem v. Bush at 23-25.

Entry of the Protective Order will ensure that undersigned counsel can meet and communicate with Petitioner al Darby with the appropriate assurances of confidentiality and privilege. Accordingly, Petitioners respectfully request that the Protective Order be entered in the instant case forthwith.

WHEREFORE, for the foregoing reasons and for any other reason that may become known to the Court, the motion should be granted.

Dated: March 31, 2006

Respectfully Submitted,

SIMPSON THACHER & BARTLETT LLP

/s/ Paul C. Curnin

Mark J. Stein
Paul C. Curnin
Veronica Vela
Karen E. Abravanel
Nathaniel I. Kolodny
425 Lexington Avenue
New York, New York 10017
Tel: (212) 455-2000
Fax: (212) 455-2502

Attorneys for Petitioners

Of Counsel:

Barbara J. Olshansky (NY0057)
Tina Monshipour Foster (TF5556)
CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS
666 Broadway, 7th Floor
New York, New York 10012
Tel: (212) 614-6439
Fax: (212) 614-6499

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

ABDULLAH ALI SALEH GERAB ALSAAEI, et al.,	)
Petitioners,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-2369 (RWR)
GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States, et al.,	)
Respondents.	)

[PROPOSED] ORDER

Petitioners' Motion for Expedited Entry of the Protective Order is hereby GRANTED. The following orders entered the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases shall be fully applicable in this case as if entered herein: (1) Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, issued November 8, 2004 (344 F. Supp. 2d 174 (D.D.C. 2004)); (2) Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," issued November 10, 2004; and (3) Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, issued December 13, 2004.

SO ORDERED this ___ day of _____, 2006.

_____
RICHARD W. ROBERTS
United States District Judge

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

ABDULLAH ALI SALEH GERAB ALSAAEI, et al.,	)
Petitioners,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-2369 (RWR)
GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States, et al.,	)
Respondents.	)

MOTION FOR EXPEDITED ENTRY OF THE PROTECTIVE ORDER

Petitioner Abdullah Ali Saleh Gerab Alsaaei, acting on his own behalf and through his Next Friend, Petitioner Ali Saleh Bin Gerab Al-Abdullah Own Saari (collectively, "Petitioners"), and through his undersigned counsel, respectfully requests that the Court immediately enter the Amended Protective Orders first entered by Judge Green in the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases and since entered in related habeas proceedings before this Court (the "Protective Order"). See, e.g., Algatele v. Bush, No. 05-1669 (RWR) (D.D.C. Nov. 1, 2005) (dkt. no. 3); Al-Rubaish v. Bush, No. 05-1714 (RWR) (D.D.C. Nov. 1, 2005) (dkt. no. 3); Hamoud v. Bush, No. 05-1894 (RWR) (D.D.C. Nov. 1, 2005) (dkt. no. 3); Adem v. Bush, No. 05-723 (RWR) (D.D.C. Jun. 6, 2005) (dkt. no. 12).[1] As the Court is aware, the Protective Order includes the following orders entered in the In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases:

1. The Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, first issued by Judge Green on November 8, 2004 (344 F. Supp. 2d 174) (D.D.C. 2004)) (attached as Ex. A);

[1] This Motion is made without prejudice to Petitioners' right to seek modification of any particular terms in the Protective Order in the future.

2. The Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," first issued on November 10, 2004 (attached as Ex. B); and

3. The Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, first issued on December 13, 2004 (attached as Ex. C).

Respondents have recently confirmed that Petitioner Alsaaei is detained by the United States at the Guantánamo Bay Naval Station ("Guantánamo"). See email from Preeya Noronha to Veronica Vela, dated Feb. 15, 2006 (attached as Ex. D). Upon information and belief, Petitioner Alsaaei has been held virtually incommunicado at Guantánamo for over four years. Petitioners initiated the instant proceeding by filing a Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus on December 12, 2005. As set forth in that application, Petitioners allege that the imprisonment of Petitioner Alsaaei at Guantánamo is unlawful and violates his fundamental rights to due process as protected by the United States Constitution, as well as the Alien Tort Claims Act, the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions, United States military law, and customary international law. See Petition (dkt. no. 1).

Petitioners seek to avail themselves of the jurisdiction of this Court as confirmed in Rasul v Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004). Until the Protective Order is entered, however, the Government will not allow privileged communications between undersigned counsel and Petitioner Alsaaei and will not allow undersigned counsel to meet with Petitioner Alsaaei at Guantánamo. See In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 344 F. Supp. 2d 174, 184 (D.D.C. 2004) ("[t]o have access to the detainee, counsel must agree to comply fully with these procedures [the Protective Order] and must sign and affirmation acknowledging his/her agreement to comply with them."). Counsel for Respondents initially consented to entry of the Protective Order, explaining that Respondents did not intend "to block counsel access to properly represented petitioners." See Resps.' Mot. to Stay Proceedings Pending Related Appeals, at 4 (dkt. no. 2). Yet, counsel for Respondents has now withdrawn this consent, relying upon the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-148, tit. X, 119 Stat. 2680 (2005) (hereinafter "DTA"), to argue that this Court no longer has jurisdiction over this action. See email from Preeya Noronha to Karen Abravanel, dated Mar. 28, 2006 (attached as Ex. E).

The DTA is irrelevant to this motion. Addressing this same issue, Magistrate Judge Kay held that the "question of when, and under what circumstances the existing Protective Order permits [Petitioner] to meet with his lawyer has no bearing on the question of which Court has jurisdiction to review the merits of Petitioner's challenge to his detention." Adem v. Bush, No. 05-723 (RWR) (AK), Mem. Op. at 22 (D.D.C. Mar. 21, 2006) (dkt no. 36). Moreover, while entry of the Protective Order will not impact the ultimate disposition of Petitioners' substantive claims or prejudice Respondents in any way, forcing Petitioners to await the higher courts' determination of the applicability of the DTA[2] will delay by several months any contact between Petitioner Alsaaei and his counsel, "render[ing] his right to counsel meaningless." See id. at 22 n.25.

Several judges of this Court have entered the Protective Order since the enactment of the DTA. See, e.g., Thabid v. Bush, No. 05-2398 (ESH), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 21, 2006); Razakah v. Bush, No. 05-2370 (EGS), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 17, 2006); Wahab v. Bush, No. 05-886 (EGS), Min. Order (D.D.C. Mar. 17, 2006). Furthermore, Respondents have not relied upon the DTA to seek revocation of the Protective Order in the dozens of Guantánamo detainee

---

[2] On March 28, 2006, the Supreme Court of the United States heard oral argument on, inter alia, the applicability of the DTA to currently pending Guantánamo detainee habeas petitions. The applicability of the DTA to currently pending Guantánamo detainee habeas petitions was also argued before the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on March 22, 2006.

cases in which judges of this Court have already entered the Protective Order. In those cases, the attorneys continue to communicate with and visit their clients at Guantánamo. Respondents' opposition to entry of the Protective Order here is without merit and plainly arbitrary.

Entry of the Protective Order will ensure that undersigned counsel can meet and communicate with Petitioner Alsaaei with the appropriate assurances of confidentiality and privilege. Accordingly, Petitioners respectfully request that the Protective Order be entered in the instant case forthwith.

WHEREFORE, for the foregoing reasons and for any other reason that may become known to the Court, the motion should be granted.

Dated: March 31, 2006

Respectfully Submitted,

SIMPSON THACHER & BARTLETT LLP

/s/ Paul C. Curnin

Mark J. Stein
Paul C. Curnin
Veronica Vela
Karen E. Abravanel
Nathaniel I. Kolodny
425 Lexington Avenue
New York, New York 10017
Tel: (212) 455-2000
Fax: (212) 455-2502

Attorneys for Petitioners

Of Counsel:

Barbara J. Olshansky (NY0057)
Tina Monshipour Foster (TF5556)
CENTER FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS
666 Broadway, 7th Floor
New York, New York 10012
Tel: (212) 614-6439
Fax: (212) 614-6499

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

ADHAM MOHAMMED ALI AWAD,	)
Petitioner,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-2379 (JR)
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al.,	)
Respondents.	)

PETITIONER'S REPLY IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR ENTRY OF PROTECTIVE ORDER

Pursuant to Local Civil Rule 7(d), Petitioner Adham Mohammed Ali Awad ("Mr. Awad") files this reply in further support of his Motion for Entry of Protective Order and in response to Respondent's Memorandum in Opposition to Petitioner's Motion for Entry of Protective Order ("Opposition").

In their December 22, 2005 Motion to Stay Proceedings, Respondents proposed that this Court enter the protective order in this proceeding. Respondents subsequently reversed their position and now oppose Petitioner's motion for entry of the protective order. The sole basis for Respondents' current position is that the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 ("DTA"), Pub. L. No. 109-148, 119 Stat. 2680 (2005), enacted on December 30, 2005, strips this Court of jurisdiction and grants the D.C. Circuit exclusive jurisdiction "to determine the validity of any final decision of a Combatant Status Review Tribunal ("CSRT") that an alien is properly detained as an enemy combatant," id. § 1005(2)(1), Opp'n at 2. Respondents take the position that this Court should refrain from taking any action in this case while the D.C. Circuit determines the scope and effect of the DTA on pending habeas actions.

Respondents' argument is a red herring. First, Respondents overstate the reach of the DTA. There has been no ruling that the DTA will apply retroactively to habeas petitions filed by GTMO detainees before the enactment of the DTA[1]. Thus, Respondents' argument that the DTA strips this Court of jurisdiction to enter a protective order for counsel access is premature and without legal basis. Second, even if the DTA is found eventually by the higher courts to apply retroactively, the exclusive jurisdiction granted to the D.C. Circuit pertains solely to determining the validity of a final decision rendered by a CSRT.

Thus, under any application of the DTA, this Court would not encroach upon the D.C. Circuit's exclusive jurisdiction by entering the protective order in this proceeding. Moreover, under any interpretation the DTA contains no language concerning a detainee's right to access of counsel and therefore does not in any way affect, pertain to, or bar counsel access.

In addition, should the Supreme Court and the D.C. Circuit hold that the DTA deprives federal courts of jurisdiction to review habeas petitions filed by GTMO detainees prior to the enactment of the DTA, undersigned counsel believes in good faith that Mr. Awad would seek review by the D.C. Circuit of the CSRT's final decision regarding his classification as an "enemy combatant," as authorized by the DTA. See DTA, Pub. L. No. 109-138 §1005(e)(2), 119 Stat. 2680 (2005). This legal proceeding would require undersigned counsel to have access to Mr. Awad to discuss relevant facts and an opportunity to review the record of Mr. Awad's CSRT proceedings. Therefore, entry of the protective order at this time only would facilitate all possible proceedings arising from Mr. Awad's detention and, additionally, would impose no undue burden upon Respondents.

Respondents fail to acknowledge that several federal courts, including this Court, have been exercising their jurisdiction to grant the entry of protective orders after the enactment of the

[1] The Supreme Court heard oral argument on March 28, 2006, on this issue in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184.

DOJ_NMG_0025128

DTA. This Court granted a protective order after the DTA was signed into law in Khiali-Gul v. Bush, No. 05-CV-877 (JR) (D.D.C. Jan 6, 2006) (Minute Order). Protective orders also were issued in Bostan v. Bush, No. 05-883 (RBW) (D.D.C. Jan. 9, 2006) and Mohammad v. Bush, No. 05-879 (RBW) (D.D.C. Jan. 9, 2006), and most recently protective orders were issued in Razakah v. Bush, No. 05-CV-2370 (EGS) (D.D.C. Mar. 17, 2006) (Minute Order) and Thabid v. Bush, No. 05-CV-2398 (ESH) (D.D.C. Mar. 21, 2006) (Minute Order).

Respondents clearly should have been aware of each of these post-DTA rulings granting protective orders when they filed their opposition, yet they remained silent and did not acknowledge, much less address, these orders. Respondents' silence on this issue, and their failure to present any argument as to why the protective order in this case should be denied when it has been granted in identical circumstances by this and other courts is a glaring omission in their opposition. The post-DTA protective orders entered by this and other courts further indicate that the DTA has no relevance to restricting access to counsel by GTMO detainees. The relief Petitioner seeks – entry of the protective order to enable his counsel to communicate with him – is no different than the relief granted in previous orders by this and other federal courts.

Respondents also claim that a protective order is unnecessary because the medical care provided at GTMO is "high quality medical care" comparable to that provided to active members of the armed forces. (Opp'n at 4). While the government may claim that high level medical care is offered at GTMO, there are no assurances that Mr. Awad has received the necessary medical care for his amputated leg and eye and arthritis problems. In fact, the government has not and will not provide Mr. Awad's counsel with any specific information regarding him or his physical condition. Not only is Petitioner's counsel entitled to receive basic and essential information regarding his physical condition as his legal representative, but such information is required in order to effectively represent Mr. Awad. Access to counsel is crucial to ensure that Mr. Awad receives all essential medical care, and the entry of the protective order is vital to ensure that such access is permitted while Mr. Awad still is in sufficiently good health to communicate effectively with his legal representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0025129

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Petitioner Adham Mohammed Ali Awad requests that the protective order entered in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases be entered immediately.

Dated: April 3, 2006

Respectfully submitted,

ORRICK, HERRINGTON & SUTCLIFFE LLP

Panayiota G. Souras (pursuant to LCvR 83.2(g))
Washington Harbour
3050 K Street, N.W., Suite 200
Washington, D.C. 20007
(202) 339-8400
(202) 339-8500 (fax)

Counsel for Petitioner

DOJ_NMG_0025130

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I certify that a true and correct copy of the foregoing Petitioner's Reply in Support of Motion for Entry of Protective Order was served on this 3rd day of April, 2006, by this Court's Electronic Case Filing ("ECF") system upon the following:

Preeya M. Noronha, Esquire
Terry M. Henry, Esquire
United States Department of Justice
Civil Division, Federal Programs Branch
20 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Room 7144
Washington, D.C. 20530
preeya.noronha@usdoj.com

Panayiota G. Souras

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SAWAT KHAN,	)
Detainee,	)
Guantanamo Bay Naval Station	)
Guantanamo Bay, Cuba;	)
	)
	)
Petitioner*,	)	CIVIL ACTION
	)	(Habeas Corpus)
	)
	)
v.	)
	)
	)	No. 1:05-cv-01491-JR
	)
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al.,	)
Respondents*.	)

* * * * *

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONER'S MOTION
FOR ENTRY OF PROTECTIVE ORDER

Petitioner Sawat Khan respectfully requests that this Court enter the Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba ("Amended Protective Order"), first issued on November 10, 2004, in the In re Guantanamo Bay Detainee Cases by then Coordinating Judge Joyce Hens Green and since entered in related habeas proceedings in this District Court (Exhibit A); the Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, first issued on December 13, 2004, in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases (Exhibit B); and the Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," first issued on November 10, 2004 in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases (Exhibit C).

The government conditions Petitioner's right to access to assigned counsel, as affirmed in Al Odah, et al. v. Bush, 346 F. Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 2004), upon entry of the Amended Protective Order, and undersigned counsel is prohibited from meeting with Petitioner until the Amended Protective Order is entered. In the absence of an order from the Court, counsel is also prohibited from sending or receiving legal mail from Petitioner and is therefore unable to initiate, let alone establish, a functioning attorney-client relationship. Entry of the Amended Protective Order would afford undersigned counsel the opportunities provided counsel in other pending Guantanamo Bay detainee cases to visit petitioners at Guantanamo Bay and to send them privileged attorney-client mail by way of the legal mail procedures outlined in the Amended Protective Order

Pursuant to Local Civil Rule 7(m), undersigned counsel for Petitioner has conferred with Respondents' counsel regarding the relief sought in this motion. Respondent' counsel opposes the motion. A proposed Protective Order is attached to this motion and memorandum. Although Petitioner is moving for entry of the Amended Protective Order, he reserves the right to challenge or seek modification of any particular terms of the Protective Order in the future, and to ask this Court to review any designation made by Respondents of particular information as "protected," as may be appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0025133

Respectfully submitted,

_____

JAMES WYDA
Federal Public Defender

MARTIN G. BAHL
Staff Attorney
100 South Charles Street
Tower II, Suite1100
Baltimore, Maryland 21201
(410) 962-3962

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I HEREBY CERTIFY that on this 31st day of March, 2006, a copy of the foregoing Memorandum in Support of Petitioner's motion For Entry of Protective Order, was mailed certified-mail to: George W. Bush, President of the United States, The White House, 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20500; Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary, United States Department of Defense, 1000 Defense Pentagon, Washington, D.C., 20301-1000; Army Brig. Gen. Jay Hood, Commander, Joint Task Force-GITMO, JTF-GITMO, APO AE 09360; and Army Col. Mike Bumgarner, Commander, Joint Detention Operations Group, JTF-GITMO, APO AE 09360.

_____

JAMES WYDA
Federal Public Defender
for the District of Maryland

DOJ_NMG_0025134

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SAWAT KHAN,	)
Detainee,	)
Guantanamo Bay Naval Station	)
Guantanamo Bay, Cuba;	)
	)
	)
Petitioner*,	)	CIVIL ACTION
	)	(Habeas Corpus)
	)
	)
v.	)
	)
	)	No. 1:05-cv-01491-JR
	)
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al.,	)
Respondents*.	)

* * * * *

(PROPOSED) ORDER

_____Upon consideration of Petitioner's Motion for Entry of Protective Order, it is hereby ORDERED that the Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, first issued on November 8, 2004, in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 344 F. Supp.2d 174 (D.D.C. 2004), the Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, first issued on December 13, 2004, in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, and the Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," first issued on November 10, 2004 in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, shall be entered in this case.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

DATED:_____ _____
United States District Judge

DOJ_NMG_0025136

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SAWAT KHAN, Detainee, Guantanamo Bay Naval Station Guantanamo Bay, Cuba;	)
Petitioner*,	)	CIVIL ACTION (Habeas Corpus)
v.	)
	)	No. 1:05-cv-01491-JR
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents*.	)

* * * * *

PETITIONER'S MOTION FOR ENTRY OF PROTECTIVE ORDER

Counsel for Petitioner Sawat Khan, through undersigned counsel, hereby moves for an order for the entry of the Amended Protective Orders, as set forth in the accompanying Memorandum in Support of Petitioner's Motion.

Respectfully submitted,

_____

JAMES WYDA
Federal Public Defender

MARTIN G. BAHL
Staff Attorney
100 South Charles Street
Tower II, Suite1100
Baltimore, Maryland 21201
(410) 962-3962

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I HEREBY CERTIFY that on this 31st day of March, 2006, a copy of the foregoing Petitioner's Motion for Entry of Protective Order, was mailed certified-mail to: George W. Bush, President of the United States, The White House, 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20500; Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary, United States Department of Defense, 1000 Defense Pentagon, Washington, D.C., 20301-1000; Army Brig. Gen. Jay Hood, Commander, Joint Task Force-GITMO, JTF-GITMO, APO AE 09360; and Army Col. Mike Bumgarner, Commander, Joint Detention Operations Group, JTF-GITMO, APO AE 09360.

_____
JAMES WYDA
Federal Public Defender
for the District of Maryland

DOJ_NMG_0025138

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SAWAT KHAN,	)
Detainee,	)
Guantanamo Bay Naval Station	)
Guantanamo Bay, Cuba;	)
	)
	)
Petitioner*,	)	CIVIL ACTION
	)	(Habeas Corpus)
	)
	)
v.	)
	)
	)	No. 1:05-cv-01491-JR
	)
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al.,	)
Respondents*.	)

* * * * *

(PROPOSED) ORDER

_____Having considered Petitioner's Motion for Entry of Protective Order, it is hereby ORDERED that the Amended Protective Order and Procedures for Counsel Access to Detainees at the United States Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, first issued on November 8, 2004, in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, 344 F. Supp.2d 174 (D.D.C. 2004), the Order Supplementing and Amending Filing Procedures Contained in November 8, 2004 Amended Protective Order, first issued on December 13, 2004, in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, and the Order Addressing Designation Procedures for "Protected Information," first issued on November 10, 2004 in In re Guantanamo Detainee Cases, shall apply to the above captioned case.

DOJ_NMG_0025139

IT IS SO ORDERED.

DATED:_____ _____
United States District Judge

DOJ_NMG_0025140

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

AHMED DOE, et al., Petitioners, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents.	Civil Action No. 05-1458 (ESH)
EDHAM MAMET, et al., Petitioners, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents.	Civil Action No. 05-1602 (ESH)
NAIF ABDULLA AL NAKHEELAN, et al., Petitioners, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents.	Civil Action No. 05-2201 (ESH)
SALEH ZAID AL KHATEMI , et al., Petitioners, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents.	Civil Action No. 05-2248 (ESH)

ALI THABID, et al.,	)
Petitioners,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-2398 (ESH)
GEORGE W. BUSH, et al.,	)
Respondents.	)

ORDER

On December 30, 2005, President Bush signed into law H.R. 2863, the Department of Defense, Emergency Supplemental Appropriations to Address Hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico, and Pandemic Influenza Act of 2006 ("the Act"). Section 1005(e) of the Act, entitled Judicial Review of Detention of Enemy Combatants, raises serious questions concerning whether this Court retains jurisdiction to hear the above-captioned cases. The question of whether this Court retains jurisdiction to entertain these matters is currently pending resolution in the appellate courts. Accordingly, it is this 31st day of March, 2006, hereby ORDERED that all pending motions in the above-captioned cases are DENIED WITHOUT PREJUDICE until such time the question of this Court's jurisdiction to adjudicate these cases is resolved;[1/] and it is [1/] If it is concluded that this Court retains jurisdiction of these cases, the parties may file motions to reinstate the pending motions.

DOJ_NMG_0025142

FURTHER ORDERED that all action in the above-captioned cases is STAYED pending the resolution of this Court's jurisdiction.

s/
ELLEN SEGAL HUVELLE
United States District Judge

DOJ_NMG_0025143

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SALIM SAID, et al., Petitioners, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States, et al., Respondents.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-2384 (RWR)

RESPONDENTS' MEMORANDUM IN OPPOSITION TO PETITIONERS' AMENDED REQUEST FOR EXPEDITED RULING

Respondents hereby oppose petitioners' request for an expedited ruling on their motion for entry of the protective order in this case.

In their Amended Request for Expedited Ruling (dkt. no. 12), petitioners suggest that respondents failed to submit a timely response to petitioners' Motion for Entry of Protective Order (dkt. no.6), which was filed and served on respondents via the Court's ECF system on March 15, 2006. See Pets' Amended Request for Expedited Ruling at 1 ("Petitioners' counsel received ECF notification that Respondents filed a response to the Motion after the close of business on March 30, 2006. To the knowledge of Petitioners' counsel, Respondents did not file a motion for leave to file the response out of time."). To the contrary, respondents' memorandum in opposition to petitioners' motion was filed within the time limitations provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Local Rules of this Court. Pursuant to Local Rule 7(b), a memorandum in opposition to a motion must be filed "[w]ithin 11 days of the date of service or at such other time as the Court may direct." LCvR 7(b). The computation of this 11-day period is governed by Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a). According to Rule 6(a), when computing a prescribed period of time, the day on which the designated period of time begins shall not be included, but "[t]he last day of the period so computed shall be included, unless it is a Saturday a Sunday, or a legal holiday, . . . in which event the period runs until the end of the next day which is not one of the aforementioned days." Id. Rule 6(e) (as amended, effective December 1, 2005) further provides that "3 days are added after the prescribed period would otherwise expire under subdivision (a)." Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(e).

In this case, respondents were served with petitioners' motion via the Court's ECF system on March 15, 2006. Under Rule 6(a), because the last day of the 11-day period to respond to petitioners' motion fell on a Sunday, the deadline for filing a response was Monday, March 27, 2006. Rule 6(e), in turn, enlarged this period by three days, which extended the deadline for filing a response to March 30, 2006. See also Adv. Comm. Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 6 (2005 Amendments). Respondents filed and served on counsel for petitioners their Memorandum in Opposition to Petitioners' Motion for Entry of the Protective Order (dkt. no. 9) via the Court's ECF system on March 30, 2006, within the deadline required by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Local Rules of this Court.[1]

For these reasons, and the reasons expressed in respondents' memorandum in opposition to petitioners' motion for protective order, petitioners' request should be denied.

---

[1] Petitioners' reference to respondents' filing their memorandum after the "close of business" on March 30, 2006 is also puzzling, given that parties are permitted until midnight on the date a pleading is due to electronically file it, unless otherwise ordered by the Court.

DOJ_NMG_0025145

Dated: April 3, 2006

Respectfully submitted,

PETER D. KEISLER
Assistant Attorney General

DOUGLAS N. LETTER
Terrorism Litigation Counsel

/s/ Preeya M. Noronha
JOSEPH H. HUNT (D.C. Bar No. 431134)
VINCENT M. GARVEY (D.C. Bar No. 127191)
TERRY M. HENRY
JAMES J. SCHWARTZ
PREEYA M. NORONHA
ROBERT J. KATERBERG
NICHOLAS J. PATTERSON
ANDREW I. WARDEN
EDWARD H. WHITE
MARC A. PEREZ
Attorneys
United States Department of Justice
Civil Division, Federal Programs Branch
20 Massachusetts Ave., N.W.
Washington, DC 20530
Tel: (202) 514-4107
Fax: (202) 616-8470

Attorneys for Respondents

DOJ_NMG_0025146

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, April 4, 2006 1:10 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Senger, Jeffrey M; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

Sorry, my mistake. I didn't mean to make any changes, only reflect where things stand.

From: Swenson, Lily F
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 4:54 PM
To: Senger, Jeffrey M; Gorsuch, Neil M; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

I've been handling commercial but I thought maybe Jeff wanted it. Whatever, it's all good with me.

From: Senger, Jeffrey M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 4:39 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

The following should be added to my list: legislative/interagency clearance, weekly and quarterly reporting, tobacco-related litigation. Also, I have the Office of Consumer Litigation in the Civil Division (not the Commercial branch).

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

<< File: OASG Assignments.doc >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, April 04, 2006 1:13 PM
To: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

Jeff normally does circ legis materials as appropriate. I will share revised list with Mike and Kyle and ask for their equivalents.

From: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 5:47 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: OASG Assignments.doc

I do have BJS. Jeff just has the tort reform stats project. Here's the updated doc. I can send upwards, but it might be more appropriate going from you to Mike & Kyle or Monica.

<< File: OASG Portfolios.doc >>

I notice Jeff does interagency & testimony clearance. I've asked him before to bring to my attention anything significant falling under one of my components but he never has. I don't want to cause waves unnecessarily but I don't think that's an unreasonable request. In fact, I think it's essential to us doing a good job. Thoughts?

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, April 03, 2006 2:19 PM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Todd, Gordon (SMO); Senger, Jeffrey M
Subject: OASG Assignments.doc

Gordon rightly pointed out that our assigment list needed some updating! Attached is a draft for your review - please don't hesitate to let me know where I've erred (I'm sure there are many). Thanks!

<< File: OASG Assignments.doc >>

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Tuesday, April 4, 2006 1:15 PM
To: Sampson, Kyle; Elston, Michael (ODAG)
Cc: Todd, Gordon (SMO)
Subject: OASG assignments
Attachments: OASG Assignments.doc

I thought it might be helpful for you to have a copy of current docket assignments within OASG. If you have a similar chart for your offices, I'd be grateful to have a copy so we make sure we're talking to the right folks. Many thanks.

Office of the Associate Attorney General
Portfolios - 4/1/2006

Lily Fu Swenson

ATR
CIV (except Consumer Litig., Cobell and Tobacco)
OIP
Executive Office of US Trustees

Gordon Todd

CRT
CRS
TAX
OJP
OVC
OVW
OVC

Jeff Senger

ENRD
Office of Dispute Resolution
Foreign Claims Settlement Commission
CIV (Consumer Litig., Cobell and Tobacco)
Legislative/Interagency Clearance
Weekly & Monthly Reports

McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)

From:	McKenzie, Peggy (CIV)
Sent:	Tuesday, April 4, 2006 1:53 PM
To:	Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Bahr, Dorothy (CIV); Baxter, Felix (CIV); Bordeaux, JoAnn (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Calvert, Chris (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fishback, David (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Fowler, Liane (SMO); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Goldberg, Arthur (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gray, Towanda (CIV); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hudson, Lewis (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennings, Geraldine (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keener, Donald (CIV); Kent, Alexander (CIV); Kohl, Christine (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Liner, Linda (CIV); Lloyd, Shirley (CIV); Lucas, Regina E. (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Shannen Coffin; Shaw, Aloma A; Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Williams, Angela (CIV); Williams, Toni (CIV); Willis, Kerry (CIV); Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject:	4/4 CIV Weekly Report to the AG
Attachments:	CivDivWkly0404.wpd

U.S. Department of Justice

Civil Division

Assistant Attorney General Washington, D.C. 20530

April 4, 2006

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Peter D. Keisler
Assistant Attorney General

SUBJECT: Civil Division Weekly Report to the Attorney General

A. NEXT WEEK

· D.C. Circuit to Hear Oral Argument in Appeals Challenging Computer Disconnection and Class Notice Orders and Seeking Reassignment of this Indian Trust Litigation to a Different District Court Judge
Cobell v. Norton [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On Tuesday, April 11, a panel of the D.C. Circuit (Tatel, Brown, Silberman) will hear oral argument in two appeals arising out of the ten-year-old Indian trust litigation. One appeal challenges an injunction requiring the Department of the Interior to disconnect major computer systems from the internet and from internal computer networks. The second appeal challenges an order requiring Interior to declare in all written communications with class members that its trust information is of questionable reliability. The appeal also seeks reassignment of the case to a different district court judge.

B. THIS WEEK

· Supreme Court Denies Certiorari and Leaves Intact the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit Mandamus Orders Directing Payment of Additional Medicare Funds to Hospitals

In re Medicare Reimbursement Litigation [United States Supreme Court; United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On April 3, the Supreme Court denied the government's petition for certiorari seeking review of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit's grant of mandamus relief that retroactively grants additional Medicare payments to hospitals that provide services to a disproportionately large number of low-income patients. The government's petition argued that mandamus relief was inappropriate because the hospitals had never sought the payments, had failed to appeal the initial decisions that did not include the payments, and had not asked for their cost reports to be reopened before they sought mandamus. The petition also advised the Court that the Medicare Trust Fund faced potential additional expenditures under the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit's decision of $2.8 billion in over two hundred and fifty mandamus suits that are consolidated in the district court. Further litigation will define the scope of relief under the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit's mandamus order.

- Government to Seek Reconsideration of Order Permitting Counsel Access to Guantanamo Detainees without Showing of Authority to Represent Them
  Adem v. Bush [District of Columbia]. On April 4, the government will seek reconsideration by Judge Richard Roberts of an order by Magistrate Judge Alan Kay, requiring that purported counsel for a Guantanamo Bay detainee be permitted to visit the detainee despite the government's objections that the district court lacked jurisdiction under the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, and that, in addition, purported counsel for the detainee had failed to demonstrate either that counsel had direct authority to represent the detainee in a habeas case or that proper "next friend" standing had been established. Counsel's asserted basis for authority to bring a habeas action on behalf of the detainee is that the detainee allegedly asked another detainee to help him obtain a lawyer. Our longstanding interpretation of the governing protective order and counsel access procedures in the Guantanamo habeas cases is that an attorney must demonstrate that the lawsuit has been directly authorized by a detainee or an appropriate "next friend" petitioner prior to being permitted direct, privileged access to the detainee. Magistrate Judge Kay rejected this interpretation of the protective order, including the need for either direct authorization or a proper "next friend" for access, and concluded that the government must permit any counsel who purports to represent a Guantanamo detainee to meet with the detainee to determine if the detainee wants the lawyer to represent him and pursue a habeas action on his behalf. The Magistrate Judge's ruling has significant implications for almost 20 pending challenges to "next friend" standing in other Guantanamo habeas cases.

- D.C. Circuit Schedules Oral Argument in Appeal Involving Department of Homeland Security's Human Resources Regulations
  National Treasury Employees Union, et al. v. Michael Chertoff, Secretary of Homeland Security, et al. [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. In this facial challenge brought by several federal labor unions, the district court upheld in part and struck down in part recent regulations, jointly issued by the Department of Homeland Security and the Office of Personnel Management, creating a new human resources management system for the Department of Homeland Security. While upholding significant portions of the regulations, the district court found fault with (among other things) their treatment of collective bargaining and with the new role prescribed for the Federal Labor Relations Authority in Department of Homeland Security matters. Both sides have appealed and have filed briefs on an expedited schedule, and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has now set oral argument for April 6, before Judges Randolph, Griffith, and Edwards.

C. LAST WEEK

- Plaintiffs Agree to Dismiss Records Case Seeking Public Relations Contracts by Department of Homeland Security
  Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington v. United States Department of Homeland Security [District of Columbia]. On March 20, Judge Huvelle granted the parties' joint motion to dismiss. Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington ("CREW") brought this Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) case against the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) seeking documents related to public relations contracts. DHS moved for a stay of the proceedings for three months to finish processing CREW's FOIA request. Judge Huvelle granted the stay and ordered the parties to submit a proposed schedule for briefing the case after the three months passed. After CREW finished reviewing the released documents, however, it determined that it did not wish to challenge any of the redactions or exemptions claimed. Therefore, the parties entered into a joint motion to dismiss the action with prejudice, which Judge Huvelle granted.

- Ninth Circuit Certifies State-Law Tort Questions and Rejects Federal Tort Claims Act Appeal
  Oberson v. United States Department of Agriculture, Forest Service [United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Montana]. This tort case against the Federal Government arose out of a snowmobile accident in which plaintiff and his friends were using Forest Service trails at night and plaintiff was struck by one of his friends who was operating a snowmobile at night, at excessive sped, and while impaired by alcohol; the district court held the government 40% liable for plaintiff's injuries on the theory that the Forest Service failed to warn of or correct a dangerous hill along the snowmobile trail, entering a judgment of nearly $5 million against the government. On March 20, he Ninth Circuit (Gould, Berzon, Schwarzer, D.J.) certified three questions of statutory interpretation to the Montana Supreme Court to determine the applicable standard of care; the court of appeals rejected the government's remaining arguments, including that the failure to warn of the hill was protected by the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act and that any negligence by the government was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

- Ninth Circuit Upholds Removal Order against Afghan Who Fled the Taliban
  Asmat v. Gonzales [United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit; Board of Immigration Appeals]. Nasar Asmat, a citizen of Afghanistan, attempted to enter the United States in June 2001 and sought asylum on the ground that he was fleeing the Taliban, which he said had attempted to conscript him. An Immigration Judge ordered him removed, and the Board of Immigration Appeals affirmed, rejecting his asylum claim on the ground that military conscription is not persecution and that conditions in Afghanistan had changed with the fall of the Taliban. On March 23, the Ninth Circuit (Rymer, W. Fletcher, Clifton) (per curiam) (unpublished) denied Asmat's petition for review, holding that the Board's decision was supported by substantial evidence.

- Insight Public Sector, Inc. to Pay $1 Million to Settle False Claims Act Allegations
  On March 27, Insight Public Sector, Inc., a company that sells technology products and services to Federal Government agencies, agreed to pay the United States $1 million to settle false claims allegations. The government alleged that a predecessor corporation, Comark Government & Education Services (CGES), falsely certified that it was a "small business" on its application for inclusion on the General Services Administration's Multiple Award Schedule (MAS). The settlement arises from a complaint made to the Small Business Administration (SBA) that CGES falsely certified that it was a small business to obtain a preference in regard to the award of purchase orders under the MAS. The SBA's Office of Inspector General, in conjunction with the General Services Administration's Office of Inspector General and the Department of Justice, conducted a two-year investigation and concluded that CGES misrepresented its size status on its 1996 MAS application.

- Government Opposes New Plaintiff in Air Force "Chaplain" Case
  Weinstein, v. United States Air Force (District of New Mexico). On March 27, we filed a brief opposing plaintiffs' motion to amend their complaint, in which five Air Force Academy graduates have sought an injunction prohibiting any member of the Air Force, including a chaplain, from evangelizing, proselytizing, or in any related way attempting "to involuntarily convert, pressure, exhort, or persuade a fellow member of the [Air Force] to accept their own religious beliefs while on duty." We moved to dismiss the action for lack of standing and ripeness in December 2005. On March 9, while our motion was pending, plaintiffs moved to amend their complaint to add another plaintiff, Master Sergeant Phillip Burleigh (an Air Force recruiter stationed in New Mexico), and an additional claim challenging revised interim guidelines recently issued by the Air Force concerning the free exercise of religion. We opposed plaintiffs' motion on the ground that it would be futile to allow them to file what would be their third complaint in this action. In particular, we noted that the new plaintiff, MSgt. Burleigh, has proven his own lack of standing by expressly contradicting the representation made by his counsel that he has been "subjected to regular and persistent proselytizing by his superior officers." Revealing a startling conflict with this representation, which he assumed was misquoted by the press (but was actually a direct quote from plaintiffs' motion to amend), MSgt. Burleigh has stated in recent e-mails that any such suggestion is "absolutely false," a "horrible twisting" of his words, and "sensational." He further stated that "at no time" has he been told by a military member to become a Christian, that there have been "no instances" under his current leadership in which a person has attempted to persuade him to adopt a religious belief, and that his current supervisor has been "nothing but civil and professional" towards him. Instead, he alleges what he describes as three "sporadic" instances over his entire career, one involving a supervisor who allegedly gave him a lower performance rating in 1997 for refusing to attend prayer sessions, and two involving guest motivational speakers who allegedly expressed religious views in addresses at Air Force events. We argue that none of these past instances, even if true, demonstrates that MSgt. Burleigh is in immediate danger of being subject to any unconstitutional conduct by the Air Force, particularly in light of his statements about his current leadership. We also note causation, exhaustion, and statute-of-limitation problems with these allegations. Finally, we argue that plaintiffs' purported new challenge to the Air Force's revised interim guidelines is not ripe, because the guidelines are not final and are still subject to change.

- Court Denies Motion to Join United States as Declaratory Judgment Defendant
  Ace Duraflo, LLC v. Bill Howe Plumbing, Inc. [C.D. Cal.] (Pregerson, J.). In this suit, plaintiff asserts numerous claims, including a request for a declaratory judgment of invalidity of U.S. Patent No. 5,707,702. The United States owns this patent but licenses it to one of the defendants. Our licensee claimed that the United States, as patent owner, is an indispensable party. On March 27, the court denied the motion, agreeing with our contention that the United States is not indispensable because the license entitles the licensee to maintain suit without the involvement of the United States.

- United States Opposes Challenge to Order Issued by Free Trade Tribunal
  Tembec v. United States [District of Columbia]. On March 28, the government filed its opposition to a motion to vacate an arbitral consolidation order. This case relates to the longstanding trade dispute between Canada and the United States concerning softwood lumber, and to an arbitration commenced under the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) with respect to that dispute. After two arbitration proceedings became aligned procedurally, the United States sought to consolidate three sets of claims brought by Canadian softwood lumber corporations against the United States, pursuant to the express terms of NAFTA Article 1126. The Consolidation Tribunal ordered consolidation in September 2005. Tembec petitioned for vacatur of that ruling under the Federal Arbitration Act in December and filed a motion and memorandum in support thereof in February. In our opposition to that motion, we first argued that the Court lacks jurisdiction under the Federal Arbitration Act to vacate the Consolidation Tribunal's Order because the procedural ruling is not an "award." Second, we argued that even if jurisdiction existed, case law rejects judicial involvement with respect to arbitral procedural orders and orders of consolidation in particular. Finally, in addressing the merits of Tembec's challenges, we argued that Tembec had not established: (1) evident partiality among the arbitrators simply because one arbitrator is a former Department of State Legal Advisor and has a distant relation by marriage to President Bush; (2) a violation of public policy due to the arbitrator selector process, which was carried out in accordance with the express terms of the NAFTA; and (3) that the Consolidation Tribunal acted in excess of its authority under the NAFTA.

- Government Agencies Settle Litigation with Trans World Airlines, Inc.
  In re Trans World Airlines, Inc. [Bankr. D. Del.] (Walsh, B.J.) . On March 29, the United States entered into a settlement with the TWA Post Confirmation Estate, Inc. (TWA) resolving the United States' outstanding issues arising out of the bankruptcy case Trans World Airlines, Inc. filed in 2001. TWA will pay the Department of Agriculture's Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS) $175,000 in partial satisfaction of a statutory lien that APHIS asserted against TWA's assets. In addition, the United States will retain $91,647 to offset against unsecured claims filed by APHIS, the Federal Aviation Administration, the Department of Transportation and the Department of Homeland Security. The United States will also receive a nominal payment as an unsecured creditor on the remainder of the United States' claims.

- Treasury Offset Program Notification Procedures Upheld
  In re Huff [W.D. Pa.] (McLaughlin, J.). On March 29, the district court reversed a bankruptcy court decision which had held that government agencies are required to provide annual notification to debtors prior to submitting debts for offset through the Treasury Offset Program managed by the Financial Management Service of the Department of Treasury. The district court agreed with our interpretation of the applicable statute and regulations as requiring each agency to notify debtors prior to submitting debts to the Treasury Offset Program and then again after each offset is made. Although the decision concerns a single tax refund of only $2,368 that was offset against a debt due the Rural Housing Service, it reverses a published decision that could have had a broad impact on debt collection throughout the government.

Business Opportunity Defendant Arrested on Fraud Charges in Miami

United States v. Jay Mayne [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Martinez). On March 30, Jay Mayne was arrested on an indictment charging him with conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud arising out of his participation in a fraudulent business opportunity scheme. Mayne was the lead salesperson at Pantheon Holdings, Inc., which sold fraudulent Internet kiosk business opportunities. For a minimum of approximately $19,000, potential purchasers were told they would receive an Internet kiosk, and a "turn-key" Internet kiosk business. Mayne falsely claimed, inter alia, that distributors would earn substantial profits from advertising that Pantheon would place on the kiosks and from the public's use of the Internet. Mayne was arrested in Miami after arriving on a flight from Costa Rica where he resided for over a year after he learned he was under investigation.

Court Refuses to Preliminarily Enjoin New Milk Marketing Regulation

Hettinga v. Johanns [Northern District of Texas]. On March 30, Judge Sam R. Cummings denied plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction filed. Plaintiff, an Arizona dairy producer and processor of milk, sought judicial review of a milk marketing order ("Order") promulgated by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act of 1937 (AMAA). The Order, which will go into effect on April 1, for the first time requires so-called "producer-handlers," such as plaintiff, to pay certain assessments on the milk they handle, payments paid by other handlers but from which producer-handlers had for the most part been exempt since the outset of the milk marketing program nearly 70 years ago. USDA determined that, due to the growth in market share of certain producer-handlers, and other changes in market conditions, continuing the exemption would threaten its ability to maintain minimum prices for all producers (farmers), a principal goal of the AMAA. Plaintiff argued that the Order violated the AMAA in various ways, and that USDA, in promulgating the Order, had arbitrarily and capriciously departed from prior policies without adequate explanation. USDA responded that plaintiff had no likelihood of success on the merits because it had not exhausted its administrative remedies under the AMAA, and its substantive legal challenge lacked merit. USDA also argued that plaintiff had failed to establish the other prerequisites to preliminary injunctive relief. Judge Cummings denied the motion, noting that plaintiff had "'utterly' failed to establish the prerequisites to preliminary injunctive relief." The court acknowledged plaintiff's "valiant effort to 'milk' their financial harms for all they are worth," but found that such harms were inherently financial, recompensable, and thus not irreparable. It also found that plaintiff had not established the other prerequisites to preliminary injunctive relief, holding that "for the reasons cited in Defendant's brief, Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction should be denied." A similar motion for a preliminary injunction was denied on December 29, 2005, in Edaleen Dairy, Inc. v. Johanns (District of Columbia).

- Father and Son Plead Guilty to Odometer Swapping Scheme
  United States v. Melton, [District of South Carolina] (Judge Anderson). On March 31, William Dupree Melton and his son, Jimmy Wayne Melton, pled guilty to causing the interstate transportation of checks obtained by fraud, a felony. The Meltons admitted that they bought vehicles with extremely high mileage, replaced the high-mileage odometer clusters with low-mileage clusters, and sold the vehicles with disclosures that the odometers were inaccurate, but with no indication of the true high mileage. The Meltons sold vehicles at wholesale auctions for prices significantly higher than prices at which they purchased the vehicles. The defendants admitted that these sales were fraudulent because they had knowingly made material omissions in the sales that substantially increased the vehicles' value. Dupree Melton had been convicted of mail fraud for similar conduct in 1989.

- Federal Circuit Reverses Holding that Allegations of Patent Infringement Can be Treated as Fifth Amendment Takings and Brought under the Tucker Act
  Zoltek Corporation v. United States [United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit; United States Court of Federal Claims]. On March 31, the Federal Circuit (Gajarsa, Plager, Dyk), reversed a decision of the Court of Federal Claims holding that a corporation alleging patent infringement by the United States could bring the suit as a takings claim under the Tucker Act, even though the claim was barred by a provision of the statute that expressly authorizes suits against the United States for patent infringement. A short per curiam opinion accepted our argument that the Supreme Court's holding in Schillinger v. United States, 155 U.S. 163 (1894), that patent infringement is a tort, rather than a takings claim, is controlling.

- Boston-FBI Informant Suits Are Dismissed on Statute of Limitations Grounds
  William Bennett, et al. v. United States, et al., Civil Action No. 03-11443-RCL [District of Massachusetts] (J. Lindsay); and Joan Bennett, et al. v. United States, et al., Civil Action No. 04-10011-RCL [District of Massachusetts] (J. Lindsay). These wrongful death actions against the FBI were brought by the family of Walter Bennett and William Bennett and are related to other wrongful death cases that were filed in the aftermath of the FBI's handling of certain criminal informants, including Stephen Flemmi. The plaintiffs alleged that Flemmi murdered these two Bennett brothers while he was also operating as an FBI informant. They contended that the U.S. was liable for their decedents' murders because the FBI allowed Flemmi to engage in wide-ranging criminal activity, including the murder of their decedents, with impunity. On March 31, the court granted the United States' motions to dismiss based on the plaintiffs' failure to present their claims within two years of accrual. It held that the plaintiffs reasonably should have been aware of widespread newspaper publicity surrounding the FBI's alleged misconduct and related hearings.

Contact: Asheesh Agarwal, Counsel, 353.7957

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, April 05, 2006 8:38 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, April 05, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060405.pdf; agnb060405.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Begin Second Stage Of Sentencing Process 4
FBI Opposes Changes To Bank Transaction Reporting Requirement 5
Amnesty Report Claims Rendered Yemenis Likely Held In Europe 5
Trials Resume At Guantanamo 5
Pakistani Sentenced To Five Years For Missiles-To-Al Qaeda Plot....5
9/11 Mastermind Clashed With Bin Laden Over Plot Details 5
Bin Laden Half-Brother Contends With Police Suspicions 5
FBI Agent Testifies Earlier Hayat Interviews Spurred Leading Questions....6

Homeland Response:

Shays Says Nuclear Plant Security May Not Be Meeting "Very Realistic Threat."....6
Chertoff Says He Will Recommend X-Ray Technology Used At Hong Kong Ports....6
Federal Judge Crafts Deposition Compromise In 9/11 Suits 6
DHS Plans To Move Ahead With Pay System Changes....7
9/11 Movies Quickly Generate Controversy....7
NYC, New York State Urged To "Take Back The Towers." 7
Senate Appropriations Committee Votes To Add $8 Billion To Hurricane Request 7

War News:

Bush Urges Iraqi Leaders To Form Unity Government Quickly....9
Iraqi Vice President Calls For Al-Jaafari's Resignation 9
Rice Says US Will Not Establish Permanent Bases In Iraq....9
Sadr Spokesman Wants Timetable For US Withdrawal 10
Voters In 19 Wisconsin Towns Support Withdrawing US Troops From Iraq 10
Kerry Says US Should Set Deadline For Troop Withdrawal 10
Car Bomb Kills Ten Iraqis In Sadr City....10
Iraqi Prosecutors Unveil New Charges Against Saddam 10
Russian Oil Giant Hopes To Regain Iraqi Oil Field 11
First Cavalry Division Dedicates Memorial To Iraq Dead 11
Mother Mourns Loss Of Marine Son In Iraq 11
Iraq Wounded Have Transformed Walter Reed's Staff....11

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Witness Says Layoffs Were "Redeployments." 11
SEC Alleges Fraud In Case Of DC Charter Funds 12
Executive Says Rules In Section 404 Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law Should Be Narrowed....12

Criminal Law:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Committee DOJ Moving To Slowly On Pedophiles....13
DHS Deputy Press Secretary Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online 14
Federal Judge Revokes Mississippi Attorney's Bond In Judicial Bribery Case 14
Final Closing Statements Made At "Mafia Cops" Trial 14
Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Stolen Rembrandt 15
More Charges Possible In Hollywood Private Eye Scandal 15
Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer Waives Extradition, Returns To US....15
Tenet Case Judge Declares Second Mistrial 16
Chicago Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Ongoing Probe....16
Former Nevada Commissioner's Friend Testifies About Alleged Bribes 16
Alleged Philadelphia Ticket-Fixer Requests Jury Trial 16
FBI, Postal Inspectors Arrest Three For Alleged Credit-Counseling Fraud....16
New York Investor Found Murdered In Greenwich Mansion..17
Report Finds Fatal Abuse Of Children Increased In 2004 17

Female Homicide Detectives In Maryland Profiled 17

Civil Law:

GAO Report Finds Agencies Lax In Protecting Privacy Rights 17
FDA Accuses Anthrax Vaccine Maker Of Exaggerated Claims 18

Civil Rights:

DOJ To Probe Baton Rouge Police Shooting Death 18
Tennessee Police Sergeants To Face Trial Again On Civil Rights Charges 18
Report Critical Of BOP Response To Inmates' Chemical Concerns 18
9th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In Gay Marriage Case 18
Texas Couple Wins Judgment Against Housing Authority 19
Alabama Legislature Nears Approval Of Bill To Delay Runoff Elections 19
WPost Says Early Voting Bill Taints Maryland Elections 20

Antitrust:

Analyst Sees Potential Problems For AT&T-BellSouth Merger 20
EU Urges Governments To Open Gas Markets 20
Fed Clears Citigroup For Future Large Acquisitions 21
Arcelor Blocks Mittal Takeover By Transferring Dofasco Unit 21
Blockbuster Sued By Netflix For Web Expansion 21
EU Raids Color Line Ferry Company Headquarters 21

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Controversial EPA Air-Quality Draft May Color Wehrum Confirmation Hearing 22
Plan To Expand Yucca Mountain Nuclear Dump Draws Fire 22
Lawsuit Challenges DOE On West Valley Demonstration Project Cleanup 22
AK Steel Settles Toxin Contamination Claims With US, Ohio 23
Former Tribal Casino Workers Seek Venue For Sexual Harassment Lawsuits 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Police Officers, Others Accused In $10 Million Cocaine-Smuggling Plot 23
DEA Investigates California Humane Society 24
Reporting Continues On Harden Case 24
Marijuana Dispensary Moratorium Extended By California Council 24
Major New York State Drug Ring Smashed 24
Selig Defends Handling Of Baseball's Steroid Investigation 24
Alleged Minnesota Courthouse Bombing Plot Uncovered 24

Immigration:

Bush Under Pressure To Intervene In Stalled Senate Immigration Debate 25

Tax:

California Anti-Tax Activist Sentenced 28
GAO Finds Widespread Errors By Tax Preparers 28
Richest Americans Said To Be Reaping Windfall From Investment Tax Cuts 29

Congress-Administration:

Bush Comments Fuel Speculation Snow Resignation Imminent 30
Justice Kennedy Decries Congressional Effort To Force High Court Cameras 30
Spellings Defends No Child Left Behind Act 31
Senators Will No Longer Block Highway Nominee 31
Boehner Says Budget Should Get To Floor This Week 31
Both Parties Jostle For Advantage As DeLay Announces Resignation 32
Backed By Boehner, Ney Says He Won't Resign From Congress 36
Democrats Seek Distance From McKinney As Controversy Continues 37
GAO Criticizes Funding For Abstinence As Part Of AIDS Fight 38
First Lady Emphasizes Homeland Defense During St. Louis Visit 38
House To Take Up Lobbying Reforms Today 38
Senate Democrats Believe Prevention Act Will Strengthen Party's Position On Abortion 39
Democrats Seen As Showing Unity While GOP Appears Divided 39
Biden Asks IG To Probe State Department Screening 39
Bush Daughters Run In Richmond 10K Under Fake Names 39
Santorum Makes Case For Anti-Poverty Agenda 39

Other News:

Shareholders Push For More Disclosure Of Corporate Political Donations 40
Morris Says Clinton Has Opened Herself To Challenge From Left 40
Massachusetts To Require Residents To Carry Health Insurance 40
Rumsfeld, Powell Eulogize Weinberger 41
Boy Scouts Plan $17 Million Camp In Virginia 41
Couric To Announce Plans To Leave "Today" This Morning 41

DOJ_NMG_0025162

Academic Paper On Pro-Israel Lobby Dismissed As "Bigotry." 41
Iran Open To Limited Negotiations On Enrichment 41
Israeli Missile Strike Hits Base In Abbas Compound 42
Rice Could Face Skeptical Reception As She Presents US-India Nuclear Deal To Congress 43
US-Russian Relationship Increasingly Testy 44
Hughes To Lead US Delegation To Benin 44
DHS Near Agreement With China On Illegal Immigrants 44
Tokyo Conference Could Stimulate Stalled North Korea Talks 44
Syrian Regime Cracks Down On Domestic Critics 44
Muslim Scholars Exempt One Danish Firm From Boycott 44
Pakistan Pressures Foreign Students To Leave Madrassahs 44
Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run For Office For First Time 45
Thai Premier Says He Will Step Aside 45
Sri Lankan Candidate Vows To Reform UN 45
De Villepin Defies Renewed Demonstrations Over Labor Law 45
Former British Spy Killed In Northern Ireland 45
NYTimes Column Comments On Rice-Straw Trip's Gender Issues 45
NYTimes Editorial Criticizes Arroyo 45

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 45

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 46

DOJ_NMG_0025163

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Begin Second Stage Of Sentencing Process. The New York Times (4/5, Lewis) reports, "When the jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial take their seats again on Thursday, they will begin a vastly different proceeding than the one they concluded on Monday with the verdict that he was responsible for some of the deaths of Sept. 11, 2001, and is thus eligible for execution." The Times continues, "At the end of this next phase, which may take several weeks, they will be confronted with a verdict form that will be without the subtleties and complex questions of the first phase and instead will ask them to make a more mechanical calculation. … The form will ask them to decide which carries more weight: mitigating factors like Mr. Moussaoui's troubled mental state, or aggravating factors surrounding the deaths of nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11." The Times adds, "The Justice Department has asked the judge to list 26 aggravating factors on the form, including the deaths of hundreds of firefighters and police officers; the grief brought to the victims' families and friends; the disruption to New York City, including the closing of parks, playgrounds and schools and the displacement of businesses; and the destruction of parts of the Pentagon. … Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers are expected to offer two main factors in mitigation: that he is mentally unbalanced and that he is seeking martyrdom. … In the eyes of several death penalty experts and lawyers, there is little doubt as to which way the scale will tilt, no matter what the final verdict form looks like. If the nine men and three women on the jury find that the aggravating factors are greater, they will turn to the simple checkoff on the form, marking whether they believe that Mr. Moussaoui should be jailed for life or executed. The death penalty would mean lethal injection at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind."

The AP (4/5, Sniffen) reports, "Thanks largely to Zacarias Moussaoui himself, prosecutors have cleared their highest hurdle that might deter execution of the al-Qaida conspirator. The path to the death chamber might still contain unpleasant surprises for the government." The AP continues, "When the case began more than four years ago, it looked easier. The government at first thought Moussaoui had been intended to be a 20th hijacker on Sept. 11, 2001. Once it became clear that wasn't his role, the government dialed back its case. … It didn't want to drop the death penalty for the high-profile prisoner who admitted having been trained to fly a plane in an attack similar to Sept. 11. The biggest problem was that Moussaoui was in jail on 9/11 and had been for almost a month." The AP adds, "The final government theory bore some resemblance to a pretzel: Moussaoui was directly responsible for deaths on 9/11 because he hadn't confessed all he knew when arrested. Thus, the contention was, the FBI was prevented from moving to block some or all of the four hijackings that day. … Another twist was added when many of the government witnesses for the prosecution gave as much or more comfort to the defense: They acknowledged misstep after misstep in handling leads about Moussaoui and other terrorists in the summer of 2001, raising doubts about what if anything Moussaoui could have said to change things. … Then Moussaoui took the stand over the objections of the court-appointed defense lawyers. He abandoned claims he'd made for three years that his plot to fly a 747 into the White House was unrelated to 9/11. For the first time, he said he had been training to hijack a fifth jetliner on 9/11 and fly it into the White House. … 'This stage of the penalty phase was probably harder for the government, but that was before he took the stand and connected all the dots for the jury,' said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group that advocates more equitable administration of the death statute." Under the headline "Jurors Will Relive 9/11 In Life-Or-Death Case," The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Serrano, 958K) also report on the prosecution's plan to introduce testimony from victims' family members

Analysts Differ On Whether Execution Equals Martyrdom For Moussaoui. The Washington Post (4/5, A9, Markon, 744K) reports Zacarias Moussaoui's "own words have raised questions about whether he wants to be executed to achieve martyrdom for the terrorist cause that he so passionately embraces. Experts on al-Qaeda and Islam think he does. Moussaoui's flip-flops on the subject make it impossible to be sure." Additionally, legal analysts differ on whether his execution would make him a martyr among Muslim extremists. Rand researcher Bruce Hoffman believes it would, while author Peter Bergen does not, noting that "Even al-Qaeda cut this guy loose."

DOJ_NMG_0025164

FBI Opposes Changes To Bank Transaction Reporting Requirement. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports, "U.S. law-enforcement agencies are opposing efforts by the financial-services industry to cut back a federal requirement that banks report cash transactions in excess of $10,000." Testifying yesterday before the Senate Banking Committee, FBI Terrorist Financing Operations Section Counterterrorism Section Chief Michael Morehart said, "To dramatically alter currency transaction reporting requirements -- without careful, independent study -- could be devastating and a significant setback to investigative and intelligence efforts." The Journal notes, "Such viewpoints may sway committee members who seem to want to tread lightly when considering whether to modify bank reporting requirements." Sen. Paul Sarbanes "said law-enforcement officials 'laid out a strong rationale for the utility of the reports. We've got to strike a balance.'"

Amnesty Report Claims Rendered Yemenis Likely Held In Europe. The Financial Times (4/5, Dombey, Sevastopulo) reports, "Three Yemeni men abducted and mistreated by the US were probably held in eastern Europe, Amnesty International said in a new report." The report, "based on interviews with the former captives, is intended to cast light on Washington's practice of 'rendition'," and it "adds that after being arrested and transferred to US custody in 2003, the men were brought back to Yemen in 2005 and released in February this year. Although all were sentenced for forgery in connection with false travel documents, none was charged with any terrorism-related offences."

Trials Resume At Guantanamo. The Wall Street Journal reports (4/5, Bravin) that "the Bush administration resumed military proceedings against suspected terrorists here." The Journal reports that "the chief military prosecutor [criticized] Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer" for speculating last week on "whether current counterterrorism operations gave rise to nearly unlimited presidential war powers."

Pakistani Sentenced To Five Years For Missiles-To-Al Qaeda Plot. AFP (4/5) reports, "A Pakistani who plotted to peddle heroin and hashish to buy Stinger anti-aircraft missiles for Al-Qaeda or the Taliban has been jailed for nearly five years, US prosecutors said." AFP continues, "Muhammed Abid Afridi, who pleaded guilty in March 2004 to conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish, was sentenced Monday in the California city of San Diego. … US District Judge James Lorenz sentenced Afridi to 57 months behind bars, followed by five years of supervised release, for taking part in the conspiracy along with two other men. … Co-conspirators Ilyas Ali and Syed Mustajab Shah, who pleaded guilty to the same charges, are scheduled to be sentenced next Monday and on June 19, respectively." AFP adds, "The trio of conspirators travelled from the Pakistani city of Karachi to Hong Kong on September 15, 2002 to meet with US undercover officers to negotiate for the sale of large quantities of drugs, the indictment showed. … The next day, the defendants agreed that they could offset the purchase price of five tonnes of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin against the cost of four Stinger shoulder-launched missiles, according to prosecutors."

9/11 Mastermind Clashed With Bin Laden Over Plot Details. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Meyer, 958K) reports that to "hear Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed tell it, Osama bin Laden was a meddling boss whose indiscretion and poor judgment threatened to derail the terrorist attacks." Bin Laden also "saddled Mohammed with at least four would-be hijackers who the ringleader thought were ill-equipped for the job. And he carelessly dropped hints about the imminent attacks, violating Mohammed's cardinal rule against discussing the suicide hijacking plot." The "repeated conflicts between the two Al Qaeda leaders emerged last week during the penalty phase of the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui." Jurors heard "new details of the plot from the interrogation summaries of several captured Al Qaeda officials, including an extraordinary account of a series of interrogations of Mohammed."

Bin Laden Half-Brother Contends With Police Suspicions. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) reports that Swiss businessman Yeslam Bin Laden is being sued for alleged "hidden financial connections" to his half-brother Osama. Yeslam "says he barely knows Osama," but his ex-wife has joined forces with 9/11 victims' survivors and charges in a court filing that "his complex finances, also a focus of police investigators in several countries, support suspicions that the half-brothers have had financial ties."

DOJ_NMG_0025165

FBI Agent Testifies Earlier Hayat Interviews Spurred Leading Questions. The Sacramento Bee (4/5, Walsh, 301K) reports FBI Special Agent Gary Schaaf "agreed Tuesday in federal court testimony that he asked leading questions during a videotaped confession of Hamid Hayat," but Schaff "testified that, immediately before he interviewed Hayat…he had been in an adjacent room observing the questioning of Hayat by another agent. That prior interview, which was not recorded, gave him ideas on areas to pursue with Hayat, Schaaf said. In addition, the agent testified, he was familiar with the contents of many hours of secretly recorded conversations in 2002 and 2003 between Hayat and Naseem Khan, a former fast-food and mini mart worker operating undercover for the FBI.

Relief Worker Testifies Alleged Terror Camp Is Pakistani Military Post. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/5, Bohm) reports that in additional testimony yesterday, DC-based disaster relief worker James Lazor testified for the defense that he "was on an independent humanitarian mission to earthquake victims in Pakistan when Hayat's defense team asked him to visit the camp" which the prosecution alleges Hayat attended to receive terror training. "When he arrived there Feb. 17…he was turned away by a uniformed man who identified himself as a sergeant in the Pakistani military. … 'He said it was a military camp that wasn't open to the public and that the whole ridge was controlled by the military,'" Lazor testified. KXTV-TV Sacramento (/44, Hedlund) also reports on Lazor's and Schaaf's testimony.

FBI Informant Finds Previously-Undisclosed Surveillance Tape. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/5, Bohm) also reports it was revealed at court yesterday that FBI informant Naseem Khan "has suddenly found another tape that was never given to investigators or attorneys." The recording of a "telephone conversation is about 20 minutes long and was marked Oct. 13, 2002, about two months after Khan met Hamid Hayat." Umer Hayat defense attorney Johnny Griffin "said in court that he wants to know why Khan didn't give the tape to the FBI more than three years ago," and Hamid Hayat lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi "said outside court that it bolsters the defense claim. 'That just puts a lot of things into question,' she said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Shays Says Nuclear Plant Security May Not Be Meeting "Very Realistic Threat." The New York Times (4/5, Wald, 1.19M) reports on a House subcommittee hearing on nuclear power plant security, in which witnesses clashed over "who was responsible for defending nuclear power plants against terrorist attack, and whether the combination of private guard forces and police agencies was adequate." Rep. Christopher Shays said that he believed security requirements had been eased "because we've made a decision that it's not practical to meet what may in fact be a very realistic threat." Meanwhile, a GAO report released at the hearing said the Nuclear Regulatory Commission "had created the appearance of a government agency submitting to industry pressure," though members of the commission testified that that was not the case.

Chertoff Says He Will Recommend X-Ray Technology Used At Hong Kong Ports. The AP (4/4, McDonald) reported that Secretary Chertoff said Tuesday that the US and China were "close to reaching an agreement" that would allow for the repatriation of up to 39,000 illegal Chinese immigrants in the US. He "also said he would recommend implementing new X-ray technology to screen US-bound cargos at foreign ports after seeing a successful pilot program in Hong Kong." Chertoff said he was "going to suggest that we get to the stage of implementing some kind of proposal to put into effect a combination of this X-ray technology and this radiation technology at the ports of embarkation."

Federal Judge Crafts Deposition Compromise In 9/11 Suits. The New York Law Journal (4/5, Hamblett) reports, "Frustrated by the government's approach to protecting sensitive security information, a federal judge has crafted a compromise so depositions can proceed in earnest in the litigation against airlines and airports over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein said he had to intervene "to avoid further and unnecessary delay in the progress of these cases and relieve counsel of the inherent conflicts and artificial roles" that the position of the Transportation Security Administration has created for plaintiffs lawyers." The Journal adds, "The judge's ruling in In Re September 11 Litigation, 21 MC 97 and 21 MC 101, concerned the refusal of the Transportation Security Administration to attend depositions of the airline defendants in the litigation -- and require that defense lawyers be charged with safeguarding the security information. … The TSA intervened in the cases, which involve family members of Sept. 11 victims who opted to proceed to court instead of applying to the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund. … The transportation administration intervened to protect what is called Sensitive Security Information -- information about security plans and procedures of the airports and airline industry."

DOJ_NMG_0025166

DHS Plans To Move Ahead With Pay System Changes. The Washington Post (4/5, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Department of Homeland Security is moving ahead with its plan to change how it evaluates and pays employees, even as it tries to fend off unions in court. The pay changes and the court case are separate issues, but the union litigation has altered the department's timetable and injected some uncertainty into how far Homeland Security can go in changing some key workplace rules. … The litigation is scheduled to resume tomorrow, when the unions, led by the National Treasury Employees Union, and the government make oral arguments before a federal appeals court. … Although the unions have focused their legal efforts on stopping the department's new work rules, they also are wary of the new pay system, contending that the government has a poor track record in creating performance-based management systems that are viewed as fair and credible by workers."

9/11 Movies Quickly Generate Controversy. The release of the first movies documenting the events of September 11, 2001 has touched a raw nerve with many. The trailer for one movie, "United 93," has been pulled from some theatres after complaints. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 7, 2:45, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Many audience members have been shocked by seeing a trailer advertising a movie called 'United 93,' playing, now, as a preview in theaters. Which raises the question -- is it appropriate to make a movie about a national tragedy? And if not now, when?" ABC (Snow) added, "After complaints, this theater in New York City pulled the trailer. But Universal Studios, the distributor, stands by the film. The studio has been working with the families of all 40 people on flight 93."

NYC, New York State Urged To "Take Back The Towers." In an op-ed in the New York Times (4/5, Smith, 1.19M), ex-firefighter and financier Dennis Smith says that, given the feuding over the World Trade Center site, City Hall and Albany need to invoke "the eminent domain clause." He calls Mayor Bloomberg "the natural choice to become chief engineer and contractor of a smaller, smarter, more appropriate ground zero."

Senate Appropriations Committee Votes To Add $8 Billion To Hurricane Request. The New York Times (4/5, Eaton, 1.19M) reports the Senate Appropriations Committee voted yesterday to add about $8 billion in hurricane aid to President Bush's $19 billion request, meaning "that Louisiana will most likely retain all of the $4.2 billion that the House approved for home rebuilding." Meanwhile, Sen. Thad Cochran "added considerable aid for his state," including "$700 million to relocate a privately owned freight rail line in Mississippi, $1.2 billion for a pilot program favored by Mississippi's governor to replace trailers with cottages and $1 billion in block grants that are likely to go to Mississippi and Texas." However, "some senators are pledging to fight the ballooning supplemental appropriation, which they say should be used for emergency spending only."

Landrieu Threatens To Hold Bush Nominations Over Levee Funding. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 4, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu has "vowed to hold up all of President Bush's executive branch nominations unless he asks Congress for all the money needed to rebuild the New Orleans levees. The government said last week the job could cost $6 billion, twice the amount that has already been appropriated."

The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 3, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Sen. Landrieu "warned President Bush today she means business about getting Katrina recovery money for her state." Landrieu "also wants a 30-year commitment of $2 billion a year for Gulf Coast recovery."

The Hill (4/5, Allen) reports that in a letter sent to Bush yesterday, Landrieu wrote, "Mr. President the piecemeal approach that has marked your administration's response to providing adequate levee and flood protection for Louisiana has not worked. It needs to be replaced by a comprehensive approach that is both more effective and cost-efficient." Landrieu "hinted that she has other arrows in her quiver but did not specify what other means she might have to put pressure on the president or the GOP-led Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0025167

CNN's The Situation (4/4, Blitzer) reported that Sen. Mary Landrieu said on the Senate floor "that she is going to block all of the president's appointments unless he moves quickly, expeditiously, to provide billions of dollars for Hurricane Katrina relief in Louisiana and to improve the levee system." CNN added, "No word yet from the White House on this threat from Mary Landrieu to hold up all, all presidential nominations, all presidential appointments until she gets what she wants as far as Hurricane Katrina relief is concerned."

Flood Maps Seen As Important Factor In Deciding Whether To Return To Louisiana. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Jonsson, 61K) reports that for most residents of Plaquemines Parish, "the decision of whether to return is becoming more complex." With the cost to make the state's levees able to withstand "Katrina-size storms" at $9 billion, flood plain maps have become "a key to the recovery riddle, since they will guide rebuilding and factor in developers' calculations. … The Army Corps of Engineers completed its first repairs on the Plaquemines levees on March 17, bringing them up to their original height and bolstering them with sturdier clays. But a harsh prospect overshadowed its restoration. 'Another Katrina would overtop this levee,' said Army Corps of Engineers Col. Lewis Setliff during a press conference near the Empire Lock in Nairn, La."

FEMA Says Trailer Park That Prompted Suspension Was Approved Months Ago. In an article that seems to find fault with Mayor C. Ray Nagin's decision to suspend construction of FEMA trailer parks in New Orleans, the New York Times (4/5, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that with New Orleans' mayoral election less that three weeks away, "the sympathy of elected officials for the irritations of voters in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is boundless. As a result, there will be no trailer park in Lakewood Estates, a collection of solid, spacious homes behind a high locked gate in the Algiers section." FEMA "was already well along" in constructing the site, "but fortunately for the residents of Lakewood Estates, campaign season is also well along." Mayor C. Ray Nagin said that the construction of the site, and, "for the moment, all other trailer sites in the city," was suspended. FEMA, meanwhile, "said it was puzzled, especially since the Algiers trailer site had been approved by the mayor months ago, said Darryl Madden, an agency spokesman."

NYTimes Says Difficulty Finding Brown Replacement Shows Major Reforms Needed At FEMA. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) editorializes that top candidates to replace Michael Brown as director of FEMA are sending the administration the message that no one wants "to take over as captain of a ship that's already sinking." Though "high-profile positions like that are sought after, even fought over," the Times writes that "no one seems to want to take over the rudderless agency after the mess that followed Hurricane Katrina." The Times states that "President Bush needs to set a clear agenda for reform and make tangible commitments on the agency's future role." Also, naming acting director David Paulison as the permanent chief, "would create the impression that this crucial government function was being handed over to the only person willing to take it on."

64% Chance Of Major Hurricane Predicted For East Coast. USA Today (4/5, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports the Tropical Meteorology Project at Colorado State University predicted Tuesday that the 2006 "hurricane season is likely to be very active, though not as bad as last year's record-shattering barrage on the Gulf Coast." Meanwhile, the team's "'landfall probability' outlook sees a 64% chance that a major hurricane — Category 3 or higher… — will hit" the East Coast. "The central Gulf Coast…rates a 30% likelihood for a major hurricane."

Insurers See Record Profits. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Gosselin, 958K) reports, "The companies that provide Americans with their homeowners and auto insurance made a record $44.8-billion profit last year even after accounting for the claims of policyholders wiped out by Hurricane Katrina and the other big storms of 2005, according to the firms' filings with state regulators." Executives said the profit was "a fluke," and "said that even with the increase, insurers face deep problems that can be fixed only by substantial premium hikes, a scaling back of commitments by several firms to the most disaster-prone portions of the country and, according to some, a greatly expanded role for the state and federal governments in insuring individuals against the largest of catastrophes."

International Red Cross Officials Criticize US Organization's Katrina Response. The New York Times (4/5, Strom, 1.19M) reports that international Red Cross officials that aided their American counterparts during the response to Hurricane Katrina have filed "unusually harsh reports" detailing "mismatches between the needs of victims and the supplies the Red Cross had arranged, the absence of a plan to guide the distribution of supplies and a lack of record-keeping, which allowed inventory to go astray." The

DOJ_NMG_0025168

Times adds that they "closely echo concerns raised by volunteers in the disaster area."

The Washington Post (4/5, A14, Salmon, 744K) reports, "The reports continue the drumbeat of criticism of the charity, which has escalated in the months since hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents flocked to Red Cross shelters and relief trucks after Katrina struck." The reports, prepared in September by the British Red Cross and the International Committee of the Red Cross in September, were not released by the American Red Cross "until yesterday, after The Washington Post asked the British Red Cross for a copy."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Urges Iraqi Leaders To Form Unity Government Quickly. President Bush yesterday urged Iraqi leaders to move quickly to form a unity government. The AP (4/4, Sidoti) reported that Bush called on the leaders to "stand up and do their job," noting that the formation of a new government "would give Iraqis confidence in their future." Bush made his statement "during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House."

Administration Scales Back Funding For Organizations Promoting Democracy In Iraq. The Bush Administration has been scaling back funding for the organizations attempting to carry out the President's vision in Iraq. A front page story in the Washington Post (4/5 A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "The administration has included limited new money for traditional democracy promotion in budget requests to Congress. … The shift in funding priorities comes as security costs are eating up an enormous share of U.S. funds for Iraq and the administration has already ratcheted back ambitions for reconstructing the country's battered infrastructure. While acknowledging that they are investing less in party-building and other such activities, administration officials argue that bringing more order and helping Iraqis run effective ministries contribute to democracy as well."

US Seen As Pressuring Iraq For Political Action While Encouraging Sovereignty. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the US strongest influence in Iraq may be "the simple fear of what would happen if the US up and left." The US is showing signs of "growing increasingly impatient with Iraqi leaders over their inability to name a new government," does not want "to look as if it is determining Iraq's future. The result is a delicate balancing act: It's applying pressure for political action even while encouraging a sovereign Iraq that appears to stand on its own two feet." The US is "operating with the knowledge that too much pressure could have the negative result of prolonging the leadership stalemate among politicians who are sensitive about foreign influences in Iraq."

Ignatius Says US Should Not Pull Plug Prematurely On Iraq Talks. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K), "Americans are getting impatient about the formation of a new Iraqi government. That's what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told political leaders in Baghdad this week, and she was putting it mildly. But it would be folly if American impatience torpedoed the slow but real progress Iraqi leaders are making toward a government that could step back from the brink of civil war. The "X-factor in this delicate game is U.S. political support. Khalilzad could fail in his effort to midwife a unity government, and Iraq could spiral into full-blown civil war. But it would be crazy for an impatient America to talk itself into defeat and pull the plug prematurely."

Iraqi Vice President Calls For Al-Jaafari's Resignation. Iraqi Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi yesterday called for the resignation of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. The AP (4/5, Reid) reports that Abdul-Mahdi's comments make him "the most senior Shiite official publicly to endorse demands for a leadership change to halt the slide toward civil war." Abdul-Mahdi said he met with al-Jaafari on Monday "and urged him to give up the nomination for a second term because he had lost the confidence of the Sunnis and Kurds. But Abdul-Mahdi said al-Jaafari refused, insisting he wanted to take his case to parliament, which must approve the new prime minister and his Cabinet by a majority vote."

Rice Says US Will Not Establish Permanent Bases In Iraq. The AP (4/5, Sidoti) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday "brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq. 'The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that,' Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel. 'I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to.' ... However, Rice did not say when all US forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman, D-NJ, when he asked, 'Will the bases be permanent or not?'" Instead, Rice responded, "I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days."

DOJ_NMG_0025169

WSJournal Criticizes Rice's Iraq Trip. In a critical editorial entitled, "Condi's Iraq Stumble," the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) blasts Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent trip to Iraq, saying, "Try as we might, we can't see what good purpose was served by Condoleezza Rice and Jack Straw's lobbying in Baghdad earlier this week. If the American Secretary of State and British Foreign Secretary were aiming to be diplomatic, they failed. That's because with both words and gestures the two publicly took sides in a contentious dispute over forming Iraq's government." Rice "is surely right that the US sacrifice for Iraqi freedom has earned us the right to speak up. But except where US interests are clearly threatened, pressure is best applied behind closed doors by the seasoned US Ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, not the unsubtle endorsement of candidates by overnighting officials."

Sadr Spokesman Wants Timetable For US Withdrawal. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 7, 3:15, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "When you enter the vast Shiite slum of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, your life is in the hands of one of the most formidable militias in the capital, the Mahdi army." In an interview, Sheikh Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, "who speaks for their leader, rebel Shiite cleric Moqtada Al-Sadr…blamed America for trying to create civil war in Iraq, saying, 'I tell President Bush that the freedom you want is the freedom of blood.' His armed guards agreed, and although they wouldn't talk on camera, made it clear they want American forces to leave Iraq." The militia's "political leaders are publicly at least calling for restraint. 'American forces leaving Iraq immediately might not make any sense, so what we want is a timetable,' the sheik told us. 'Everything depends on setting a timetable for American withdrawal.'" A "wave of sectarian killings here is being blamed on the various militias, and with more tortured bodies turning up every day, the US Ambassador has called on Iraq's leaders to act against them." Zalmay Khalilzad, US Ambassador to Iraq: "It's time that the government, with the help of the international community, deals with the militia issues by decommissioning, demobilizing and re-integrating them."

Voters In 19 Wisconsin Towns Support Withdrawing US Troops From Iraq. USA Today (4/5, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Voters in 32 Wisconsin communities went to the polls Tuesday to decide referendums calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. By late Tuesday night, ballots had been counted in 25 towns and cities. The measures passed in 19 of them, including Madison, and were defeated in six." USA Today adds, "Organizers hope the outcome in Wisconsin will encourage people in other states to put similar referendums on November ballots and prompt members of Congress to put pressure on the Bush administration to bring troops home. … A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month found that 54% of Americans want U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq now or within a year, and 60% said it wasn't worth it to go to war in Iraq." The Washington Post (4/5, A7, Kydersen, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Majority Of 32 Wisconsin Towns Vote For Iraq Pullout."

Kerry Says US Should Set Deadline For Troop Withdrawal. Sen. John Kerry writes in the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M), "For three years now, the administration has told us that terrible things will happen if we get tough with the Iraqis. In fact, terrible things are happening now because we haven't gotten tough enough." Kerry notes, "Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines -- a deadline to transfer authority to a provisional government, and a deadline to hold three elections. Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet. Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet."

Car Bomb Kills Ten Iraqis In Sadr City. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 7, 3:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Ten Iraqis were killed by a car bomb in Sadr City, a Shiite district of Baghdad."

Iraqi Prosecutors Unveil New Charges Against Saddam. Iraqi prosecutors yesterday unveiled new charges against former dictator Saddam Hussein, this time seeking to hold him to account for the slaughter of possibly 100,000 Kurds and the use of chemical weapons during the 1980s. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Raman) reported "prosecutors allege it was a campaign meant to systematically destroy the Kurdish people of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0025170

Conservative estimates say that well over 100,000 Kurds were killed in the course of that campaign."

The story was briefly reported by each of the networks. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 5, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Six former aides were also charged, including one of his cousins, the man known as Chemical Ali, for allegedly directing deadly gas attacks." The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 6, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Saddam is still on trial on other mass murder charges." NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The special Iraqi court that is trying him announced today it has charged him with trying to wipe out the Kurds with a military campaign that killed at least 50,000 civilians back in 1988."

The New York Times (4/5, Wong, 1.19M), Los Angeles Times (4/5, Moore, 958K), Washington Times/AP (4/5, Yacoub) and Washington Post (4/5, A18, Finer, Nouri, 744K) run similar reports. The AP (4/5, Deutsch) reports Michael Scharf, director of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, "said the genocide case against Saddam won't be easy to prove 'despite the large number of Kurdish victims (reportedly more than 100,000).'" Scharf "said a number of issues could undermine the case including the sparing of Kurdish villagers, the killing of non-Kurds and potentially legitimate military goals and economic aims."

Russian Oil Giant Hopes To Regain Iraqi Oil Field. The Washington Times (4/5, Mihailescu, 90K) reports that the Russian firm Lukoil views the "formation of a new Iraqi government as an opportunity to deal itself back into that country's huge West Qurna oil field." Lukoil lost its Qurna contract "in December 2002 as coalition forces were building up for the 2003 invasion."

First Cavalry Division Dedicates Memorial To Iraq Dead. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 11, 2:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the 1st Cavalry Division "is deployed in Iraq and went there more than two years ago. Since then, this division has suffered more than most. 168 soldiers lost. Today, at their home base in Ft. Hood, Texas, they dedicated a memorial." ABC (Hayes) added, "This memorial was built, fashioned after the Vietnam Memorial, with names etched in granite." It was "designed with blank slates, room for names that may still be etched here before the war is over."

Mother Mourns Loss Of Marine Son In Iraq. The Washington Post (4/4, A21, 744K) reports Danielette James, a federal custodian who cleans congressional offices five nights a week, learned over the weekend that that her son, Eric McIntire, "had been killed by a roadside bomb near Baghdad." McIntire "was traveling in a Humvee with other members of his platoon on Sunday when a bomb exploded, killing him and several other men, James said." James "last saw her son at Christmas. She last talked to him a few days before he returned to Iraq in early March. Before, he had wanted to go to Iraq because all of his friends were there, James said. This time he was reluctant, she said.'

Iraq Wounded Have Transformed Walter Reed's Staff. A front page story in the Washington Post (4/5, A1, Levine, 744K) reports that the Iraq war "remains ubiquitous in the operating rooms" of Walter Reed Medical Center. The Post adds, "So many have arrived in the past three years -- so many continue to arrive -- that they have transformed the hospital's routine. The staff has been redeployed, programs created, a special military company activated just for the injured. … But the cumulative effect of nearly 4,900 patients, including 1,458 battle casualties, has done more than change the institution. It has deeply affected the hundreds of doctors, nurses and therapists who work there -- who have been inspired by the resiliency and motivation of the individuals in their care, yet shaken and exhausted by the magnitude of loss."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Says Layoffs Were "Redeployments." The AP (4/5, Graczyk) reports, "A former Enron Corp. human resources supervisor testified Tuesday that people who moved from its struggling broadband venture were given opportunities to shift assignments, disputing earlier testimony that they were laid off." The AP continues, "Sarah Davis, testifying for a second day at the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay, said the March 2001 cuts at Enron Broadband Services were 'redeployments' and not layoffs. … Kenneth Rice, who ran Enron's money-losing broadband venture, testified in February that Skilling told him to characterize layoffs at the unit in early 2001 as redeployment so some 250 employees would believe they would keep their jobs and Wall Street analysts who influenced the company's stock would remain bullish on the weakening venture." The AP adds, "Asked by Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher if Rice or anyone else at Enron told her the cutbacks were 'a ruse to lay people off' or 'some sort of disguised layoffs,' Davis replied: 'No. It was redeployment.' … But under cross-examination, she said it wasn't part of her duties to keep up with the business reasons for any redeployments or layoffs."

DOJ_NMG_0025171

Witness Testifies Skilling Did Not Favor Partnership. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, McWilliams) reports, "A former Enron Corp. executive testified that former President Jeffrey Skilling insisted that a controversial partnership run by the company's chief financial officer be treated the same as other bidders during the sale of an Enron subsidiary." The Journal continues, "The defense witness's testimony is intended to show that the relationship between Enron and the partnership, known as LJM, was proper and at arm's length, as opposed to the conflict-laden relationship that prosecutors allege was used to manipulate the company's finances." The Journal adds, "J. Mark Metts, who negotiated asset sales and acquisitions while at Enron, testified that Mr. Skilling never sought any favors for the LJM partnership amid the partnership's efforts to involve itself in a prospective asset sale that Mr. Metts was handling. LJM, a partnership set up and run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former finance chief, is at the core of the government's conspiracy case. Prosecutors contend LJM was used improperly to hide losses from investors and to boost profits."

Skilling On The Stand Will Be Confronted With Past Testimony. The New York Times (4/5, Eichenwald, Barrionuevo) reports, "As Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, moves from the defense table to the witness stand as soon as today, he will have to be prepared to confront his own past testimony." The Times continues, "At his trial in Houston, Mr. Skilling will be bound by the very words he spoke under oath in secret testimony given more than four years ago, at a time when the Enron criminal investigation had not yet begun. … The testimony, taken in December 2001 as part of an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into the Enron debacle, serves as a road map to the defense Mr. Skilling will offer on the stand. It also points up some potential pitfalls he faces. A transcript of the testimony, which has not been made public, was obtained by The New York Times." The Times adds, "The transcript lays out not only what is sure to be the foundation of Mr. Skilling's own explanation for what went wrong at Enron, but also the words that could be used against him in cross-examination. … At the heart of Mr. Skilling's statements in his previous testimony was a simple refrain: Enron took every precaution; everything was legal; nothing was hidden; nothing was improper. But Mr. Skilling also advanced the argument that if anything illegal had occurred, he could not possibly have been on top of every transaction at Enron, simply because the company was too sprawling for any one person to control."

Lay Attorney Awaits Further Surgery. The Washington Post (4/5, Johnson) reports, "The lead lawyer for former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay has been hospitalized for more tests while he awaits surgery, a move that could put him out of commission for a significant portion of his client's defense against fraud charges." The Post continues, "Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are evaluating Michael W. Ramsey, 66, for a new blockage in his carotid artery that doctors uncovered in tests Tuesday. … Last month, during a short break in the trial, Ramsey had a stent successfully implanted in a different artery to help correct shortness of breath and other symptoms he had since at least the third week of Lay and protege Jeffrey K. Skilling's trial."

SEC Alleges Fraud In Case Of DC Charter Funds. The Washington Post (4/5, B1, Montgomery) reports, "Federal securities regulators yesterday accused a Maryland firm of defrauding the District of millions in federal and local funds earmarked for D.C. charter schools, saying the firm used the cash to try to prop up two failing subsidiaries." The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission "alleges that Geneva Capital Partners LLC and its owner, Eric M. Westbury of Silver Spring, obtained investments of more than $21 million from the District without telling D.C. officials that two of the city's advisers had a financial stake in Westbury's firms. Westbury then used some of the cash to cover losses at his other companies, which together owe about $33 million to more than 2,000 small investors nationwide, the complaint says." Geneva also "owes the District about $11 million." John M. Fedders, Westbury's attorney, said, "We dispute paragraph after paragraph of these SEC allegations." U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow "gave Fedders until April 26 to file his objections, and she set a hearing date for May 12."

Executive Says Rules In Section 404 Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law Should Be Narrowed. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A20), Richard C.

DOJ_NMG_0025172

Pozen, chairman of MFS Investment Management, discusses "Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires an annual assessment by public companies of their internal controls over financial reporting." Pozen says that "instead of exempting small companies from Section 404," the SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board "should apply to all public companies narrower rules on internal controls. Management's assessment of internal controls should focus on the material information contained in the company's reports to the SEC, and the auditors should attest to management's assessment by reviewing its processes and sample testing. Both should apply the traditional concept of materiality -- financial significance relative to the whole company. In this manner, Section 404 will be very helpful in preventing material misstatements in a company's reports to the SEC, but at a much lower cost."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Committee DOJ Moving To Slowly On Pedophiles. Justin Berry, a victim of the $20 billion Internet child pornography trade, yesterday testified before Congress. The story was covered by ABC in its first two stories, while CBS covered it early in its lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (4/4, lead story, 3:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Justin Berry described how he was lured into the world of child sex Websites when he was just 13 years old. It is a booming business. An estimated $20 billion is spent worldwide on child pornography each year. Law enforcement is overwhelmed by the number of new cases every day. And Justin Berry is one of thousands of victims. But his story, told on Capitol Hill, today, is now a lesson on how to stop the predators." ABC (L. Stark) added, "Lawmakers were riveted and stunned by the testimony they heard today. How easy it is for online predators to lure in a lonely teenager. Justin Berry was an honor student, class president, when he was lured into the world of online child pornography." Rep. Joe Barton: "I've never been more revolted in preparing for a hearing, than in reading the materials I had to read for this one." Stark: "There was criticism today of the Justice Department, saying there's been little aggressive prosecution. And that online predators have nothing to fear. The Justice Department insists that child online pornography is a high priority. And they say prosecutions have jumped 300% in the last ten years."

The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 4, 2:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Congress was riveted by the story of how an honor student from Bakersfield, California, used a web camera to delve into a world of online predators where he was first explorer, then exploited." Help "came last June when a New York Times reporter investigating web cam child porn found Justin and convinced him to leave the business." But "out of more than 1,000 names Justin turned over to the Justice Department last summer, only two have been charged. Part of today's hearing was about trying to get more prosecutions going."

The AP (4/4, Kellman) reports, "Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told a House panel Tuesday that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year. … 'I believed that the government would protect the children being abused. I believed they would act quickly,' Berry, now 19, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee. 'I was wrong.'" The AP continues, "Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra disputed that, citing a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases nationally over the past decade. The unit investigating Berry's case, which Sierra could not discuss, has seen its workload increase 450 percent in the last four years. … 'One of law enforcement's highest priorities is the protection of innocent children from sexual predators who lurk on the Internet,' Sierra said. … The same committee will hear from the Justice Department, among other federal agencies, on Thursday." The AP adds, "Berry's story of a lonely teenager who sought friends on the Internet but instead grew rich attracting pedophiles was reported in December by the New York Times after a six-month investigation. Its author, Kurt Eichenwald, told the Energy and Commerce Committee on Tuesday that Berry is the first such teenage witness known to turn over such a vast cache of evidence to the government. … But even Berry's catalog of his clients' names, credit card numbers and other details has resulted in only one arrest, he and Eichenwald said. … 'From the time that the government was notified of Justin's information to the point where the children in direct danger were saved, more than 50 days passed,' Eichenwald told the panel. 'Some people identified as perpetrators literally could not get themselves arrested if they tried.'"

DOJ_NMG_0025173

DHS Deputy Press Secretary Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online. The Washington Post (4/5, A24, Hsu, 744K) reports DHS' deputy press secretary, Brian J. Doyle, "was arrested last night on charges that he used the Internet to seduce an undercover Florida sheriff's detective who he thought was a 14-year-old girl, the Polk County Sheriff's Office said." He was "charged with seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful materials to a minor, according to a sheriff's office statement." The sheriff's office said that "Doyle told an undercover computer-crimes detective who he was and that he worked for the Department of Homeland Security, later disclosing numbers for his office phone and government-issued cellphone and using those lines." Chertoff press secretary Russ Knocke released "a written statement, saying, 'We take these allegations very seriously and we will cooperate fully with this ongoing investigation.'"

Appearing on CNN's Anderson Cooper (4/4), with the words "D.H.S. Sex Allegations" across the bottom of the screen, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said Doyle "clearly identified himself as the deputy press secretary for Homeland Security. And if he would provide that kind of information, to include a photograph of himself with his identification tags, who else may he be talking to around the world who he thinks to be a 14-year-old girl?"

Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/4) reported that "Doyle engaged in sexually explicit conversations with, who he believed was a 14-year-old girl over the internet, even sending her pornographic movie clips. The girl turned out to be an undercover agent."

The Washington Times (4/5, Hudson, 90K) reports, "Doyle will be placed on administrative leave today pending an investigation and may be extradited to Florida to face charges." Beyond his written statement, "Mr. Knocke declined to comment further on the charges or say how long Mr. Doyle has been under investigation by the sheriff's office, by the Florida State Attorney's Office and the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general."

Federal Judge Revokes Mississippi Attorney's Bond In Judicial Bribery Case. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (4/5, Lee) reports, "U.S. District Court judge Henry T. Wingate revoked attorney Paul Minor's bond in the judicial bribery case Tuesday because Minor violated the terms of his release by getting drunk. … The order to revoke bond was handed down in a hearing Tuesday morning in Jackson." The Sun Herald continues, "Wingate said he would have considered a treatment plan had the defense presented one. Instead, defense attorney Dennis Sweet of Jackson argued that Minor wasn't drunk March 6 at the Marriott Hotel in Jackson. … Minor was taken into custody by the U.S. Marshals Service and will be transferred to the Madison County jail, where he is scheduled to remain until trial. However, Minor attorney Brad Pigott of Jackson said the defense plans to present an alternative treatment plan for alcohol abuse as soon as possible." The Sun Herald adds, "Wingate indicated he would be willing to consider such a plan as an alternative to incarceration. … A morning's testimony about his condition that night conflicted, but Wingate found Drug Enforcement Administration agents who witnessed Minor's intoxication more convincing than testimony from two Marriott employees who got to know Minor over the course of his first judicial bribery trial last summer."

Final Closing Statements Made At "Mafia Cops" Trial. The AP (4/5, Hays) reports that in his closing statement yesterday at the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, defense lawyer Bruce Cutler said Caracappa "was a dedicated lawman and aspiring screenplay writer who was fingered by corrupt government cooperators." Cutler "attacked the credibility of two key government witnesses -- confessed drug dealer Burton Kaplan…and admitted embezzler Steven Corso," saying that Kaplan "led a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life" and calling Corso a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief." In his rebuttal, Assistant US Attorney Robert Henoch "argued that the defense never explained why Kaplan knew personal details about the lives of 'Brooklyn's finest.' He also asked jurors to focus on Corso's testimony about asking the ex-officers to help him score drugs for some potential film backers from Hollywood who were visiting Las Vegas in 2005." The New York Times (4/5, Feuer, 1.19M) notes Cutler's "summation was less a legal argument than a free-associative ode, a lawyerly tone poem on the themes of hope, justice and the spoken word." But Henoch said in his rebuttal, "You can't just say it and it becomes true. You need evidence in a temple of justice — not just words from the dictionary."

Newsday (4/5, DeStefano) reports on Cutler's and Henoch's summations, and adds that "after hours of being cajoled, roused and emotionally tugged at by the closing arguments of prosecution and defense attorneys, the jury went home for the day" and "is set to return to court at 9:30 Wednesday morning." In a second story, under the headline "Time Of Essence In 'Mafia Cops' Trial," Newsday (4/5, DeStephano) reports, "More than 40 witnesses have testified and numerous exhibits have been introduced as evidence that prosecutors contend are strong enough to convict both men," but "the 500-pound legal gorilla in the case involves the statute of limitation for racketeering conspiracy, something that concerns Judge Jack Weinstein. … If the jury finds that the conspiracy and Eppolito's and Caracappa's involvement in it ended before March 9, 2000, then the two defendants would be acquitted of the racketeering charges, including the murders. However, drug and money laundering charges would remain regardless."

DOJ_NMG_0025174

The New York Daily News (4/5, Marzulli, 729K) notes in its story on the summations, "In keeping with the previous four weeks, Cutler offered no alternative theory or alibi to clear his client or suggest reasonable doubt. But there was plenty of name-calling." The New York Post (4/5, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Cutler's colorful closing, under the headline, "Wily 'Mob Cop' Defense."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Stolen Rembrandt. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5, Shinkle, 310K) reports, "A man who admitted posing as a Saudi sheik as part of a scheme to sell a fake Rembrandt painting for $2.8 million, was sentenced Tuesday" to five months in prison and five months home confinement. Majed A. Ihmoud of St. Charles "took the fake of Rembrandt's 'Man with the Golden Helmet' to the Adam's Mark Hotel in downtown St. Louis on Aug. 12, 2004, expecting to sell it to a buyer for $2.8 million, the FBI said." FBI Art Crime Team senior investigator Robert Wittman noted, "He said he had a Rembrandt for sale that had come out of the Middle East," but "the buyer, who provided a check for $2.8 million at the meeting in the Adam's Mark, was an undercover FBI agent."

More Charges Possible In Hollywood Private Eye Scandal. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 9, 2:10, Bowen) reported on the scandal surrounding Hollywood private investigator Tony Pellicano. Director John McTiernan "of 'Die Hard' fame" is "the 14th person to face Federal charges for lying about his connection to the man at the center, tough-talking Tony Pellicano, self-styled private investigator and problem fixer to the stars." Prosecutors "say he used illegal wiretaps to get information for other clients in legal disputes." George Cardona, acting US Attorney: "This is not, we don't think, how most private investigators do their job." Bowen: "Several Hollywood heavyweights have been called in to talk – celebrity lawyer Bert Fields, former super agent Michael Ovitz, and Paramount Chief Brad Grey – but the speculation and questions continue."

Pellicano Probe Focuses On Links To Director. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Eller, Krikorian, Christensen) reports, "About noon on Feb. 24, two FBI agents visited veteran producer Charles Roven in his Sunset Boulevard office after calling to tell him that he was allegedly a victim of Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano. … The agents brought a tape recording that would startle Roven, according to sources close to the investigation. Director John McTiernan, whom Roven worked with on the 2002 box office flop 'Rollerball,' was allegedly on the tape with Pellicano, discussing the details of Roven's wiretapped conversations." The Times continues, " Pellicano allegedly briefed McTiernan on Roven's conversations regarding "Rollerball," the sources said, as well as Roven's personal calls. … Authorities charged McTiernan on Monday with lying about having hired Pellicano. A day later, the full extent of McTiernan's reliance on the indicted detective was beginning to come into focus." The Times adds, "McTiernan's association with Pellicano began years ago, long before the alleged Roven wiretap, when the director allegedly hired the private eye in 1998 as part of his highly publicized divorce. But it did not end there. Pellicano also allegedly intimidated a witness in a manslaughter case involving the son of McTiernan's ex-wife, Donna Dubrow. … In an interview Tuesday, Dubrow said she has seen financial records indicating that her ex-husband paid Pellicano in the neighborhood of $100,000 during their protracted divorce. The payments began at least as far back as June 1998, she said, adding that she did not know what services they were for."

Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer Waives Extradition, Returns To US. The Albuquerque Tribune (4/5, Shepard) reports "Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in connection with two Albuquerque-area homicides, waived his extradition hearing in an El Paso, Texas courtroom" yesterday afternoon. "Astorga, who spent a day on the FBI's top 10 'Most Wanted' list over the weekend, was captured Monday in Mexico. He's wanted in the March 22 killing of Bernalillo County sheriff's Deputy James McGrane Jr." KTSM-TV El Paso (4/4) adds, "Officials say Astorga is a flight risk and will be heavily guarded in all of his transfers. 'There will be a great deal of protection and security, especially because he killed a law enforcement officer. It shows that he doesn't have much regard for those with guns or law enforcement. So he'll be well guarded,' says Andrea Simmons, FBI."

DOJ_NMG_0025175

The AP (4/5) notes, "Police in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, handed" Astorga "to the FBI and Bernalillo County authorities in El Paso, Texas, early Tuesday morning. By Tuesday evening, Astorga - wearing shackles and handcuffs - was escorted into the Metropolitan Detention Center in Albuquerque." KOB-TV Albuquerque (4/4, Upton) also reports on Astorga's transfer.

Tenet Case Judge Declares Second Mistrial. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Rundle) reports, "A federal judge in San Diego declared a mistrial in an 11-month criminal case against a unit of Tenet Healthcare Corp., its Alvarado Hospital Medical Center and its former chief executive officer. It was the second mistrial declared by the same judge on nearly the same charges against the defendants." The Journal continues, "The Tenet unit, the hospital and its former CEO, Barry Weinbaum, were accused by U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam of violating the federal antikickback statute by paying bribes to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital. The alleged conspiracy involved the illegal use of relocation packages to recruit physicians to Alvarado's service area. … 'Like the two juries that have deadlocked in February 2005 and now April 2006, Tenet and the prosecutors disagree over whether anyone at Alvarado Hospital Medical Center intended to break the law when they recruited physicians to the fast-growing eastern part of San Diego County,' Peter Urbanowicz, Tenet's general counsel, said in a statement." The Journal adds, "The case is important to Tenet, which has been negotiating a settlement with the Justice Department to resolve a multitude of allegations of misconduct. Some investors yesterday said the mistrial could clear the way for a final settlement, assuming that the government doesn't pursue a third trial. Tenet, based in Dallas, is the nation's second-largest hospital company."

Chicago Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Ongoing Probe. The Chicago Tribune (4/5, 643K) reports independent truck driver Carl Edwards "pleaded guilty Tuesday to bribing two Chicago city foremen to obtain at least $45,000 in city-owned asphalt for private paving projects." Edwards "said in a plea agreement that he paid bribes to Patrick Stillo and Robert Laino from April 2002 to November 2004. … In exchange for Edwards' guilty plea and cooperation, prosecutors agreed to recommend a 9-month prison sentence." The Tribune notes, "Edwards is the 35th defendant convicted in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program."

Former Nevada Commissioner's Friend Testifies About Alleged Bribes. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/4) reports that at the corruption trial of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera yesterday, "It was a potentially damaging day…as one of his former best friends testifies Herrera often bragged about his relationship with strip club owner Mike Galardi." Terry Lamuraglia "told the jury he and Herrera could get comped drinks and lap dances at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club anytime. … Lamuraglia believes every time he and Herrera visited Cheetahs, he received sexual favors from dancers there. Further damaging Herrera's case, Lamuraglia testified Herrera bragged about 'getting a free trip, getting free golf, getting entertainers, getting things paid for' by Galardi."

Alleged Philadelphia Ticket-Fixer Requests Jury Trial. The Philadelphia Daily Mail (4/5, Hinkelman) reports Molden David Faison, "a former city hearing officer accused of fixing parking tickets for $200 in cash and Prince concert tickets worth $169," said yesterday that he wants a jury trial "after U.S. District Judge Norma L. Shapiro refused to accept his guilty plea. On Monday, the judge had expressed 'doubts' that the government's charge of Hobbs Act extortion against Faison could be proven at trial. … Yesterday, after reviewing case law on the subject, Shapiro said an FBI sting would meet the test if Faison had known or had been informed that he was accepting concert tickets from a company involved in interstate commerce."

FBI, Postal Inspectors Arrest Three For Alleged Credit-Counseling Fraud. Newsday (4/5, Kessler) reports, "In a federal crackdown on allegedly crooked operators of consumer credit-counseling businesses, three managers of a former service in Huntington were charged yesterday with defrauding 17,000 customers around the country out of $24million, according to court papers and officials." Former Debticated Consumer Counseling managers Bradley Dorman, Louis Mustachio and Daniel Ruggerio were "arrested by FBI agents and inspectors from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service." Newsday notes, "Dorman, Mustachio and Ruggerio pleaded not guilty at arraignment before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert, who released them on $50,000 bail."

DOJ_NMG_0025176

New York Investor Found Murdered In Greenwich Mansion. NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 10, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Police in Greenwich, Connecticut, a wealthy suburb north of New York City, say tonight they do not know who stabbed and murdered a 46-year-old millionaire, a man who was in some pretty big legal trouble." NBC (Taibbi) added New York investor Andrew Kissel "was found dead Monday morning in the basement of a rented Connecticut mansion," and "the allure of quick money for him, millions he was about to officially admit belonged to others, had dozens of creditors and investigators in hot pursuit." He is "the second Kissel to die a violent and untimely death. His brother Robert, a Hong Kong banker, bludgeoned to death four years ago by his former waitress wife Nancy after she'd drugged him with a sedative-laced milkshake."

Report Finds Fatal Abuse Of Children Increased In 2004. The Washington Times (4/5, Wetzstein) reports, "The number of fatally abused children rose slightly in 2004 from the previous year as the overall number of abused and neglected children dropped, a new report says." The Times continues, "Officials from the Department of Health and Human Services said that one reason for the increase in fatalities is improved reporting by states, but that the drop in abuse was encouraging. … 'Nevertheless, we cannot tolerate the abuse of even one child,' said Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families." The Times adds, "The number of fatally abused children rose 2 percent from 1,460 in 2003 to 1,490 in 2004, according to the 'Child Maltreatment 2004' report. Overall neglect and abuse dropped 4 percent from 872,000 in 2003 to 838,000. … More than 80 percent of the children who died of abuse or neglect were 3 or younger. Among infant boys, the fatality rate was 18 deaths per 100,000 boys. Among infant girls, the fatality rate was 17 deaths per 100,000 girls. … More than three-quarters of the children were killed by one or more parents, and almost a third were killed by their mothers acting alone."

Female Homicide Detectives In Maryland Profiled. The Washington Post (4/5, B1, Klein) profiles Kelly Rogers and Meredith Binley, the only two female homicide detectives in the Prince George's County Police Department. The Post reports, "Cpls. Rogers and Bingley are the only female homicide detectives in the county. There have been just six before them in the 75-year history of the department. … The small number of women is typical of area homicide units -- three of 15 homicide detectives in Montgomery County and one of 10 in Fairfax County are women." The Post adds, "The Prince George's detectives work in the most violent of Washington's suburbs, where last year there were 173 homicides, an average of one slaying about every other day. … Although the gender barrier may have crumbled in many respects, the world of guns and violence is still fueled by testosterone. Of the department's 1,348 officers, about 17 percent are women."

CIVIL LAW:

GAO Report Finds Agencies Lax In Protecting Privacy Rights. The Washington Post (4/5, A9, O'Harrow) reports, "Government agencies that use private information services for law enforcement, counterterrorism and other investigations often do not follow federal rules to protect Americans' privacy, according to a report yesterday by the Government Accountability Office." The Post continues, "The Justice Department, the Department of Homeland Security and two other agencies examined by the GAO spent about $30 million last year on companies that maintain billions of electronic files about adults' current and past addresses, family members and associates, buying habits, personal finances, listed and unlisted phone numbers, and much more. … But those agencies often do not limit the collection and use of information about law-abiding citizens, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974 and other laws. The agencies also don't ensure the accuracy of the information they are buying, according to the GAO report. That's in part because of a lack of clear guidance from the agencies and the Office of Management and Budget on guidelines known as 'fair information practices,' the report said." The Post adds, "At the same time, the contractors are not bound by those "fair information practices," and they often don't comply with all of them, the report said. Companies do not notify individuals when information is collected, for instance. They limit individuals' access to records about themselves, and they generally do not have provisions for correcting mistakes, the report said. … The 83-page report, the subject of a congressional hearing yesterday, was spurred in part by massive security breaches reported last year by ChoicePoint Inc. and LexisNexis in which sensitive files involving almost 200,000 people were sold to fraud artists."

DOJ_NMG_0025177

FDA Accuses Anthrax Vaccine Maker Of Exaggerated Claims. The Washington Post (4/5, Gillis, 744K) reports that the FDA has accused VaxGen of "making exaggerated claims about the purity and effectiveness of a new vaccine for anthrax." The Post reports that VaxGen has "acknowledged that it is at least a year behind in producing the anthrax vaccine."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Probe Baton Rouge Police Shooting Death. The AP (4/5) reports, "A federal investigation has been opened into the shooting death of a businessman, who was killed by a bystander during a scuffle with a Baton Rouge police officer." The AP continues, "The Justice Department has ordered the FBI to investigate, department spokesman Eric Holland said Monday. He would not speculate on how long the investigation would take." The AP adds, "George Temple II was killed Feb. 17 during a scuffle with a police officer that began when he was pulled over for cutting into a funeral procession. During the fight with Officer Brian Harrison, Temple was shot five times. … Authorities said one of the shots came from the officer's gun. The other four came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities say came to help the officer during the struggle. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head and killed him, according to an autopsy. … Police said Temple offered a bribe to the police office and a struggle began when the officer attempted to arrest Temple."

Tennessee Police Sergeants To Face Trial Again On Civil Rights Charges. The Knoxville News (4/5, Stambaugh) reports, "Two Newport police sergeants accused of shaking down a pair of Hispanic men during a 2005 traffic stop will face trial a second time today on federal civil-rights charges." Sgts. James W. Roach Jr. and Patrick Sheldon "were arrested last year by the FBI after they were swept up in a five-year probe into public corruption in Cocke County dubbed 'Rose Thorn.' They were acquitted of felony civil-rights conspiracy charges in February, but jurors couldn't reach a verdict on misdemeanor charges of depriving the alleged victims of their civil rights." The News notes, "Through motions filed by his attorneys, Sheldon has maintained that he has been pressured by the FBI to implicate Roach and was told he would be 'prosecuted to the fullest extent of the federal government's resources' if he refused to cooperate."

Report Critical Of BOP Response To Inmates' Chemical Concerns. The New York Times (4/5, Zernike) reports, "The federal Bureau of Prisons failed to address concerns that inmates and staff members at several prisons were exposed to toxic chemicals in recycling programs where inmates use hammers to smash discarded computers, according to the agency that handles whistle-blower complaints." The Times continues, "In a letter to President Bush and Congress on Monday, the agency, the Office of Special Counsel, called for an independent investigation into the complaints, which were brought to the federal government by a whistle-blower from a California prison in 2004. … The office criticized the Bureau of Prisons for not investigating the accusations thoroughly, saying the agency's review was deficient and 'appears to be cursory at best.'" The Times adds, "The inmates dismantled the computers as part of the federal prison industries program, or Unicor, which has become one of the nation's largest recyclers, providing low-cost recycling to government agencies, schools and private companies. … The whistle-blower, Leroy A. Smith Jr., the former safety manager at Atwater Federal Prison outside Merced, Calif., said factory workers in the recycling facility there and at four other federal prisons in the country were exposed to hazardous materials including lead, cadmium, barium and beryllium when the inmates took hammers to cathode ray tubes from computers. … The Justice Department referred the complaints to the Bureau of Prisons, which produced two reports responding to Mr. Smith's complaints in June and August 2005, concluding that the bureau, the federal prison industries program and prison staff members 'took appropriate steps' to make sure the programs were operating safely."

9th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In Gay Marriage Case. The AP (4/5, Kravets) reports, "A lawyer for a gay couple suing for the right to wed told a federal appeals court Tuesday that it's unconstitutional to prevent same-sex marriage, but one judge appeared unmoved and two others said the case could die on procedural grounds. … 'Everything that is wrong is not discrimination,' said Judge Jerome Farris, part of a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that heard 40 minutes of arguments." The AP continues, "The case was brought by two gay men who sued after being denied a marriage license in Orange County. They claim California's ban on same-sex marriage and federal laws against it are unconstitutional because gays and lesbians are treated differently than heterosexuals. … U.S. District Judge Gary Taylor last year ruled against the pair Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer, both 46, of Mission Viejo. They appealed. … Taylor ruled the law 'has a disproportionate effect on homosexual individuals,' but said the government's desire to promote procreation is a valid reason for infringing on the rights of gays. … Farris agreed with that assertion. … 'I think marriage is a bundle of sticks and sticks include procreation,' Farris said." The AP notes, "Richard Gilbert, the gay couple's attorney, said procreation is not the important element of marriage and Judge Sidney Thomas appeared to agree. … 'I don't understand, really, the procreation argument,' Thomas said. … After the hearing, Hammer said he would prevail all the way to the Supreme Court 'if they acknowledge that we are human.' … Still, the heavyweights of the same-sex marriage movement aren't supporting the case and instead are waging their campaigns in the state courts of California, Iowa, Washington, New Jersey, New York and elsewhere, seeking rulings similar to the 2003 decision that led to legal gay marriage in Massachusetts."

DOJ_NMG_0025178

Feingold Backs Gay Marriage. Sen. Russ Feingold, who is seen as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, said yesterday he supports the right of gays and lesbians to marry. The AP (4/5) reports that Feingold's ,comments position him "to the left of possible 2008 rivals. … Feingold said he decided to express his support for gay marriage in response to a Wisconsin constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and civil unions, which will appear on the state ballot in November."

The Washington Post (4/5, A9, Balz, 744K) reports that Feingold called the Wisconsin amendment "'a mean-spirited attempt' to single out gay men and lesbians for discrimination and said he would vote against it." Feingold "said he is prepared to work with supporters of same-sex marriage to ensure that it is legal in the future."

Texas Couple Wins Judgment Against Housing Authority. The San Antonio Business Journal (4/5) reports, "U.S. Judge John Primomo ordered the Housing Authority of San Antonio, the San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., Pat Matherly and the Pilgrim Allena Housing Development Corp. to pay $125,000 to resolve a tenant disability discrimination case." The Journal continues, "On June 2, 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a complaint on behalf of local residents Antonio and Josefina Maldonado in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas alleging that the Westminster Square Apartments unlawfully discriminated against the couple because of their disabilities." The Journal adds, "According to the complaint, Pilgrim Allena Housing owns the local apartment complex where the Maldonados have lived since 1989. The San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., a subsidiary of the local Housing Authority, manages the apartments. Matherly was the on-site manager at the property at the time. … Antonio Maldonado is a double-leg amputee and Josefina Maldonado has osteoporosis, hyperlipidemia, angina, diffuse arthritis and diabetes. Over the years, Josefina Maldonado increasingly had been experiencing difficulty maneuvering her husband in his wheelchair from their third-floor apartment to the ground floor via elevator. … Last week, lawyers from the Justice Department and the Housing Authority reached a settlement. With the judge's signature in hand, the Maldonados will receive the $125,000, with part of that settlement going to the Fair Housing Council of Greater San Antonio for their help in the suit."

Alabama Legislature Nears Approval Of Bill To Delay Runoff Elections. The AP (4/5) reports, "The Alabama Legislature moved a step closer Tuesday to approving legislation to delay the June 27 primary runoff elections to July 18 to give military personnel overseas more time to vote." The AP continues, "The House Constitution and Elections Committee approved a Senate-passed bill to delay the party primary runoffs on a unanimous voice vote. The bill is expected to come up in the House Wednesday or Thursday, when it could receive final passage." The AP adds, "Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley asked the Legislature to delay the runoffs in response to a lawsuit filed against the state by the U.S. Justice Department. … The lawsuit claims there is not enough time between the June 6 primaries and the June 27 runoffs for service members, particularly those fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, to receive and cast ballots." The AP notes, "The House originally passed a bill that would have kept the runoffs on June 27, but allowed service members to vote by a special ballot that would have been sent to them at the same time as the primary ballot. … King has said he doubts the Justice Department would go along with the special ballot, partly because it would not allow soldiers who did not vote in the primary to vote in the runoffs."

DOJ_NMG_0025179

WPost Says Early Voting Bill Taints Maryland Elections. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) says Democrats in the Maryland legislature "have sacrificed fairness to partisan advantage," by pushing through "a bill allowing voting to take place for five days before Election Day -- but mostly at polling stations in Democratic strongholds. This isn't the first time a majority in a state legislature has sought electoral advantage by ramming a brazenly partisan measure down the throat of the minority party. … But no matter which party is behind such partisan mischief, the effect is the same: to subvert the faith that Americans place in the electoral system's fairness." The Post adds that "tilting the early-voting system toward heavily Democratic areas in strategically key jurisdictions taints the election even before it occurs. With such arrogance and abuse, the Democrats will only erode their majority in Maryland."

ANTITRUST:

Analyst Sees Potential Problems For AT&T-BellSouth Merger. In an analysis piece for CNET News (4/5), attorney Mark Del Bianco writes, "The conventional wisdom in Washington is that regulatory approval of the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is a done deal. The consensus is that this deal will sail through with flying colors--and a few not very onerous merger conditions. … The conventional wisdom may be wrong. There is a twist that ought to give the regulators pause. Both BellSouth and AT&T own considerable chunks of prime wireless spectrum that is unused and that could quickly and relatively cheaply be used to provide broadband services that would compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services--in other words, the long-sought "third pipe" to the home or business." Del Bianco continues, "Competitors will no doubt argue that the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department should worry about the loss of intermodal competition that will result if the two companies are permitted to retain this valuable spectrum. … The proposed merger will concentrate huge blocks of spectrum in one company with every incentive not to use it." Del Bianco adds, "Provided (the DOJ Antitrust Division) found that the spectrum controlled by the postmerger company represents a source of substantial potential competition, it would be fairly straightforward for it to conclude that without divestiture of the spectrum, the effect of the merger "may be to substantially lessen competition"--the standard it must follow in reviewing mergers under the Clayton Act. … Whether the FCC or the Antitrust Division in this administration will take competition-preserving action is an open question. But for those who seek competition in U.S. broadband markets, and for proponents of network neutrality for whom a third pipe could be a godsend, it certainly looks like a fight worth fighting."

EU Urges Governments To Open Gas Markets. The AP (4/5) reports, "European Union regulators on Tuesday started legal proceedings against 17 countries for not doing enough to open up their energy markets, just weeks after the EU criticized France and Spain for trying to protect their national energy companies." The AP continues, "Delays in drafting new rules to liberalize gas and electricity markets are keeping prices too high, the European Commission has said. … Austria, Belgium, Britain, the Czech Republic, Germany, Estonia, Spain, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Sweden and Slovakia will be sent a warning to put rules in place." The AP adds, "The Commission sent the 17 countries a letter of formal complaint. The member states concerned have two months to reply to the Commission. The final stage of the proceedings would mean taking countries to the European Court of Justice. … The Commission also said it would take Spain and Luxembourg to court for not sending it information to show they had put the legal framework in place. A court ruling can force a country to change national laws under threat of heavy fines. The Commission is still examining Portugal's and Hungary's laws. … It criticized the lack of free choice of supplier for many customers and the continued existence of regulated prices, saying that made it harder for new companies to break into the energy sector. Certain long-standing electricity and gas contracts still get preferential access, the Commission said. … It also criticized the way some energy companies do business -- without naming names -- saying there was often not enough separation between electricity and gas transmission and distribution to make sure each was independent. Many companies own the network and sell directly to customers, meaning they are wholesalers selling network access to the rivals they compete with on the retail market."

DOJ_NMG_0025180

Fed Clears Citigroup For Future Large Acquisitions. The Financial Times (4/5, Wighton) reports, "One of the clouds hanging over Citigroup was lifted on Tuesday when the world's largest financial services company revealed that the Federal Reserve had removed the ban on it making large acquisitions." The Times continues, "The New York Fed, Citigroup's lead regulator, said in a letter to the company that it had dropped the ban because of the "significant progress" it had made in improving its internal controls. … The Fed imposed the restriction a year ago following Citigroup's string of regulatory problems, including the forced closure of its private bank in Japan and the furore in Europe over controversial government bond trades." The Times adds, "Mr Prince said the move reflected the 'cumulative effect' of moves taken over the last year, including his introduction of a "five-point plan" to improve Citigroup's compliance culture. … Although the Fed ban was a blow to Citigroup's reputation, Mr Prince said the company had not been significantly hampered by the restriction, which applied only to very large transactions. … Mr Prince has shifted Citigroup's focus onto organic growth, following the deal-making of his predecessor, Sandy Weill. Moreover, most large potential targets look expensive, particularly given Citigroup's own depressed stock price."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Riley) reports, "The Fed's letter came just days after securities regulators in Australia accused Citigroup of insider trading. Citigroup has denied any wrongdoing and says it will 'vigorously defend' its actions. While Citigroup executives and a team of in-house regulators from the Fed stay in regular contact, it is unclear whether the Fed considered the merits of the lawsuit filed by the Australian regulators before lifting the ban on acquisitions."

Arcelor Blocks Mittal Takeover By Transferring Dofasco Unit. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Singer, Fleming) reports, "Arcelor SA transferred its lucrative Canadian operations to a Dutch foundation in an effort to block a €20.4 billion ($24.8 billion) hostile offer by rival steelmaker Mittal Steel Co., a move that drew rebukes from Arcelor shareholders and corporate-governance activists." The Journal continues, "Arcelor also raised its dividend by 54% to €1.85 a share and said it will make a special payment to shareholders of $5 billion after Mittal drops its bid or the takeover attempt fails. The two payouts are meant to make siding with Arcelor financially equivalent to accepting Mittal's bid, boiling the choice down to which management team investors prefer." The Journal adds, "Mittal vowed to press on with its bid, which has sparked debate over national pride, cultural compatibility and economic openness across Europe and in other parts of the world. But Mittal, based in Rotterdam, the Netherlands, said it would reduce the cash portion of its cash-and-stock bid because it considers the increased dividend an advance, though it hasn't yet disclosed details."

Blockbuster Sued By Netflix For Web Expansion. The Wall Street Journal/AP (4/5) reports, "Online DVD rental service Netflix Inc. on Tuesday accused Blockbuster Inc. of illegally copying its ideas in a patent infringement lawsuit challenging the video store chain's recent Internet expansion." The AP continues, "The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, focuses largely on the online wish lists that prioritize the DVD desires of about 5.4 million people who subscribe to either Netflix or Blockbuster's Internet service. … Netflix also believes its patents cover perhaps its most popular feature -- the option of renting a DVD for an unlimited time without incurring late fees." The AP adds, "That change, introduced by Netflix seven years ago, became so popular that Blockbuster last year stopped charging late fees for tardy rental returns to its video stores. Dallas-based Blockbuster once pocketed hundreds of millions of dollars annually from those late fees. … Both Netflix and Blockbuster's online service charge $17.99 per month to rent up to three DVDs at a time. When subscribers return a DVD in a postage-paid envelope, the rental services automatically send the next available movie on their wish lists."

EU Raids Color Line Ferry Company Headquarters. The AP2 (4/5) reports, "European competition authorities on Tuesday raided the headquarters of Norway's Color Line AS ferry company as part of an antitrust investigation." The AP continues, "The surprise inspection was to check for possible competition violations by the Norwegian ferry operator, the EFTA Surveillance Authority, or ESA, said in a statement. … 'Surprise inspections are a preliminary step in antitrust investigations. The fact that the EFTA Surveillance Authority carries out an inspection does not mean that the company is guilty of anticompetitive behavior,' the ESA said." The AP adds, "ESA is the enforcement arm of the European Free Trade Association, or EFTA. Through treaties with the European Union, EFTA members Norway, Iceland and Liechtenstein have open markets with the 25-nation European bloc even though they are not members. … Color Line spokesman Helge Otto Mathisen said the company was cooperating fully with the ESA inspectors, who were assisted by the Norwegian Competition Authority."

DOJ_NMG_0025181

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Controversial EPA Air-Quality Draft May Color Wehrum Confirmation Hearing. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Clayton, 61K) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency has drafted a plan that would allow so much extra industrial air pollution that 7 of 10 of the agency's own regional air-quality directors have signed on to a memo condemning it. While disagreement on policy issues is not unusual, former EPA officials say the regional directors used particularly strong language in criticizing the plan developed on William Wehrum's watch in a December memo, which surfaced Monday. The stinging internal criticism is likely to pop up Wednesday at Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Wehrum, who is nominated to become the nation's top air-quality officer." Eric Schaeffer, director of the Environmental Integrity Project in New York and a former chief of the EPA's office of regulatory enforcement, is quoted as saying, "Wehrum is the architect of a lot of changes to the Clean Air Act that have weakened environmental protection. ... This new proposal on toxics pushes past science, law, and fair public process."

Plan To Expand Yucca Mountain Nuclear Dump Draws Fire. In a move designed to encourage development of a controversial nuclear dump site under construction near Las Vegas, the Department of Energy has proposed removing a cap that limits how much waste the facility could handle. USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) reports, "The Bush administration wants to bury tens of thousands of tons more nuclear waste at the Yucca Mountain dump in Nevada than now allowed. ... The Energy Department proposed lifting the 77,000-ton storage limit on the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas and allowing as much waste as the facility can hold." Longtime Yucca Mountain opponent, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, "said the bill was 'not even on life support. It's dead when it gets here.'"

In its coverage, the Wall Street Journal (4/5, Fialka, 2.11M) cites Department of Energy Deputy Director Clay Sell as saying that the changes will help spur the construction of new nuclear power plants, bolster domestic energy supplies and help curtail air pollution. "We need an expansion of nuclear power in this country," he is quoted as saying. The Journal goes on to note, "The enlargement would accommodate one of the administration's longer range plans to remove and reuse parts of the spent fuel, leaving a relatively small percentage of waste for permanent storage. Without the reduction, the department has estimated, it might need at least six more permanent storage sites."

Lawsuit Challenges DOE On West Valley Demonstration Project Cleanup. The Times Herald (4/5, Miller) of Bradford, PA, reports, "The New York State Energy Research and Development Authority has authorized a lawsuit against the US Department of Energy over the nuclear cleanup at the West Valley Demonstration Project." The Herald adds that Authority chairman Vincent Delorio, said that the DOE "has taken a very limited view of its responsibility to clean up nuclear wastes at West Valley," and added, "we have been working for 10 years to convince the Feds to live up to their obligations, but have been unable to reach agreement." Legislation sponsored by a number of New York lawmakers would give the NRC "authority over DOE activities at the site" after the DOE "reduced the funding levels for cleanup activities and staffing levels at the West Valley Demonstration Project to about $70 million this year."

The AP (4/5) reports, "Talks between New York and the US Department of Energy stalled during the Clinton administration. Now, with the DOE cutting staff and funding at the site, state energy officials worry the federal agency is getting ready to leave." The AP adds, "From 1966 to 1972, spent nuclear fuel from commercial nuclear power plants and DOE sites was chopped and dissolved, and its uranium and plutonium were extracted."

DOJ_NMG_0025182

AK Steel Settles Toxin Contamination Claims With US, Ohio. The Middletown (OH) Journal (4/5) reports, "AK Steel Corp. will launch a nearly $13 million effort to clean up two streams contaminated with 'significant' toxins as part of an agreement reached with federal and Ohio environmental protection agencies to settle a six-year-old lawsuit, the company and government officials announced Monday." The Journal continues, "The settlement — filed in the U.S. District Court for Southern District in Cincinnati Monday morning — addresses claims that AK Steel violated the federal Clean Water, Clean Air and Resource Conservation and Recovery acts, as well as, Ohio environmental regulations in and surrounding its 2,700-acre Middletown Works." The Journal adds, "The 103-page federal consent degree ends decades of contamination from Middletown Works, according to Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant Attorney General for the U.S. Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division. … 'By removing contamination from the areas currently known to contain significant polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB) concentration, AK Steel will immediately begin cleanup work to protect the environment and reduce the potential for human exposure to PCBs,' Wooldridge said. … As part of the agreement, AK Steel will pay $460,000 in civil penalties to be split equally between the state of Ohio and U.S. governments. AK Steel also will spend an additional $750,000 on an "environmentally beneficial project that will remove ozone-depleting refrigerants from certain equipment at the plant.""

Former Tribal Casino Workers Seek Venue For Sexual Harassment Lawsuits. Several former casino workers are seeking a venue to sue their one-time employers for sexual harassment, but may be turned away from state and Federal courts because they worked for native American casinos. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 9, 2:20, Tapper) reported, "Seven female former employees of the Thunder Valley Casino are suing their former employer in California state court." The case "against Thunder Valley Casino alleges sexual harassment, age and gender discrimination, and many other charges. But it's unclear a state or Federal court even has the jurisdiction to hear the case. That's because Thunder Valley Casino is on sovereign native American land. Attorney Howard Dickstein represents the United Auburn Indian Tribe." Dickstein: "The one thing the tribe will not do is simply subject itself to the jurisdiction of the state."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Police Officers, Others Accused In $10 Million Cocaine-Smuggling Plot. There was wide media coverage concerning several suspects linked to the shipment of millions of dollars of cocaine, with more than 100 references to the story. For example, The Washington Times (4/5, Seper) reports the DEA "said seven drug-smuggling suspects, including five Colombian police officers and an airline employee, have been arrested in Bogota in connection with the shipment of more than $10 million in cocaine to the United States. An indictment handed up in the case and unsealed yesterday accused the seven of smuggling the cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota for importation into the United States, said DEA Special Agent-in-Charge John P. Gilbride. … DEA spokesman Rusty Payne in Washington said the arrests were part of Operation Caso Dorado, a joint undercover investigation by DEA agents in New York and Bogota, the U.S. attorney's office in New York, agents from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities."

The AP (4/5) reports the arrests "were based on a U.S. indictment in New York that alleges the Norte del Valle cartel recruited the airline worker and police involved with security at El Dorado Airport. It alleges the ring shipped the cocaine in October through Avianca's cargo facility after an airline employee approved false paperwork. The drugs were allegedly destined for the United States via Mexico." ABC News, CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, New York Newsday, Houston Chronicle, Seattle Post Intelligencer, and the UK's Guardian published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story.

CNN (4/4) reports on its Web site that eight people have been charged and adds, "The indictment in the case alleges that between August and December of last year members of a Colombian cartel recruited police officials responsible for airport security and airline employees to allow drugs to be smuggled from Colombia to Mexico and, ultimately, the United States."

On its Web site, WNYC, New York Public Radio (4/4) reports Boyd Johnson of the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan "says the smugglers used Avianca jets, which fly to New York daily."

DOJ_NMG_0025183

DEA Investigates California Humane Society. KGTV-TV, San Diego (4/4) reports on its Web site that one of the county's oldest animal organizations "is under investigation. The Federal Drug Enforcement Agency is investigating Oceanside's North County Humane Society. … A spokesperson for the DEA confirms agents conducted an investigation at the North County Humane Society regarding its handling of controlled substances. The DEA will not say what agents found, if anything."

The North County Times (4/5) reports, "Officials with the North County Humane Society on Tuesday confirmed both the resignation of Executive Director Stacy Steel and an inquiry of the humane society by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Reporting Continues On Harden Case. The Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch (4/5) continues to report on a case in which Richmond-based DEA agent William Carter Harden "pleaded guilty March 28 in U.S. District Court to the crime of lying to a federal officer." The Times Dispatch now reports that a woman connected to the case claims she had sex with Harden in an attempt to avoid a prison term.

Marijuana Dispensary Moratorium Extended By California Council. The San Luis Obispo Tribune (4/4, Van Beurden-Doust) reports Grover Beach "has extended its moratorium on medical marijuana dispensaries and has taken steps to make the ban permanent. The council voted 5-0 Monday to extend the 180-day moratorium that would have expired April 19. … The council voted 4-1 to make the ban permanent. The soonest it could become effective is 30 days after a second vote on April 20."

California City Council Considers Yearlong Moratorium. The AP (4/4) reports from Buellton that the City Council "will decide this month on a yearlong moratorium on new medical marijuana dispensaries. During that year, City Manager Steve Thompson said, city officials would decide whether a permanent ban is needed. The city recently enacted a 45-day moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries."

Major New York State Drug Ring Smashed. The Utica (NY) Observer-Dispatch (4/5) reports, "Local, state and federal law enforcement have charged 13 people as the result of an investigation into a major cocaine and crack cocaine distribution ring that officials claim trafficked drugs throughout the Mohawk Valley." The Observer-Dispatch adds, "In a news release, U.S. Attorney Glenn T. Suddaby said today police recovered several ounces of cocaine and crack cocaine, as well as three pistols and ammunition, more than $80,000 in cash, drug paraphernalia, a large quantity of gang photos and eight cellular phones. … The 13 people arrested were each charged with conspiracy to possess cocaine and crack cocaine with intent to distribute, Suddaby said:" The Observer-Dispatch notes, "The investigation included officers from the Oneida County Drug Task Force, which encompasses the Utica, Rome and New Hartford police departments, as well as the Oneida County Sheriff's Office, state police and the FBI. Assisting in the investigation were the U.S. Marshals Service, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the state Office of Parole."

Selig Defends Handling Of Baseball's Steroid Investigation. The AP (4/5) reports baseball Commissioner Bud Selig "defended his choice of George Mitchell to head baseball's steroid investigation, saying the former Senate Majority Leader has independence. Selig brushed off criticism that Mitchell is too much of an insider for the job -- Mitchell is a director of the Boston Red Sox and chairman of The Walt Disney Co., a national broadcaster of baseball and the network airing Barry Bonds' new reality show. … The investigation is already under way and has no time limit." The AP reports Selig said Mitchell has "complete autonomy" in the investigation.

Bonds TV Show Debuts On ESPN2. The AP (4/5) reports, "'Bonds on Bonds' debuted Tuesday night on ESPN2, opening with footage of fans booing, a syringe being thrown at the San Francisco Giants' slugger and announcers discussing the steroid allegations on opening day in San Diego. 'If it makes them happy to go out of their way to destroy me or whatever they want to try to do, go right ahead. It doesn't bother me,' Bonds said. 'You can't hurt me anymore than you've already hurt me. You can't hurt my family anymore than you've already hurt them.'"

Alleged Minnesota Courthouse Bombing Plot Uncovered. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/5, Franklin, Furst) reports, "A plot to blow up the Rice County Courthouse and law enforcement center and perhaps kill several public officials has been uncovered, authorities said Monday." The Tribune continues, "Law enforcement officials said they recovered two propane tanks, the type used with outdoor grills, that appeared to be filled with explosives made of diesel oil and fertilizer -- similar to those used to blow up the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City 11 years ago." The Tribune adds, "Each of the 62-pound devices 'probably could kill everybody here,' Rice County Sheriff Richard Cook said Monday at a news conference. … No timetable for the plot was discovered, Cook said, but 'we believe there was some urgency.'" The Tribune notes, "Allan Weatherford, 44, who lives on a farm near Kenyon, Minn., is being held in lieu of $1 million bail after being charged with seven counts of attempted arson, possession of explosives and being a felon in possession of firearms. … His brother Mark, 34, was jailed last month on an unrelated charge of reckless discharge of a firearm. … The investigation was conducted by the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, FBI, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, State Patrol, Department of Natural Resources, Faribault and Northfield police departments and Bloomington police bomb squad."

DOJ_NMG_0025184

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Under Pressure To Intervene In Stalled Senate Immigration Debate. The AP (4/5, Espo) reports the Senate "skirmished inconclusively over immigration legislation Tuesday, with Republicans deeply divided over provisions relating to millions of illegal immigrants and Democrats maneuvering to avoid politically difficult votes on border security." The Bush Administration "renewed its call for legislation that includes a temporary worker program to go 'hand in hand with efforts to secure the border.'" For "their part, Democrats made a show of support for legislation that emerged from the Judiciary Committee more than a week ago."

However, the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) reports that with the Senate "at an impasse," Bush "faces growing pressure to intercede more aggressively if he is to salvage a landmark immigration bill and move it into negotiations with the House." Sen. Mike DeWine said, "He's got to get more involved. I'm not sure where we're going, if we're going at all." The Journal adds, "Hoping to force the president's hand, Democrats broke custom and jumped ahead of the Republican leadership last night by filing a petition to force a vote tomorrow on cutting off debate." Minority Whip Richard Durbin "predicted Democrats can deliver close to 40 votes themselves." The Journal adds there "were signals from the White House that Mr. Bush may speak out on the issue today."

Roll Call (4/5, Stanton) reports Senate agreement "remained elusive Tuesday," and "GOP lawmakers have all but abandoned the committee's plan to grant guest worker status to all 12 million illegal workers." The New York Times (4/5, Swarns, 1.19M) reports Senate Republicans "who support legislation that would legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants said Tuesday that they lacked enough support to bring the measure to a vote this week and were working on a more limited compromise that would rally a broader cross-section of Republicans." Democrats, "angered by what they viewed as Republican efforts to gut the legislation, responded by using a parliamentary tactic to force lawmakers to decide Thursday whether the bill should be considered for a vote on the Senate floor." Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "warned that the Democratic maneuver might result in the demise of his bill."

CQ (4/4, Sandler, Crowley) reports Minority Leader Reid "brought the immigration debate on the Senate floor to a standstill Tuesday, refusing to allow votes on Republican amendments and instead forcing a procedural one to cut off debate on legislation that would allow illegal immigrants in the country to stay and earn citizenship." Majority Leader Bill Frist "called Reid's actions 'disrespectful.' Specter described them as a 'travesty.' And a red-faced Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., told the chamber Reid 'should not do this, and the Senate should not let him do this.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Reynolds, Gaouette) says that "in essence, Democrats -- who generally favor less restrictive treatment of illegal immigrants than many Republicans do -- sought to take advantage of GOP divisions by forcing a vote on the relatively moderate approach now on the Senate floor before the Republican majority could hammer out an agreement ,:

McCain Says He Lacks Votes To Prevent Filibuster. The AP (4/5, Gamboa) reports supporters "of a guest worker program that would let illegal immigrants stay in the United States said Tuesday they don't have enough Senate votes to overcome objections from conservatives who oppose the measure on grounds it amounts to amnesty." Sen. John McCain said "a majority in the 100-member Senate support his and Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's proposal to provide green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the U.S. for six years." But McCain said he "doesn't have" the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

DOJ_NMG_0025185

McCain's comments sparked local TV coverage. KTVK-TV Phoenix (4/4, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "Senator John McCain says he doesn't have the votes to pass a measure giving green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the US for six years."

KCNC-TV Denver (4/4, 10:13 p.m.) reported, "McCain says lawmakers are working on a compromise that give green cards of those in the U.S. for six years. President Bush urged lawmakers to include the guest worker program."

KSL-TV Salt Lake City (4/4, 6:31 p.m.) reported, "Senator John McCain says there aren't enough votes in Congress to pass a guest worker program that would let immigrants remain. Protesters across the country have demonstrated against tightening the country's immigration laws. President Bush backs a guest worker program with you conservatives say letting illegal immigrants stay amounts to amnesty. They are working to a compromise to give green cards to immigrants who have been in the U.S. at least six years."

McCain, Kyl Split Seen As Emblematic Of GOP Rift On Immigration. The Washington Post (4/5, A5, Babington, 744K) reports the divergent positions taken on immigration by Sen. John McCain and Jon Kyl of Arizona epitomizes "the divisions" in the Senate GOP caucus. Both "face important elections and represent the same 5.8 million people. But they are leading the two main opposing approaches that Republican senators will have to reconcile if Congress is to address border security, illegal worker status, deportation practices and other issues." McCain "is the chief sponsor of legislation that would give millions of illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship if they pay fines and back taxes, learn English, stay employed and do not break laws." Kyl, "facing a potentially strong Democratic challenger this fall in his bid for a third term, is a key proponent of a guest-worker program that would require undocumented workers to return to their countries when their visas expire, a move that critics call unrealistic."

Democrats Prevent Vote On Provision To Bar Felons From Citizenship. The Washington Times (4/5, Hurt, 90K) reports Senate Democrats "refused to allow consideration of an amendment yesterday that would bar illegal aliens convicted of felonies from obtaining U.S. citizenship." Democrats said the "amendment would 'gut' the immigration bill under consideration in the Senate and refused to allow a vote on it."

McCain Booed At Union Speech Over Immigration Bill. The Washington Times/AP (4/5) reports that during remarks to the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department, Sen. John McCain "threatened yesterday to cut short a speech to union leaders who booed his immigration views and challenged his statements on organized labor and the Iraq war." McCain said, "If you like, I will leave." The Times adds McCain "had been outlining his position on the Senate immigration debate, saying tougher border enforcement must be accompanied by guest-worker provisions that give undocumented aliens a legal path toward citizenship. Murmurs from the crowd turned to booing."

Jeb Bush Says Immigration Debate's Tone "Hurtful" To Himself, Wife. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Accusing politicians of 'pounding their chests' on immigration for short-term political gain, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday that the tone of the debate had been 'hurtful' to him and his Mexican-born wife, Columba." Bush "reserved some of his sharpest criticism for conservatives in his own Republican Party, calling it 'just plain wrong" to charge illegal immigrants with a felony, as a provision passed by the Republican-led House would do. He also opposed 'penalizing the children of illegal immigrants' by denying them U.S. citizenship, an idea backed by some conservatives but not included in the legislation." Gov. Bush wrote in an email, "My wife came here legally, but it hurts her just as it hurts me when people give the perception that all immigrants are bad."

Evangelical Christians Split On Immigration Bill. The Washington Post (4/5, A4, Cooperman, 744K) reports more than "50 evangelical Christian leaders and organizations voiced their support yesterday for an immigration bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become U.S. citizens without returning to their native countries." The statement "marks a deepening split among evangelicals over immigration. It was signed by a mixture of Hispanic and white church groups. But most of the nation's large, politically influential evangelical organizations either back rival legislation that focuses on border enforcement and the deportation of illegal immigrants, or have been silent on the issue." Hispanic evangelical leaders said "they have received support from Roman Catholic, Jewish and Muslim groups, but have been bitterly disappointed by the response of most of their fellow evangelicals, both white and black."

Municipalities Taking Contradictory Stands. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Wood, 61K) reports on the

DOJ_NMG_0025186

contradictory stands taken by the California towns of Maywood, "population 45,000 and 96 percent Latino…a self-proclaimed 'sanctuary' for illegal immigrants," and Costa Mesa, "population 110,000 and one-third Latino," which "is examining ways to train some of its police force to help US immigration officials identify illegals."

Immigration Advocates Set Date For 63-City Rally. The Washington Times (4/5, Summers, Seper, 90K) reports, "Immigration advocates yesterday announced plans for a 63-city rally on Monday that they hope will attract at least 2 million supporters to protest pending immigration reform legislation and press lawmakers into granting millions of current illegal aliens a path toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship." The advocates "also called for a nationwide one-day boycott of work, school and shopping May 1 to protest the House and the Senate immigration reform bills."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Kang, Jordan, 2.11M) reports that to "build on a movement that attracted as many as 500,000 protesters in cities like Los Angeles last month, a new round of demonstrations is set for Monday in an attempt to keep pressure on the immigration issue and broaden the base of support." Turnout is "hard to predict given that the events take place on a Monday rather than the previous Saturday protests. But the events could be disruptive to normal business operations in places where Hispanics are a major part of the work force -- everything from the hotel and restaurant industries to construction and agriculture." In a move that could add "to the impact," organizers "now are aggressively reaching out to other ethnic groups that are affected by the immigration debate, including Koreans and Chinese."

Immigration Debate Draws Attention To 1930s Deportation Of Mexicans. USA Today (4/5, 1A, Koch, 2.31M) reports on the "almost-forgotten story of a 1930s anti-immigrant campaign. Tens of thousands — and possibly more than 400,000 — of Mexicans and Mexican-Americans were pressured, through raids and job denials, to leave the USA, according to a USA TODAY review of documents and interviews with historians and deportees. Many, mostly children, were U.S. citizens." On Thursday, Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., "plans to introduce a bill in the U.S. House that calls for a commission to study the 'deportation and coerced emigration' of U.S. citizens and legal residents. The panel would also recommend remedies that could include reparations. 'An apology should be made,' she says."

Enhanced Border Security Likely To Strain Border Patrol. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Bowers, 61K) reports that "up and down the 2,000-mile border, the US government is throwing more manpower and sophisticated technology into slowing illegal entries into the US. But as it does, immigrants are showing greater ingenuity in circumventing the barriers and patrols." As Congress "considers another overhaul of immigration laws, the encounters and clashes along the border are likely to intensify. Most of the bills in Congress include provisions to expand the border patrol (now part of US Customs and Border Protection), which has already seen agent strength along the nation's southern flank more than double since 9/11, to 11,000. The result is an agency that is becoming increasingly complex and unwieldy."

NYTimes Critical Of Martinez-Hagel Compromise Offer. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the McCain-Kennedy immigration bill, "revised and passed last month by the Senate Judiciary Committee" combines "sensibly, tighter borders with a path to citizenship for people here illegally." While it "has enough votes to pass, it may not have enough to avoid a filibuster by hard-core Republicans. For them, anything other than punishment and border enforcement smacks unforgivably of forgiveness." Sens. Mel Martinez and Chuck Hagel "are offering a 'fallback' compromise if the committee bill fails. They would not eliminate the citizenship track, but narrow it severely." But the "Martinez-Hagel compromise is a bad idea. It's tempting to think flawed reform is better than none, but the wiser approach is to stand firm for what Mr. Kennedy has called 'the real enchilada.'"

Guest Worker Concept Criticized. In a USA Today op-ed (4/5), syndicated columnist Ruben Navarrette says, "Politicians keep pushing 'guest worker' programs, even though the concept is built to fail and always does." Navarrette says he is "talking about importing hundreds of thousands of new foreign workers from a country such as Mexico to work in farming, construction, hotels or restaurants. That's what Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has proposed as part of a reform bill that his Judiciary Committee put together and which serves as a starting point for the Senate immigration debate." The US government has "turned to foreign workers before. And given that these programs are often criticized as indentured servitude, it's ironic that the person who kicked off the phenomenon also freed the slaves." Congress "should forget about importing new guest workers, or granting a wholesale amnesty to all 12 million illegal workers already here, and focus on reforms that stand a chance of working."

DOJ_NMG_0025187

Immigration Reform May Lead To "Awakening" For Latino Voters. In a USA Today op-ed (4/5), freelance writer Marisa Treviño says the numbers of protesters at demonstrations opposed to immigration reforms aimed at enhancing enforcement show "an awakening. Political pundits and community activists say the prospect of congressional action on immigration reform has stirred up the Latino community." Though "12 million is a huge number of people, it pales in comparison with the 28 million Latinos in the USA who already have access to public services, health care, car insurance, among other taken-for-granted rights that come with legal status. These are the people who must be stirred to action." Undocumented immigrants "can't vote. They can make a lot of noise; they can't make a difference in a politician's future. But there are at least 15 million eligible Hispanic voters, and they can — if only they'd wield the full force of their votes."

Estimates Of Illegal Immigrants Vary Widely. In his Wall Street Journal column (4/5), Carl Bialik says estimates of the numbers of illegal immigrants "remain fuzzy and full of pitfalls, even as lawmakers toss them around in the latest round of debates over whether to offer guest-worker status to illegal immigrants. At the core of the problem is the fact that undocumented immigrants don't generally come forward to be counted. The most widely quoted estimate of 11 million to 12 million is derived indirectly, using what's called a residual method: Researchers subtract the number of immigrants who were authorized to come to the U.S. from the number of foreign-born residents counted by the Census Bureau, then adjust the number using estimates of immigrants' deaths and migration, and of Census undercounting. Some critics say that estimate understates the degree of undercounting: Another estimate making the rounds holds that there are 20 million illegal immigrants."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post column (4/5, A23), Robert Samuelson says, "The immigration debate has become an exercise in political public relations, often disconnected from practical realities. Republicans and Democrats are trying in different ways to appease middle-class anxieties without alienating present and future Hispanic voters. The one saving grace is that we may still have time to fashion a more sensible consensus." Samuelson calls for strengthening "border and employer enforcement," granting "amnesty to existing illegal immigrants," and forgetting "guest workers."

In his New York Times column (4/5), Thomas Friedman says, "Personally, I favor a very high fence, with a very big gate. So far, neither President Bush's proposal to allow the nation's millions of illegal immigrants to stay temporarily on work visas, nor the most hard-line G.O.P. counterproposal, which focuses only on border security, leaves me satisfied. We need a better blend of the two -- a blend that will keep America the world's greatest magnet for immigrants." Because of "its deeply rooted culture of immigration, the US has a huge advantage in such a world. If we are smart, we can still cream off the most first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world — more than any other country -- and bring that talent to our shores to start companies and work in others."

TAX:

California Anti-Tax Activist Sentenced. The AP (4/5) reports, "Nationally known anti-tax crusader George Henry 'Nick' Jesson will serve 27 months in prison for tax fraud, a judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson on Monday also ordered Jesson, 55, to pay $215,454 in restitution to the federal government. The Fountain Valley resident, who ran for California governor in 2002, was taken into custody after his sentencing." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Brown said she believes the sentence was 'wholly appropriate' and would deter others from considering anti-tax protests." The AP adds, "Jesson pleaded guilty last June to filing a false federal tax form in May 2000. He had stated that his Huntington Beach company, No Time Delay Electronics, paid no wages in 1997 when he actually paid wages of $177,083 that year to himself and $273,236 to his wife. He also admitted to falsely obtaining a business tax refund of $215,454. … Jesson and his wife face trial in state court on six felony counts of failing to pay taxes on $3 million in income from 1997 to 1999. Jesson could get nine more years in prison and his wife a seven-year sentence if they're convicted of all counts."

GAO Finds Widespread Errors By Tax Preparers. A GAO report presented yesterday to the Senate Finance Committee notes persistent problems of tax preparers cheating on clients' returns. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Herman, Matthews, 2.11M) reports the GAO report "detailed undercover visits by government investigators to 19 outlets of several commercial tax-preparation chains, which weren't identified. Staffers posed as taxpayers and asked the firms to prepare -- but not file -- federal returns under two scenarios. In 10 of the 19 cases, preparers failed to report side income that had been supplied by the taxpayer, the GAO report said. Some preparers also missed key tax-saving opportunities, such as neglecting to itemize deductions or failing to claim all available deductions, it said."

DOJ_NMG_0025188

The Washington Post (4/5, D2, Crenshaw, 744K) reports that the errors sometimes amounted "to more than $1,000 in incorrect refunds and overpayments." The GAO study "was small -- only 19 returns, which the GAO cautioned cannot be used to generalize to the entire commercial return-preparation industry -- but on only two returns did the preparer produce what the agency determined was the right amount. And even those two had mistakes, though they did not A affect the final tax amount."

NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 4, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported a "government study out today that documents some of the ways commercial tax preparers are doing their customers a disservice, including making significant mistakes on returns and charging taxpayers more than they should." NBC (Thompson) added, "The problems government investigators found with major tax preparer chains were widespread -- high rates for instant refunds and high fees you might not expect to pay." Sen. Max Baucus, Montana: "Frankly, I was amazed at the degree of incompetence, of unprofessionalism." Thompson: "More than half of the tax preparers the GAO visited urged people to underreport side income, the key, the GAO says, behind those high fees." And "then there are those instant refund loans. The GAO found they're often targeted to low-income taxpayers." While "the tax chains have been sued many times over these additional fees, they are legal."

Richest Americans Said To Be Reaping Windfall From Investment Tax Cuts. As Congress debates whether to make permanent President Bush's tax cuts, the New York Times (4/5, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The first data to document the effect of...cuts for investment income show that they have significantly lowered the tax burden on the richest Americans, reducing taxes on incomes of more than $10 million by an average of about $500,000. An analysis of Internal Revenue Service data by The New York Times found that the benefit of the lower taxes on investments was far more concentrated on the very wealthiest Americans than the benefits of Mr. Bush's two previous tax cuts: on wages and other non-investment income." According to the Times, "When Congress cut investment taxes three years ago, it was clear that the highest-income Americans would gain the most, because they had the most money in investments. But the size of the cuts and what share goes to each income group have not been known."

Wealthiest Families Increase Share Of US Net Worth. New Federal Reserve figures indicate that the share of net worth held by the wealthiest 1% of American families rose slightly between 2001 and 2004. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The top 1% held 33.4% of the nation's net worth in 2004, up from 32.7% in 2001, but still lower than a peak of 34.6% in 1995. Although the increase from 2001 is small, the data suggest that the upper strata, who saw their share of net worth decline between 1998 and 2001 as stock prices crashed, regained some of those losses by 2004."

Economists Worry Real Estate Slowdown Could Hurt Broader Economy. Economists are concerned that the housing slowdown that began late last year will hurt the broader economy more than past downturns because the economy is more dependent on housing now than it has been in n50 years. The Washington Post (4/5, D1, Irwin, 744K) reports, "By almost any measure, the U.S. economy is built on housing more than in the past. In 2005, investment in housing constituted a higher proportion of the goods and services the nation produced than it has since 1950, when the nation was experiencing a massive postwar housing boom. The proportion of jobs in real-estate-related fields is the highest it has been since at least 1970. … Now the companies that have benefited from this expansion are bracing for the great unwinding. The nation appears to be entering a period in which the role of housing in the economy is returning to something more resembling its historical norms."

2000 Fed Transcripts Said To Hold Important Lessons. Newly released transcripts show that Federal Reserve officials were bullish on tech spending through most of 2000 and may have delayed easing monetary policy out of concern for reinflating stock and bond markets. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, lp, 2.11M) reports, "Transcripts of the Fed's deliberations through 2000, released with the customary lag yesterday, offer some lessons for today. Like in 2000, the Fed has been raising interest rates to stave off inflation. In 2000, the economy was being propelled by surging tech spending and high stock prices. Housing plays a similar role today. An important difference is that in part because of the lessons of 2000, the Fed is on the alert for any downdraft in housing."

DOJ_NMG_0025189

Stocks Post Gains. Stocks gained Tuesday as investors were "cheered by the potential" for increased merger activity, the AP (4/5) reports. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 58.91 points to 11,203.85. The Nasdaq gained 8.62 points to 2345.36, its best close since Feb. 16, 2001, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 8.12 points to close at 1305.93.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Comments Fuel Speculation Snow Resignation Imminent. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, fueling speculation that Treasury Secretary John Snow will depart soon, offered only muted support for the former railroad executive when asked whether he is likely to survive an expected staff shake-up. With Mr. Snow sitting next to him at a conference on health savings accounts, Mr. Bush said the Treasury secretary 'has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service.'" But "he said nothing to squash widespread talk that Mr. Snow is likely to be replaced." There has been "widespread speculation for months that Mr. Snow, who succeeded Paul O'Neill in February 2003, will leave before the end of this year." The Journal says "speculation" points to Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council and "a longtime friend of the president," as Snow's replacement. Other "possibilities include US Trade Representative Rob Portman, a former Ohio congressman; and Steve Friedman, a former Goldman Sachs executive."

The New York Times (4/5, Bumiller, 1.19M) headlines its story "Treasury Secretary Is Said To Be Thinking Of Quitting," and reports Snow "has expressed interest in leaving his job in the next several months, a person close to him said Tuesday, as speculation raced through Washington that the White House was seeking Mr. Snow's replacement." Bush "did little to tamp down the talk." The Times adds, "When Mr. Bush has been asked in the past about whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would remain in his job, he has spoken out more forcefully and enthusiastically." The Times says "names circulating in Republican circles as possibilities for the Treasury job include Stanley O'Neal, the chairman and chief executive of Merrill Lynch, and Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs." The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) runs a similar report in its "In the Loop" column.

The AP (4/5, Riechmann) reports Bush "dodged questions Tuesday about whether he would keep…Snow in his Cabinet but said he was eager to hear recommendations for change from his new chief of staff. Some staff changes are expected when Joshua Bolten...moves into the West Wing." Bush is quoted as saying, "I told Josh that he is -- will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs. ... And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people." The AP goes on to report, "Republicans close to the White House say they expect changes in Bush's communications, congressional relations and domestic policy shops." Headed by Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, "the political team...is believed to be immune to change." Rumors about Snow's departure "created an awkward moment for Bush in the Roosevelt Room, where Bush discussed his initiative for health savings accounts. When a reporter asked Bush whether Snow was expected to remain in the Cabinet, the president noted that Snow was in the room. ... But he did not say whether Snow would stay."

Justice Kennedy Decries Congressional Effort To Force High Court Cameras. The Legal Times (4/5, Mauro) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy pushed back strongly Tuesday against a bill pending in the Senate that would require the Court to televise its proceedings. … 'Mandating direct televised proceedings would be inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches,' Kennedy said in response to questions from House members at the Court's annual budget hearing Tuesday. 'We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts.'" The Times continues, "Kennedy also spoke out forcefully in favor of a pay raise for federal judges, warning that the failure by Congress to pass salary increases is 'assuming the proportions of an historic wrong.'" The Times adds, "Every spring, justices go before a House Appropriations subcommittee seeking approval for the Court's annual budget, which next year will total $76.4 million if passed. It is a rare and often illuminating encounter between branches, with House members asking pointed questions that put justices on the spot about a range of issues. … There was some of that on Tuesday, but to an unusual degree the hearing became a platform for Kennedy and Justice Clarence Thomas to vent about actions or inactions by Congress on matters of deep interest to the high court."

DOJ_NMG_0025190

The New York Times (3/5, Greenhouse) reports that Kennedy and Clarence Thomas, appearing before the House Appropriations subcommittee on transportation, treasury, judiciary, and housing and urban development on Tuesday to discuss the court's budget request, were asked by several panel members for their opinions on the issue of allowing television cameras in the high court. The Times notes that last year, Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "introduced a bill to require the Supreme Court to permit its arguments to be televised unless a majority of the justices voted to bar television on a case-by-case basis." Justice Kennedy "said it raised a 'sensitive point' about the constitutional separation of powers. 'It's not for the court to tell Congress how to conduct its proceedings,' and the reverse was also true, he said. He added, 'We feel very strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the mood of the court, and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches.'" Justice Thomas warned "that television in the courtroom would have a negative impact on the argument sessions. 'It runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases,' he said. He added that some members of the court 'feel more strongly than others,' but that all agreed that the court should decide the issue for itself."

Spellings Defends No Child Left Behind Act. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M), Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings pans a March 24 editorial that criticized the No Child Left Behind program. She writes, "Few voices have been stronger in support of education reform over the years than your editorial page. Which is why it troubles me to have to respond to your March 24 editorial 'Spellings Test.' Instead of challenging reform's opponents, you found fault with its best friend. The Bush administration led the charge to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, the strongest educational accountability measure ever instituted." Through the program, "the Department of Education has challenged states that have tried to water down or wriggle out of its provisions. And we have been immovable on the 'bright line' goals of the law." Spellings continues, "We welcome everyone's effort to use the latest data in support of closing the achievement gap" but "the bottom line is that none of this activity would be happening without the No Child Left Behind Act. It has done more than raise test scores and narrow the achievement gap. It has shone a bright light on the entire public education system, so that parents are no longer kept in the dark."

Senators Will No Longer Block Highway Nominee. The Long Island Newsday/AP (4/5, De La Cruz) reports, "New Jersey's two Democratic senators on Tuesday said they will lift their block on President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after the agency agreed to give the state more than $150 million for transportation projects that had been in jeopardy because of a new rule. Sens. Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez placed a hold last week on Richard Capka's nomination to head the FHA, alleging that the agency was rescinding approvals that allowed New Jersey to spread costs for transportation projects over several years." Lautenberg is quoted as saying, "The Bush administration has blinked and promised to provide the rest of New Jersey's highway money for this year and the amount we have requested for 2007."

Boehner Says Budget Should Get To Floor This Week. Roll Call (4/5, Yachnin) reports, "Although the House Rules Committee postponed its vote Tuesday evening on setting the debate for fiscal 2007 budget resolution, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) insisted that the measure will reach the House floor before Members depart for the two-week Easter recess. 'It will be a tough sell. We will get there,' Boehner said at a Tuesday press conference. ... 'Listen, we are going to do the budget this week. It is going to mean a lot of conversations and a lot of honest dialogue.'" Although "members of the conservative Republican Study Committee have criticized the budget resolution, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the group's chairman, has said that the group could support the matter in exchange for leadership support of a quartet of reform proposals. ... 'I'm satisfied that negotiations are moving along,' Pence said. 'We're encouraged by the progress.'"

Centrist GOP House Members Seek Spending Increases. The Hill (4/5, Young) reports, "Three House Republicans yesterday introduced a substitute to the budget resolution that would boost discretionary spending. The centrists hope to match the success of their Senate counterparts and increase money for education, health and the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) by $7.16 billion above the resolution marked up by Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa). GOP Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Dave Reichert (Wash.) sponsored the substitute amendment." The three "are hopeful that the Rules Committee will allow their amendment to proceed to the floor, Castle spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk said."

DOJ_NMG_0025191

Both Parties Jostle For Advantage As DeLay Announces Resignation. Much of the coverage of Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement that he will leave Congress within the next few weeks focuses on its implications for the midterm elections. Both parties offered their analysis on DeLay's resignation. The CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported National Republican Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Thomas Reynolds, reacting to the news, said "DeLay…robbed Democrats of their best issue." Reynolds was shown saying, "I don't know what their national strategy would be. They don't have Tom DeLay to kick around anymore." In an interview on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), DeLay cast his departure as a positive development for Republicans in his Texas district and across the nation. Asked to point to one reason for his resignation. DeLay said, "The Republican majority. I've worked a long time building that majority, and helping build it, and work on it, and my constituents deserve a Republican to represent the 22nd District and now we'll have one."

Democrats disagree about the development's national impact. DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel said on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), "The whole campaign is about change versus the status quo and the philosophy that….DeLay represented is still in play here." DeLay's "philosophy is the operative philosophy of the Republican Party." DNC Chairman Howard Dean echoed those views on CNN's The Situation Room (4/4). Asked if DeLay's resignation is good or bad for the Democrats, Dean said, "It's very good for the country. There's an awful lot of corruption, not just, of course, Tom DeLay, but Bill Frist, the leader of the Senate is under investigation for insider trading. Karl Rove still has his…security clearance, despite the fact that he has leaked information to the CIA -- for the CIA identifications in a time of war. The vice president's chief of staff is under indictment. So, this is a very deep problem, this Republican culture of corruption."

Media reports describe Republicans, including the President, as "relieved" DeLay will not be running this November. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Bash) reported that "privately even some of DeLay's Republican colleagues are relieved today, some saying that fair or not, he did put a cloud of scandal over the Republicans here on the Hill that they hope now they can get out from under." CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Henry) later said, "There are absolutely no tears being shed here at the White House." DeLay "was radioactive politically. And, in fact, when the duo spoke yesterday by phone, when DeLay gave the President a head's up about this decision, there was no sign that the President tried to talk him out of it." The Washington Times (4/5, Hallow, Fagan, 90K) reports that yesterday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan was "asked whether Mr. Bush regrets the decision by his key political ally." McClellan said, "The president respects his decision. This was a decision that Congressman DeLay made." The AP (4/5, Espo) quotes Bush saying yesterday, "I wish him all the best. It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas." The Hill (4/5, O'Connor) notes DeLay's decision "coincides with a similar shakeup at the White House, where the president's chief of staff for the past five years offered his resignation last week."

The New York Times (4/5, Hulse, Shenon, 1.19M) reports that "privately, some senior Republicans said Mr. DeLay should have acted months ago," when lobbying Jack Abramoff "entered his guilty plea and when Mr. DeLay abandoned plans to try to regain the majority leader post he vacated after being indicted in Texas." The Times adds, "Party strategists said his decision not to seek re-election could ease the way for other embattled Republicans, with Democrats losing a prime target for their claims of widespread corruption."

Media reports are split on the political implications of the resignation, but most agree that Republicans remain in deep political trouble. Knight Ridder (4/5, Thomma) reports DeLay's "decision to retire from Congress will do little to help his embattled party retain control of the legislature in November's elections and won't erase his image as a poster child for corruption." It "leaves unchanged the larger dynamics of this year's congressional elections: deep dissatisfaction with President Bush, the war in Iraq and problems in the Republican base over such issues as immigration and federal spending." USA Today (4/5, Drinkard, 2.31M) also says "analysts saw few silver linings for the GOP," and the Baltimore Sun (4/5, Davis, Shaw, 296K), under the headline "DeLay's Decision Fuels GOP Concerns," says the congressman's move "underscored broader concerns among some Republican strategists that the still-unfolding corruption charges could cost other vulnerable lawmakers their seats this year." And "Democrats promised a push to make Republican scandals a signature theme of the elections."

DOJ_NMG_0025192

USA Today (4/5, Page, Wolf, 2.31M) asks, "Is a tidal wave gathering?," and adds DeLay's announcement "signaled what Democrats hope for and Republicans fear: that Democrats could be swept into power in November by the sort of political tsunami that helped Republicans win control of Congress in 1994. 'We know that there's a hurricane coming, and it's going to hit the Republicans in November,' says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report. 'We're just trying to figure out how big this thing is.'" ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 3, 3:20, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) offered a similar analysis of DeLay's move, saying the Texan "is a good politician. A lot of people say he sees the writing on the wall. He sees a political tsunami coming."

On NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert seemed to agree that DeLay's move did not significantly help Republicans, "The legal process is going to continue to play out. Two DeLay aides already pleading guilty, another may about to do the same. This is going to involve sentencing, testimony, a whole lot more of bad news coming for the Republicans." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the House Minority Leader, was shown saying, "This isn't just about Tom DeLay, although he's the ringleader. It's about the Republicans in Congress who enabled and benefited from this corruption."

MSNBC's Hardball (4/4, Matthews) reported, "The political future for the White House and Republicans in Congress is dodgey." Bob Shrum, also on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), said, "We'll see a referendum on George Bush on the war in Iraq which will hurt the Republicans and Tom DeLay is the tip of the iceberg here. He's the father of the culture of corruption. But his getting out of the way is not going to remove this."

The Financial Times (4/5, Alden, Kirchgaessner) reports "a senior lobbyist with close ties to the Republican party said the resignation would likely have little impact on the Senate races this year, or on the 2008 presidential elections, but said it could hurt House Republicans. 'If you are a Republican running for the House in 2006, there is an impact,' he said."

Some analysts, however, think DeLay's departure will help Republicans. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/5, Polman, 423K) quotes Larry Sabato, "a nonpartisan political analyst who closely tracks voter behavior, said by phone yesterday: 'If DeLay had stayed in his reelection race, there would have been 1,000 headlines this fall about "Tom DeLay's hot race and his battle to survive." He has eliminated those headlines now. He did his party a favor. Now a different Republican can run and keep that seat for the Republicans. And every seat matters this year.'" Sabato "questions whether the Democrats can get traction with the corruption issue, now that 'their poster boy is off the wall.'"

Roll Call (4/5, Pershing) runs a similar report under the headline "DeLay's Departure A Relief For GOP," and says "with DeLay's announcement, the expected passage of 527 reform this week and consideration of a broader lobbying reform package coming after the Easter recess, House Republicans hope to finally get ahead of the ethics stories that have plagued them for the entire election cycle." The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Mullins, Rogers, 2.11M) also reports, "DeLay's decision to leave Congress is a wake-up call to his colleagues that anti-Washington sentiment is running high, which may dictate quick action on ethics legislation. … Now some Republicans say Mr. DeLay's resignation offers an incentive to act." A similar Washington Times (4/5, Bellantoni, 90K) story says "proponents of stricter lobbying laws say the resignation of embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay underscores the urgent need for reform."

CNN senior political correspondent Candy Crowley said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (4/4), "What DeLay said, which is look, this is -- was going to be a tough election. We might lose this seat, and probably any other Republican would win it easily. Republicans are not at a place at this point in the election year when they can afford to lose any seat." Pat Buchanan said on MSNBC's Scarborough Country (4/4), "No question about it, the Republican party is going to feel better off having Tom out of there. It's better for him, better for the party."

Tom DeLay's resignation was covered by hundreds of local televisions newscasts. Often, the story noted his former aide Tony Rudy had just pleaded guilty on Abramoff related charges and that Republicans may benefit from his resignation. Some examples: WXYZ-TV Detroit (4/4, 11:36 p.m.) reported, "The bigger they are, the harder they fall. And for a decade, no one in Washington was bigger than Tom Delay." DeLay "had become a political liability for his party, as Democrats painted Tom Delay as the poster child for Washington corruption." KPNX-TV Phoenix (4/4, 4:35 p.m.) said "House Republicans are actually cheering the move saying it should give the GOP a boost with the November elections just seven months a way." KTXL-TV Sacramento (4/4, 10:18 p.m.) reported, "Analysts say the GOP is relieved."

DOJ_NMG_0025193

WKYC-TV Cleveland (4/4, 11:15 p.m.) reported, "A number of Republicans were pressuring DeLay to step down." Meanwhile, WJZ-TV Baltimore (4/4, 6:43 p.m.) reported, "Democrats say that the resignation is the latest sign that the GOP is weakening and will not maintain control of Congress in the next election."

KHOU-TV Houston (4/4, 5:03 p.m.) reported, "Our political expert said even with the controversy around DeLay, the state of Texas has benefited because of the power of DeLay and it will be missed. It has been a long time since a Texan has not been running their party and that will hurt us."

The AP (4/5, Raum) calls DeLay "a symbol of the widening ethics scandal that now clouds GOP prospects for continued control. … 'It's hard to believe that in just 12 years, Republicans could end up in the same situation that it took Democrats 40 years to get in,' said Republican strategist Frank Luntz."

DeLay Says Democrats Are Criminalizing Politics. Rep. Tom DeLay was asked on Fox News' Special Report (4/4) about Democratic claims that his resignation will not stop the Republican "culture of corruption." DeLay said, "I don't think they understand it. There is no cultural corruption except theirs, lying about me, trying to work with an outrageous district attorney and being indicted on laws that don't exist. … They themselves announced this whole politics of personal destruction, criminalizing politics. That I think is a culture of corruption."

The Houston Chronicle (4/5, Mack, Mason, 581K) says DeLay "decided more than a week ago to resign his seat, disappointed with the margin of his Republican primary victory and looking at poll numbers that showed he might lose the seat in November, he said today." DeLay said in an interview with Sam Malone on KTRH-AM (740) that "he 'should have done better' than his 62 percent showing against four challengers in the March 7 primary." The Washington Post (4/5, A1, Smith, Weisman, 744K) reports DeLay "had considered resigning on several occasions over the past four months." But "he waited until after he had vanquished his challengers in the Republican primary to deny them the chance to become his successor, associates said."

The Dallas Morning News (4/5, Gillman) reports DeLay said he "hopes to put his talents to work pushing the conservative cause – without the trappings of power, the duties of high office or, perhaps, the huge political bull's-eye on his back. … 'I have a lot of friends in the conservative movement,' Mr. DeLay told MSNBC's Hardball in one of a handful of interviews he gave Tuesday. 'They value my talents, and they listen to me. I think I can work with them.'"

National Review online (4/4) last night ran a story on a "a long discussion with conservative journalists Tuesday afternoon." DeLay "attributed many of his problems to Ronnie Earle, the Texas county district attorney who has indicted DeLay on campaign-finance charges. 'He used this case to drag my name through the mud,' DeLay said, 'and he has abused the grand jury-process to drag my name through the mud.' The problem, DeLay explained, was the interplay of Earle's investigation and a House GOP rule that requires members of the leadership to step down if they are indicted. 'I truly believe that the only reason I was indicted is because we have that stupid rule -- that is, politically, the stupidest thing we've ever done,' DeLay said." NBC Nightly News (4/4, lead story, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) also reported DeLay "says the Texas charges are a political vendetta and that the allegations involving Abramoff are guilt by association." However, said the CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M), "Despite DeLay's public confidence, legal experts say the Justice Department is circling him."

DeLay Eligible For $65,000 Annual Pension. The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that resigning Rep. Tom DeLay "should do well in the private sector -- as long as he doesn't get convicted of anything serious." In addition to the "immensely profitable" speaking circuit, DeLay is "eligible for a pension of a bit over one-third of his $183,500 majority leader's salary, or about $65,000 a year, complete with health benefits and cost-of-living adjustments."

Resignation Frees DeLay To Use Campaign Funds For Legal Bills. The CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported now that DeLay "won that Republican primary, his campaign war chest is available to him to pay for all of his legal bills. Right now, he says, there's about $1.5 million in that campaign war chest, and he's got about $1 million outstanding in legal bills, and of course that could rise." NBC Nightly News (4/4, lead story, 2:40, Reid, 9.87M) also noted "hundreds of thousands of dollars in his campaign committee can now be used to pay his mounting legal bills."

DOJ_NMG_0025194

However, Roll Call (4/5, Kane) notes that as it "reported in February, DeLay began earlier this year to dip into his campaign account to defray some of the costs related to the Abramoff probe. In mid-February, while still preparing for a re-election battle that he thought would cost close to $10 million, DeLay's campaign was sitting on $1.3 million." Roll Call adds, "It's unclear how much of that money was spent in beating back several challengers in the March 7 primary, or to what level the campaign fund was replenished in the final weeks of March." Moreover, DeLay "may feel peer pressure to turn over a large chunk of that cash to lawmakers or the National Republican Congressional Committee, as is allowed under the law."

Still Deadlocked, House Ethics Panel Won't Launch DeLay Probe. USA Today (4/5, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports, "The House ethics committee, inactive for more than a year because of partisan disputes, has declined to launch investigations of...DeLay and other lawmakers accused of ethical lapses." USA Today adds, "A six-hour meeting Thursday ended in partisan deadlock, according to one Republican and one Democrat familiar with the panel's deliberations. Both declined to be identified because of committee non-disclosure rules. At issue was whether the committee could begin investigations without interfering with ongoing criminal probes."

GOP Prospects In TX22 Seen As Significantly Improved. Roll Call (4/5, Drucker) reports, "With Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) out of the way, Republicans concerned with holding his seat were breathing a collective sigh of relief Tuesday, while Democrats countered that the 22nd district was still theirs for the taking." DeLay's "surprise resignation announcement touched off a flurry of behind-the-scenes maneuvering Tuesday, as potential Republican candidates sought to gauge their viability as his replacement on the Nov. 7 ballot." A spokesman for the Democratic nominee, former Rep. Nick Lampson, "said the absence of DeLay and his luggage-set of ethics issues to run against would not significantly alter the ex-Congressman's strategy, nor would it hamper his fundraising effort." But "Republican officials based in the Houston area insisted that a once-competitive district in danger of being flipped by the Democrats had just turned into a walk for DeLay's as-yet-to-be-determined replacement as the Republican nominee."

USA Today (4/5, Stone, 2.31M) reports Gov. Rick Perry "is expected to call a special election to fill DeLay's term, said Eric Thode, Republican chairman of Fort Bend County in DeLay's 22nd Congressional District."

The Dallas Morning News (4/5, Nichols) reports, "One thing seemed clear Tuesday:" Lampson "has lost his biggest campaign issue: Mr. DeLay." The New York Times (4/5, Blumenthal, 1.19M) reports DeLay "told Fox News that his departure was intended to hurt Mr. Lampson. 'This is probably the worst day of his campaign because he knows that any Republican that replaces me on the ballot will win this seat,' he said."

The Houston Chronicle (4/5, Mack, Minaya, 581K) reports, "Those who acknowledged interest in the seat or were mentioned as contenders included Harris County Judge Robert Eckels, state Rep. Robert Talton, Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, former state District Judge John Devine and lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran against DeLay in the March Republican Primary." Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill "said he started receiving calls from interested officials within minutes of hearing the news of DeLay's decision." The Washington Times (4/5, Aynesworth, 90K) runs a similar report titled "Republican Contenders Eye DeLay's Seat," adding "most political analysts think that whoever gets the nod from the party has an excellent chance to win in November in the Republican-leaning district." The Times also says Woodfill "said Mr. Echols would have to be considered the favorite because of his lengthy public career and resulting name recognition."

On its website, Time (4/5, Hylton) reports that "late Monday night Sugar Land Mayor David G. Wallace ,44, a popular second-term city leader whose name is on the ballot for a third term in the May 13 municipal elections, confirmed that he would make a bid for the seat." Wallace "said he had heard rumbles about DeLay's decision over the weekend, and his mayoral reelection website was pulled down for a redesign immediately after the DeLay announcement."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) says in an editorial "DeLay's decision to resign from Congress removes one large Republican liability this election year, but it hardly ends the party's political vulnerability. One pressing question is whether the GOP majority is going to use the few productive weeks it has left to establish a 2006 record and 2007 agenda that are worthy of re-election. Recent evidence is not reassuring." GOP leaders "seem determined to avoid any meaningful legislative fights, lest their own internal fissures show. … On the other hand, the biggest Republican problem now is the demoralization of their own voters. … May we suggest a Plan B? How about at least fighting for the agenda that elected them the last time?"

DOJ_NMG_0025195

The Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) editorializes, "It's a measure of…DeLay's diminished political circumstances that those most unhappy about his abandoning his House seat are the Democrats who most revile him." The Post goes on to criticize "DeLayism," which "meant keeping a book on the partisan breakdown of political contributions from lobbyists labeled 'friendly' and 'unfriendly.' It meant strong-arming a trade group not to hire a former Democratic congressman and enlisting Federal Aviation Administration officials to track down Democrats fleeing a vote in the Texas state legislature aimed at cementing Republicans' hold on the House. Mr. DeLay offered to endorse the son of retiring Rep. Nick Smith (R-Mich.) in exchange for Mr. Smith's vote in favor of the Medicare prescription drug bill." DeLay "in his heyday got a lot done, but at a terrible cost to the institution -- and, we would argue, the party -- that he helped lead."

In an editorial titled "The Fall Of The Hammer," the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) writes that "DeLay's political demise hardly ends the influence-peddling culture to which he devoted himself. The DeLay machine's tooth-and-claw approach to politics lives on, from the Texas delegation he brazenly gerrymandered to his quid pro quo debasing of the lobbying industry." The Times adds, "In the smarmy self-justification of Mr. DeLay's statement yesterday, he said he wanted to avoid a 'referendum on me' in November. But, of course, that's exactly what the nation needs as voters come to consider a Congress deeply embedded in the easy money and easier ethics of the DeLay era."

USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "DeLay's decision to resign from Congress has given House Democrats a reason to rejoice. For more than a decade, the Texas Republican infuriated and outmaneuvered them, making them feel the acute pain of their powerlessness." But "perhaps it's the Republicans who should be the most gleeful. They'll be rid of the most potent symbol of Washington arrogance and corruption."

Cris Feldman, an attorney who "was on the civil trial team that won a ruling last spring finding that TRMPAC illegally raised, spent and failed to report corporate contributions in Texas," writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K), "The centerpiece of the Texas indictments is Texans for a Republican Majority PAC (TRMPAC), which DeLay founded and which his operatives ran, with the paid assistance of his daughter. … Corporate contributions to candidates in Texas are illegal. To make such a contribution is a third-degree felony. A contribution is considered to be the direct or indirect transfer of money, including the agreement to make such a transfer. If DeLay in any way participated in an agreement to indirectly transfer $190,000 in corporate cash to Texas candidates, he still has a problem back in Texas."

In a Washington Post column (4/5, A23), David Broder writes, "Symbolically as well as practically, the departure of Tom DeLay from Congress signals the end of an era of Republican dominance. The question now is whether the retreat that clearly has begun will turn into a rout. … Whether that translates to the specific victories needed to give Democrats an extra 15 seats and a narrow House majority cannot be guessed." But "the relief his fellow Republicans expressed that they can now recruit a fresh and presumably unscarred candidate in DeLay's Republican-leaning district shows how nervous they are about holding on to the House."

In the Washington Times (4/5, 90K), Tony Blankley writes, "Tom has served the party magnificently over the last two decades -- both as a principled conservative legislator, and as a shrewd and tireless political operator. And he has had the good judgment to exit on his own two feet. Both the Republican Party and the country are stronger and better for all that Tom DeLay has contributed. So, as a not-always-ally, I wish him Godspeed on the next leg of his journey."

Backed By Boehner, Ney Says He Won't Resign From Congress. Roll Call (4/5, Bresnahan) reports, "The stunning announcement by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) that he would resign from Congress has thrust another embattled Republican even more firmly into the spotlight: Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio)." Ney "went to great lengths Tuesday to deny that he had any intention of leaving office, and he received public support from his fellow Ohioan, House Majority Leader John Boehner." Boehner "said 'there's no pressure' on Ney to quit, although Boehner did acknowledge that Ney faces a difficult re-election battle this fall."

The Hill (4/5, Kucinich) says Ney "received calls from supporters shortly after stories that DeLay plans to resign hit the Internet on Monday night. His backers wanted to know if he was considering the same course of action." In an interview with The Hill, Ney said on DeLay's announcement, "We are two different people." Asked "whether he had received any information from the Justice Department about whether he would be indicted," he said, "I haven't heard anything."

DOJ_NMG_0025196

Democrats Seek Distance From McKinney As Controversy Continues. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Todd) reported yesterday that while Federal prosecutors are still considering whether to file criminal charges against Rep. Cynthia McKinney for the incident involving a Capitol Police officer, there are "serious questions being raised about support for McKinney on Capitol Hill, especially among the leadership of her own party. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, who could be a crucial ally on McKinney's behalf, first sought to downplay the incident last week." Pelosi was asked Tuesday whether McKinney should resign." Pelosi: "I think what happened last week was a very unfortunate incident. I think that all members of Congress like to be recognized. That's for sure. And this was a case in which she wasn't. I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened. But I'm just saying if it did happen, I don't think it was justified." CNN added that Pelosi "does not appear to be alone here." House Democratic Whip Stenny Hoyer "told CNN radio reporter Lisa Goddard today, it's the responsibility of anyone who visits the Capitol, whether they are members of Congress or visitors to fully cooperate with the Capitol Police. … Now it also looks like the Congressional Black Caucus isn't exactly rushing to McKinney's side."

The New York Times (4/5, Stolberg, 1.19M) also says "Democrats tried to distance themselves from the congresswoman and some Republicans pressed for a resolution praising the police." Meanwhile, Republicans "have tried to make political hay of the episode, saying it did not comport with the Democrats' efforts to portray themselves as committed to national security. Representative Patrick T. McHenry, Republican of North Carolina, said Tuesday that he would introduce a resolution commending the police for their professionalism. A senior House Republican aide said that the resolution would probably not come to a vote, but that Republicans would probably offer comments praising the police Wednesday when a separate police-related resolution was offered." The Hill (4/5, Hearn) runs a similar story under the headline "McKinney Rebuked By Her Leader," in which it reports Pelosi "is no longer on speaking terms with McKinney." USA Today/AP (4/5) reports Rep. Mel Watt, chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, "had no comment, a spokesman said."

The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Neuman, Timiraos, 958K) describes the original incident as "a misunderstanding," in which the officer "touched her on the shoulder and she jabbed him with her cell phone." However, it has "begun to mushroom into a racial and political furor, replete with accusations of racial profiling and threats of criminal charges."

Scores of local newscasts covered McKinney's incident. About half mentioned her supposition that her race was a factor in the confrontation. The GOP resolution in honor of the police was mentioned about a third of the time. Some examples: WSB-TV Atlanta (4/4, 11:12 p.m.) reported, "House Republicans are sponsoring a resolution to honor Capitol Police in reaction to McKinney's confrontation with a security officer and say it is a show of support for the officers." WSB-TV Atlanta (4/4, 5:32 p.m.) reported, "The bill's supporters say ignoring an officer's commands is never acceptable behavior. McKinney is not commenting on the resolution."

WRAL-TV Raleigh (4/4, 11:11 p.m.) reported, "McKinney is not getting much support from either side of the aisle over her reported scuffle with capitol police."

WCPO-TV Cincinnati (4/4, 11:13 p.m.) reported, "McKinney says her dispute with police wasn't about whether she obeyed an officer's order. She says she was inappropriately touched when the officer tried to stop her for not wearing her Congressional pin or showing ID. She refused to stop and hit the officer. McKinney has said she thinks it happened partly because she is black."

WXIX-TV Cincinnati (4/4, 10:29 p.m.) reported, "McKinney blames racial profiling and says she acted in self-defense. Critics say McKinney is playing the race card to distract from her own offense."

More Commentary. USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "McKinney should stop exploiting a phony race issue and apologize for her overbearing behavior. There's little doubt that Capitol Police will remember her in the future."

Roll Call (4/5) editorializes, "With the full-throated support of the House and Senate leadership, the police board should immediately call an end to the practice of allowing Members and those accompanying them to bypass magnetometers and other security measures around the Capitol complex. It's a practice we've always disliked, and one that only fuels perceptions of Congress as a pampered class. Now McKinney has given us new reason to encourage Congressional leaders to get rid of it."

DOJ_NMG_0025197

GAO Criticizes Funding For Abstinence As Part Of AIDS Fight. The New York Times (4/5, Dugger, 1.19M) reports, "Insistence by Republican Congressional leaders that American money to fight the spread of AIDS globally be used to emphasize abstinence and fidelity is undercutting comprehensive and widely accepted aid models, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released Tuesday." The report by the GAO, "examines the effect of a mandate from Congress that at least a third of United States money to prevent the spread of AIDS worldwide be devoted to sexual abstinence and fidelity programs." It found that "the provision had limited the reach of broader strategies to fight AIDS that include the use of condoms -- a conclusion strongly contested by a senior Bush administration official."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Stecklow, 2.11M) reports, "In an attached response to the GAO report, government officials who oversee Mr. Bush's AIDS program said it was on track to achieve its prevention goal and noted that funding for all prevention methods had increased from previous federal initiatives."

The Washington Post (4/5, A3, Brown, 744K) says "the AIDS coordinator's office, which is in the State Department, has shown considerable flexibility in administering the rules. In June 2004, it notified Congress that it would broaden the definition of 'abstinence until marriage' to include programs that also encouraged fidelity in sexual relationships outside marriage." The office also "exempts some countries' programs from meeting the abstinence-spending target as long as the entire overseas AIDS-prevention budget meets it. Ten of the 20 countries surveyed got exemptions."

First Lady Emphasizes Homeland Defense During St. Louis Visit. Stumping for Republican Sen. Jim Talent's re-election campaign and promoting the Helping America's Youth Initiative, First Lady Laura Bush traveled to St. Louis yesterday where she trumpeted Talent's commitment to homeland defense. At a speech to about 400 Talent supporters, the Kansas City Star (4/5, Douglas, 286K) quotes Mrs. Bush as saying, "At this historic time in our country, no issue is more important than defending America. ... Thanks to the men and women of the United States military, America is winning the war on terror. ... [Sen. Talent] understands the sacrifices made by our armed services personnel, and he understands the importance of their mission." The First Lady also singled out Talent "for his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee." Although "Talent was in Washington Tuesday, chairing a defense subcommittee meeting," in his place was "his wife, Brenda, along with President Bush's uncle, William 'Bucky' Bush, and Gov. Matt Blunt's wife, Melanie."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5, Mannies, 310K) adds, "Mrs. Bush saw counselors and teens during a private visit to a St. Charles adolescent drug treatment center operated by Preferred Family Healthcare" as "part of a series of visits Mrs. Bush is making around the country with various programs that encourage children and teens to avoid drug use or that treat those dealing with addiction." She is quoted as saying that the treatment center is "one really good example" of a good use for federal dollars. She later told at-risk teens: "You can't leave your life to luck. You can't guess. ... Think about the decisions you make."

House To Take Up Lobbying Reforms Today. House Republicans today will begin work on legislation to change lobbying disclosure requirements and house rules of conduct. CQ (4/4, Kady) reported that two committees will vote on the measure while, on the House floor, "Republicans will try to win what is expected to be a close vote on another bill (HR 513) the GOP associates with political reform. It would put new restrictions on groups known as '527s' that have become powerful voices for liberal causes."

Republicans Divided Over Limits On 527s. Republicans are divided over proposed new limits on 527s. The Hill (4/5, Schor) reports that the divisions are "pitting the conservative Club for Growth and its allies against the party's leadership." The Club for Growth argues "that a Republican-backed 527 bill, even one that relaxes caps on aggregate contributions and coordinated campaign spending, violates the party's core principle of deregulated political speech. … Co-signers of the Club's letter of opposition to the House 527 bill include Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist, FreedomWorks' Matt Kibbe, Citizens Against Government Waste's Tom Schatz and conservative elder statesman Paul Weyrich. Even House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-

DOJ_NMG_0025198

Ohio), among his conference's leading advocates of 527 regulation, gave a nod to the bill's critics yesterday during a briefing with reporters."

WPost Says House Should Pass 527 Limits. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) says the House should pass legislation that would require 527s "to play by the same rules as other committees that aim to influence federal elections." The Journal adds, "The usual politics of campaign finance reform -- Democrats for (at least publicly), Republicans against -- are upside down this time around. The reason is that Republicans do better than Democrats at raising the (relatively) small donations known as 'hard money,' while Democrats took the lead in the past election cycle in raising soft money for 527 groups. Connoisseurs of hypocrisy should enjoy this spectacle, but the partisan calculations are probably overstated. Democrats, with the rise of the Internet, have been improving their hard-money fundraising. Republicans are bound to draw even in the 527 race if it continues."

Senate Democrats Believe Prevention Act Will Strengthen Party's Position On Abortion. In legislation to expand access to contraceptives and sex education, Senate Democrats believe they have found a wedge issue to strengthen the party's position on abortion rights. The Hill (4/5, Bolton) reports, "Democratic strategists say the time is right for action because women who support abortion rights but are not politically engaged are alarmed by the confirmation of Samuel Alito as Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement on the Supreme Court and by the passage of legislation strictly curbing the availability of abortion there." The Prevention First Act, which is sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "has the support of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), presumptive front-runner in the 2008 presidential primary and 21 other Democrats. The bill would prohibit group health plans from excluding contraceptive drugs, devices and outpatient services if they cover the cost of other prescription drugs and outpatient services. It would also require the secretary of health and human services to disseminate information on emergency contraception to healthcare providers and require hospitals receiving federal money to provide emergency contraception to victims of sexual assault."

Democrats Seen As Showing Unity While GOP Appears Divided. Time (4/4, Bacon) reported in exclusive on its web site that while the conventional wisdom in Washington has been that Republicans are "more unified and disciplined and have better-articulated ideas than Democrats, who are often at war with one another and questioning their leadership, lately "the Democrats, looking to create a campaign platform for 2006, have put out some ideas that their famously fractured party largely agrees on. … And Democrats can't be accused of lacking ideas: many of the party's most prominent leaders are putting out long tomes detailing their views." Meanwhile, Republicans "can't find much agreement" on "many key issues."

Biden Asks IG To Probe State Department Screening. Sen. Joe Biden has asked the State Department's IG to investigate whether the department has been using a political litmus test to screen applicants before sending them oversees to represent the US. Knight Ridder (4/5, Landay) reports that Biden "said in a letter to the inspector general that he was requesting the review in part because of a Dec. 2 Knight Ridder report that such a test was being used to weed out critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policy. … The story quoted current and former U.S. officials as saying that potential participants were vetted -- via Internet searches, for example -- for any comments or writings that criticized administration policies, particularly its approach to Iraq."

Bush Daughters Run In Richmond 10K Under Fake Names. The Washington Post (4/5, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush's daughters Jenna and Barbara ran a 10K through Richmond's Fan district Saturday, "but went barely detected until the Richmond Times-Dispatch put the pieces together yesterday. The paper deduced that the twins ran under the fake names of Sarah and Emily Jackson, finishing at 54:27. Jenna's boyfriend, Henry Hager, finished three minutes faster under his own name. Race director Tracey Russell told us the White House reserved slots for the twins three weeks ago; both they and the Secret Service agents who ran with them blended invisibly into the crowd."

Santorum Makes Case For Anti-Poverty Agenda. Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, writes in the Washington Times (4/5, 90K), "Some in America have not reaped the rewards of our economic bounty; it is to help meet their needs that I have sponsored the Senate Anti-Poverty Agenda. There are three components to the anti-poverty agenda: work, investment and a neighborhood-based focus. … By keeping tax rates low, enabling low-income Americans to develop real assets and amending tax laws to encourage all Americans to give generously to our nation's charities helping those in need, we will help ensure that our economy stays strong and that ours is a nation of opportunity and prosperity for all."

DOJ_NMG_0025199

OTHER NEWS:

Shareholders Push For More Disclosure Of Corporate Political Donations. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Cummings, 2.11M) reports that the campaign for corporate disclosure of companies political donations is gaining momentum. According to the Journal, "Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on how to vote their proxies, is for the first time recommending passage of a shareholder resolution requiring more oversight and disclosure of political giving. … Proponents of corporate disclosure say political giving by public companies can create risks for shareholders, particularly if the firm winds up in the middle of a political scandal."

Morris Says Clinton Has Opened Herself To Challenge From Left. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (4/5) that "Hillary Clinton bet on consensus and centrism in backing the war and an aggressive policy on terrorism — and may have bet wrong. … Hillary may have misjudged the left. She may have opened herself up to a challenge from the left over Iraq and the war on terror. She may have chosen the wrong time and the wrong issue on which to cross party lines." Morris adds, "Now she is in a fix. If she retreats and retracts her support for the war, she will become the ultimate weather vane, shifting with the political wind. If she adopts a pro-peace posture, she undoes all of her work to position herself as a hawkish female, able to overcome the stereotypes that hamper women who wish to be commanders in chief."

Buckley Says Clinton Is "True Contender" For White House. Conservative writer William F. Buckley said Sen. Hillary Clinton is a true contender for the White House in 2008. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) reports that in an interview with Bloomberg Television, Buckley said Clinton "is "" very consequential woman with an extraordinary background,'' adding that she is "a phenomenon, a woman candidate who might easily be president." The Times also reports, "Mr. Buckley suggested that he was less than impressed with the current group of potential candidates for 2008, saying, 'I don't find a commanding presence sort of knocking on the door' for the next presidential campaign."

Massachusetts To Require Residents To Carry Health Insurance. USA Today (4/5, Appleby, 2.31M) reports, "Residents of Massachusetts will be the first in the nation required to carry health insurance, just as motorists in many states are required to carry auto insurance. After months of debate, state lawmakers approved a bill Tuesday that requires individuals to have coverage and tacks a $295 per worker annual assessment on employers who don't provide it, with the aim of reducing the state's 550,000 uninsured to near zero within three years." The bill "goes to Republican Gov. Mitt Romney. He's expected to sign it because he proposed such a measure last summer."

The New York Times (4/5, Belluck, 1.19M) says the bill "does what health experts say no other state has been able to do: provide a mechanism for all of its citizens to obtain health insurance. It accomplishes that in a way that experts say combines methods and proposals from across the political spectrum, apportioning the cost among businesses, individuals and the government. … All told, the plan is expected to cover 515,000 uninsured people within three years, about 95 percent of the state's uninsured population, legislators said, leaving less than 1 percent of the population unprotected."

The Washington Post (4/5, A1, Fahrenthold, 744K) notes the bill "would require all residents to purchase health insurance or face legal penalties." Romney "said the bill, modeled on the state's policy of requiring auto insurance, is intended to end an era in which 550,000 people go without insurance and their hospital and doctor visits are paid for in part with public funds."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Hechinger, Amstrong, 2.11M) calls the bill "a far-reaching bid to obtain universal health-care coverage," and says the measure "requires that businesses not offering health insurance pay penalties to help cover the uninsured and uses a combination of added state spending, tax incentives, insurance subsidies and expanded government-insurance programs." The Journal adds,

DOJ_NMG_0025200

"Though some business groups, such as the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, have generally voiced support for the bill, others, especially those representing small businesses, are wary of its effects on costs and job creation. In addition, health-care experts say the plan, despite its bold claims, provides little new money to pay for health care." They "note that under Gov. Michael Dukakis, Massachusetts approved a plan for universal health coverage in the late 1980s that died because of lack of money."

Rumsfeld, Powell Eulogize Weinberger. The Washington Post (4/5, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column that former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger was laid to rest yesterday at Arlington National Cemetery. The Post notes that "Cold Warriors of the 20th century" including Margaret Thatcher, Jeane Kirkpatrick, Ed Meese, Frank Carlucci, John Poindexter, Jack Kemp and James Schlesinger attended. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld eulogized Weinberger saying, "His goal was an era of hope and peace, one in which the people of Eastern Europe lived free, one in which the Berlin Wall no longer divided families but instead existed only in memory, or its shards sold as souvenirs." He added, "Today we live in that world, a world made safer and freer by Cold Warriors like Cap Weinberger." Former Secretary of State Colin Powell "concurred on the meaning of Weinberger, saying in his eulogy, that President Ronald Reagan "needed a champion to rebuild the armed forces of the United States to show the Soviets and the world how strength can lead to peace, and that champion was Cap Weinberger."

Boy Scouts Plan $17 Million Camp In Virginia. On the Haymarket, Virginia site where the Walt Disney Co. tried to build a theme park 12 years ago, the Boy Scouts of America is planning to open a $17 million camp catering to Cub Scouts. The Washington Post (4/5, B9, Stewart, 744K) reports, "The camp will be built and operated by the National Capital Council, which represents more than 85,000 Scouts and 23,000 volunteers in the District and 16 counties in Maryland and Virginia. It is one of the most expensive scouting construction projects in the nation, officials said, and unusual because of its focus on Cub Scouts as well as Boy Scouts. … Officials said the Scouts wanted a camp closer to Washington so that Cub Scouts, the organization's youngest members, could enjoy an overnight camping experience."

Couric To Announce Plans To Leave "Today" This Morning. Today show anchor Katie Couric plans to confirm this morning that she is leaving the show after 15 years and CBS will announce as early as today that she will take over the anchor chair of its evening news broadcast. The Washington Post (4/5, C7, Kurtz, 744K) reports that Couric "decided yesterday to use the occasion of her 15th anniversary, when the NBC program will be reflecting on her tenure, to look forward to the next chapter in her career, said sources at both networks and people familiar with her thinking. The sources, who first confirmed Couric's plans Monday, had expected the CBS negotiations to drag on a bit longer, but said now the network has wrapped up the negotiations and wants to go public as soon as Couric does."

Academic Paper On Pro-Israel Lobby Dismissed As "Bigotry." Eliot Cohen, a professor at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K) criticizes an academic papers posted on a Harvard Web site. John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt's "The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy'" contends that "American national security dictates distancing ourselves from the state of Israel; that U.S. support for Israel has led to such disasters as America's status as the No. 1 target for Islamic terrorists; and that such an otherwise inexplicable departure from good sense can be accounted for only by the power of 'The Lobby' (their capitalization), an overwhelmingly Jewish force abetted by some Christian evangelicals and a gentile neocon collaborator or two, who have hijacked American foreign policy and controlled it for decades." Cohen notes, "I am a public intellectual and a proud Jew; sympathetic to Israel and extensively engaged in our nation's military affairs; vaguely conservative and occasionally hawkish. In a week my family will celebrate Passover with my oldest son -- the third generation to serve as an officer in the United States Army. … Other supposed members of 'The Lobby' also have children in military service. Impugning their patriotism or mine is not scholarship or policy advocacy. It is merely, and unforgivably, bigotry."

Iran Open To Limited Negotiations On Enrichment. Wrangling over Iran's disputed nuclear program continued on Tuesday, with the AP (4/5, Dareini) reporting, "Iran said...it is willing to negotiate with world powers on large-scale enrichment of uranium but will never give way on their key demand — to cease all enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs. ... Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki reiterated that Iran would not comply with the Security Council demand, saying the small-scale enrichment it resumed in February was strictly for research and was within its rights." Mottaki is quoted as saying, "The enrichment of uranium...is Iran's right as defined as a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. ... One thing we can't give up and that is the right of the Iranian nation. ... We can't hold a dialogue with any country about giving up our rights." Mottaki "added, however, that Iran was prepared to talk to the international community about large-scale enrichment."

DOJ_NMG_0025201

Harman Calls US Intelligence On Iran Insufficient. With tensions increasing over Iran's controversial nuclear program, the AP (4/5, Shrader) reports, "US intelligence information on Iran is inadequate and may contain misinformation that spy agencies are accepting as solid, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee said Tuesday. Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., told a Council on Foreign Relations gathering that she and other lawmakers recently received a briefing from intelligence agencies based on information shared with the International Atomic Energy Agency and the UN Security Council. Her bottom line: 'I remain skeptical — lots of unanswered questions.'" She is later quoted as saying, "The conjecture that I have is that if I were Iran, and I wanted to put out disinformation, it might look a lot like what our government is claiming is information. ... I can't tell you that's true, but I can't tell you it's not true."

Iran Runs War Games On State Television. Fox News' Special Report (4/4, Baier) reported, "Iran's five-day military show and tell continued today. War games called the Great Prophet broadcast on state-run television. This time the Iranians unveiled what they called a super modern flying boat. It takes off from the water's surface. They claim it's undetectable by radar and able to launch missiles while traveling at high speeds. The flying boat tests come one day after a high-speed torpedo test. … The Iranian foreign minister said today the war games are designed to send a message that Iran can defend itself." Fox added, "US Intelligence officials and military analysts say Iran's videotaped tests are likely happening for two reasons. One, to try to intimidate the international community as negotiations over Iran's nuclear program continue, and two, to send a message to the Iranian people that the country has an effective military in case of an invasion."

In related coverage, the AP (4/5, Dareini) cites "a top Iranian military official [as saying] Tuesday the country can now defend itself against any invasion originating from outside the region — a clear reference to the United States — as it tested a second new radar-avoiding missile. ... Shortly after the test, the chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, warned that Iran was now able to 'confront any extra-regional invasion,' referring to the United States without mentioning it by name. 'The missile command of the Guards' naval force...via positioning various types of surface-to-sea missiles, is able, while defending the coastlines and islands, to confront any extra-territorial invasion,' the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Safavi as saying. Safavi also called for foreign forces to leave the region." He is quoted as saying, "Iran wants durable peace in the Persian Gulf and it can't be achieved without foreign forces and those which invaded Iraq leaving (the region)."

Some Experts Say New Iranian Weapons May Originate In Russia. The AP (4/5, Keath) reports, "Iran has unveiled with great fanfare a series of what it portrays as sophisticated, homegrown weapons — flying boats and missiles invisible to radar, torpedoes too fast to elude. But experts said Tuesday it appears much of the technology came from Russia and questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities. Still, the armaments, tested during war games by some 17,000 Revolutionary Guards in the Persian Gulf, send what may be Iran's real message: its increased ability to hit oil tankers if tension with America turns to outright confrontation."

Israeli Missile Strike Hits Base In Abbas Compound. The AP (4/5, Barzak) reports, "Israeli warplanes fired three missiles into the Gaza compound of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday in response to Palestinian rocket fire — the first such Israeli attack since the violent Islamic group Hamas took power last week." According to the AP, "Abbas denounced the air strike and called for international intervention to stop what he called Israel's 'destruction for the sake of destruction.' He said he contacted 'the UN, Russia, the EU and Arab states and told them that these actions complicate daily life and affect our human and social status.'" Although "Hamas does not appear to be directly responsible for the rocket attacks on Israel, its leaders have said militants who attack Israel will not be arrested."

DOJ_NMG_0025202

Hamas Foreign Minister Plans China Visit. After a visit by Hamas leaders to Moscow last month drew fire from the group's detractors, AFP (4/5) reports, "Palestinian foreign minister Mahmud al-Zahar announced plans to visit China as Beijing became the latest power to reach out to Islamists Hamas despite a Western boycott. 'We are going to visit China and we have let the ambassador know,' Zahar...told reporters after meeting the Chinese envoy to the Palestinian territories, Yang Weiguo." Israel immediately criticized the idea. Foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev is quoted as saying, "Anyone who recognizes the Hamas government without this movement bending to the demands of the international community in recognizing Israel, renouncing terrorism and accepting agreements, helps to maintain its extremist positions."

Rice Could Face Skeptical Reception As She Presents US-India Nuclear Deal To Congress. While Congress frets over Delhi's ties with Iran and other issues as it considers the landmark US-India nuclear deal signed last month, the Washington Post (4/5, A17, Linzer, 744K) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will address those concerns and others when she testifies today before the House and Senate foreign relations panels on details of the unfinished agreement, in which the United States would provide India with civilian nuclear technology. She faces pressure from Republican and Democratic lawmakers, some of whom are pushing for changes to the deal out of concern about nuclear proliferation." The Post cites "a letter yesterday [in which] a bipartisan group of nuclear experts urged lawmakers not to authorize technology transfers until India stops producing nuclear weapons material, as the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China are believed to have done. In response, some administration officials said Rice could announce a new push for an international treaty to end production of all fissile material."

India Nuclear Deal Prompts Heavy Lobbying, For And Against. As Rice prepares for her presentation, Roll Call (4/5, Ackley) reports, "If Daryl Kimball has it his way...Rice will have a bumpy ride today during her back-to-back appearances before Senate and House committees. ... Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, opposes the deal and has spent the days leading up to Rice's testimony trying to make sure Members ask her the toughest of questions. 'We want them to ask her what the potential impact of this will be on the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group. ... [Back then] India used peaceful nuclear assistance to develop its first nuclear bomb test.'" Backing the deal will be the Indian embassy, Indian-American lobbying groups, and, of course, Rice herself. Sanjay Puri, chairman of the US India political action committee, is quoted as saying, "A lot of work is going on behind the scenes to explain the background on the deal, the fine print and how it is beneficial to America. ... We have about 30,000 members around the country, and obviously we've reached out to all our people who are active in every state and have strongly urged them to reach out to Members of Congress and Senators."

Iran Sanctions Bill Could Determine Nuclear Deal's Destiny. The Hill (4/5, Mikhail) reports, "A potential standoff involving dueling Iran sanctions bills could determine the fate of a civilian nuclear-cooperation deal with India — a deal that is a high priority for President Bush. The White House is in the politically awkward position of asking Congress to ratify the high-profile nuclear deal with India while fending off Iran-related legislation that could threaten the US-India pact. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have introduced bills that seek to cut off funds from Iran that could be applied toward attaining or creating nuclear weapons, enhancing provisions of the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA)." The House version, however, "which has 355 co-sponsors, including most members of the Republican and Democratic leadership, provides less flexibility to the president to determine whether to apply such sanctions." According to The Hill, "Recent actions in the House have substantially increased the likelihood of overlapping discussions of the Iran sanctions bill and the nuclear deal. The legislation was voted out of the International Relations Middle East subcommittee in April 2005 but was not scheduled for a full-committee markup vote until a day before Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.)...introduced the enabling legislation for the nuclear deal with India this March." That said, Sam Stratman, a spokesman for International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), is quoted as saying, "It would be very premature to draw any linkages to the fate of these very different pieces of legislation.'

Former Defense Secretary Cohen Backs India Deal. In a Wall Street Journal (4/5, A20, 2.11M) op-ed, former Secretary of Defense William Cohen writes that "this agreement is key to moving forward in a number of areas of mutual advancement. Some detractors say that it is imperfect and will harm long-held nuclear nonproliferation goals. On balance and over the long term, however, I believe the US stands to gain far more than it will lose by implementing this agreement." He adds, "Make no mistake, this agreement with India is by no means perfect and the Bush administration could have done a much better job in consulting with Congress first." But "if the agreement is rejected in Washington or New Delhi, it is unlikely that India will be able to go forward with further development of its civilian nuclear power generation capability. This will add significant new pressure to the oil market and also force India to burn more coal. Both of these outcomes will damage US economic and environmental objectives." Cohen concludes, "Fundamentally upgrading the US-India relationship represents one of the most important strategic innovations in American foreign policy since the end of the Cold War. Congress should recognize and consider carefully this reality during its deliberations on the civilian nuclear agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0025203

US-Russian Relationship Increasingly Testy. The AP (4/5, Ingram) reports, "Like an aging couple, Russia and the United States seem to spend more time squabbling over what divides them than building on their shared interests. Whether it's Iran, the Palestinian militant group Hamas or democracy movements in former Soviet republics, Moscow and Washington increasingly find themselves staring warily at one another across the fence." The story goes on to cite recent quarrels over proposed Russian membership in the WTO and allegations that Russia forwarded to Saddam Hussein intelligence on US troop movements during the 2003 invasion -- among a litany of other sticking points. Ivan Safranchuk, who heads of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information, is quoted as saying, "There have always been differences, but from time to time they were put aside for shared values: nuclear disarmament, euphoria over the end of the Cold War, the fight against terrorism, things that pushed everything else into the shadows. ... But in the periods of thaw, Russia and the US didn't create any stable mechanisms to solve problems."

Hughes To Lead US Delegation To Benin. The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush announced yesterday that he has selected Karen P. Hughes, undersecretary of state for public affairs, to lead the U.S. delegation to the inauguration tomorrow of President-elect Thomas Yayi Boni of the beautiful West African Republic of Benin."

DHS Near Agreement With China On Illegal Immigrants. The Washington Times (4/5, A1, Hudson, 90K) reports in a front page story that the Department of Homeland Security "is near an agreement with China to return up to 39,000 Chinese illegally living in the U.S. to the communist country, which previously had refused to accept deportations." Secretary Michael Chertoff "said the tentative agreement, which would let the U.S. deport Chinese illegals as they are arrested, will act as a deterrent to other foreign nationals contemplating illegal immigration."

Tokyo Conference Could Stimulate Stalled North Korea Talks. The Washington Post (4/5, A18, Faiola, 744K) reports that an upcoming private sector conference in Tokyo is "fueling hopes of unofficial meetings that could help restart the long-stalled negotiations [with North Korea]." The conference marks "the first time that leading delegates from all six [countries involved] will be at the same forum since November." However, the Post reports that "diplomats said it was too early to tell whether any talks with the North Koreans would take place."

Syrian Regime Cracks Down On Domestic Critics. The New York Times (4/5, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that Damascus is "aggressively silencing domestic political opposition while accommodating religious conservatives to shore up support across the country." Syrian officials apparently feel "a growing sense of confidence due to shifts in the Middle East in recent months."

Muslim Scholars Exempt One Danish Firm From Boycott. The New York Times (4/5, Fattah, 1.19M) reports that a group of Muslim scholars has recommended "that the company Arla Foods 'should be withdrawn from the boycott on Denmark," after "Arla placed full-page advertisements in Arab newspapers last month condemning the cartoons as an insult to Islam." However, the Times says that "many retailers said they intended to keep Danish goods, including Arla's, off their shelves."

Pakistan Pressures Foreign Students To Leave Madrassahs. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Montero, 61K) reports that "Pakistan has banned foreigners…from madrassahs after it was discovered that one of the London bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassah." Officially, 65 percent have left, but the Monitor reports that the foreign students "come with long experience in Western classrooms, and could form a bridge between Western and Islamic worldviews and systems of thought."

DOJ_NMG_0025204

Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run For Office For First Time. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Etheridge, 61K) reports that a Tuesday by-election in Kuwait City "is the first in which women have been able to vote since the National Assembly approved universal suffrage last year." Two women ran for office. The election is "considered a test case for 2007 parliamentary polls."

Thai Premier Says He Will Step Aside. After months of protest and an opposition boycott of elections last Sunday, the Washington Post (4/5, A17, Sipress, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra announced Tuesday that he would resign in an effort to end months of demonstrations that have shaken Thailand. He pledged to leave office as soon as a new parliament convenes. 'I want all Thais to reunite,' he said in a brief televised address to the nation. ... 'We have no time to quarrel. I want to see Thai people unite and forget what has happened.'" The New York Times (4/5, Fuller, 1.19M) notes, "It was a sudden reversal for Mr. Thaksin. ... While he was loved in the countryside, he was despised by the Bangkok elite, who accused him of using his political power to further his business interests. They also accused him of worsening the Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand, stifling media independence, fostering a culture of corruption in government contracts and allowing the police to conduct hundreds of extrajudicial killings, a charge the prime minister has brushed aside."

Sri Lankan Candidate Vows To Reform UN. According to the Washington Times (4/5, Behn, 90K), Jayantha Dhanapala said "that as secretary-general, he would push ahead with reforms to the world organization and take a more proactive stance toward "what is evil and wrong with the world." Dhanapala is in Washington to promote "his reformist agenda and bridge-building style."

De Villepin Defies Renewed Demonstrations Over Labor Law. The New York Times (4/5, Sciolino, Smith, 1.19M) reports that French Premier Dominique de Villepin vowed, ""The government will not give in" to labor-law protestors. More demonstrations occurred on Tuesday, but the Times reports that "the clashes seemed less fierce than those of just a week ago." USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) says that protesters were unmoved by "President Jacques Chirac's promise Friday that the law would not be implemented until Parliament watered it down." USA Today also reports that in spite of de Villepin's stance, "there were signs…that Parliament was ready to negotiate with trade unions." The Washington Post (4/5, A17, Moore, 744K) says that the demonstrations amount "to an outpouring of discontent with an aging leadership" and that "in the past, such huge displays of public anger have resulted in governments collapsing."

Former British Spy Killed In Northern Ireland. The Washington Post (4/5, A20, Pogatchnik, 744K) reports that admitted British informant and former Sinn Fein legislative chief Denis Donaldson "was found fatally shot Tuesday." Donaldson had admitted in December that he had been on the British payroll "for two decades." The Post writes that "the killing appeared certain to harden Protestant opinion against cooperating with Sinn Fein." The New York Times (4/5, Lavery, 1.19M) reports that "the I.R.A. denied any involvement." USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) also ran a brief story on the murder.

NYTimes Column Comments On Rice-Straw Trip's Gender Issues. New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes that the British were "were fascinated with the Condi Rice and Jack Straw two-for-the-road odyssey." She adds that "the British are used to iron ladies" and recalls "chauvinist" US reaction to Geraldine Ferraro's 1984 vice presidential candidacy.

NYTimes Editorial Criticizes Arroyo. An editorial in the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) says that "President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo has completely lost touch with the ideals that inspired that 1986 'people power' movement." It urges President Bush to warn her that her "increasingly authoritarian tendencies" are "making her country far more vulnerable to terrorist pressures."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"L.A. OKs 'Historic' Homeless Plan."
"Insurers Saw Record Gains In Year Of Catastrophic Loss."
"Chief 9/11 Architect Critical Of Bin Laden."
"Rumble In The Jungle Over Oil."

DOJ_NMG_0025205

"GOP Woes Not Likely To Leave With DeLay."
"Links Between Pellicano, Director Come Into Focus."
"Couric Is Set To Join CBS News As Anchor."

USA Today:
"Second Homes 40% Of Market."
"US Urged To Apologize For 1930s Deportations."
"Third Of Kids Tip Scales Wrong Way."

New York Times:
"Hussein Charged With Genocide In 50,000 Deaths."
"Massachusetts Sets Health Plan for Nearly All."
"Syria Imposing Stronger Curbs On Opposition."
"A Partisan Leaves; Will An Era Follow Suit?"
"Big Gain For Rich Seen In Tax Cuts For Investments."
"Families With Full Plates, Sitting Down to Dinner."

Washington Post:
"Terrapins Land on Top of the World."
"Mass. Bill Requires Health Coverage."
"DeLay Departing On Own Terms."
"GWU President Says He Will Step Down In 2007."
"Walter Reed's World Of Hurt, Hope."
"Democracy In Iraq Not A Priority In US Budget."

Washington Times:
"French Protests Persist."
"House GOP Lacks Agenda, DeLay Says."
"Chief Says Officer Was Right To Halt McKinney."
"U.S. Near Deal With China On Illegals."
"Visions Of A Civil War Battlefield."
"Episcopalians Consider Freeze On Gay Bishops."
"Utilities Face Financial Squeeze, Agencies Warn."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM's Wagoner: Now Is Not The Time To Panic."
"Detroit Is Knee-Deep In Garbage Problems."
"Man Wonders: Could My Dad Be The Oakland County Child Killer?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Georgia Forestland In $6.1 Billion Deal."
"Scandal Throws Kia Off Schedule."
"Judge Voids Boy's Murder Plea."
"UGA May Bounce Hardcore Boozers."

Dallas Morning News:
"DeLay Says He'll Lead From The Outside."
"Area Avoids Bubble Trouble."
"Couric Poised To Be First Woman To Fly Solo As A Network Anchor."
"State Wants Corridor To Shadow I-35."
"Senate Plan Would Treat Immigrants Based On Time In US"

Houston Chronicle:
"Scramble Begins Without DeLay."
"More Spending By Slade Detailed."
"Ailment Sidelines Lay's Lead Attorney."
"NBC's Couric May Say Today She's CBS' Newswoman."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Congress-Child Porn; Child Porn Victim; DeLay Retirement; Landrieu-Nominations; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; France-Labor Protests; 9/11 Movie; TN-Tornado Damage; Indian Casinos-Sexual Harassment; Clock Event; Iraq KIAs Memorial.
CBS: DeLay Retirement; Hurricane Season-Gulf Coast; Landrieu-Nominations; Congress-Child Porn; France-Labor Protests; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; Iraq-Sadr City; No Child Left Behind-Status; Hollywood-Wiretapping Case.
NBC: DeLay Retirement; DeLay Retirement-Analysis; TN-Tornado Damage; Tax Preparer Schemes; Stock Markets; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; France-Labor Protests; Katrina-Traumatized Children; Delta Airlines-Strike; Connecticut-Murdered Investor; Sleep Problems-Consequences; Cancer-Aspartame; Cancer-Sun's Benefits; Date Anomaly.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: DHS Deputy Press Secretary Arrested; Congress-Online Child Porn; WI-Iraq referendums.
CBS: DHS deputy press secretary arrested; MA-health insurance bill; Saddam trial; WI-Iraq referendums; Study-ginger anti-cancer benefits; NCAA women's championship; Wall Street.
NPR: DHS Deputy Press Secretary Arrested; DeLay Resignation; CA-Levee Breaks; Red River Flooding; Wall Street; DE-Military Plane Crash; France-Jobs Law Protests; NCAA Women's Championship.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Breakfast with bicameral Republican Congressional leadership, Oval Office, The White House, closed press; participates in a panel discussion on health savings accounts, Playhouse on the Green, Bridgeport, Conn.

DOJ_NMG_0025206

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full committee. Hearing on U.S.-India atomic energy cooperation. Location: Room SH-216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Emerging Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearingon the FY07 budget for combating terrorism. Assistant Defense Secretary Thomas W. O'Connell; Vice Adm. Eric T. Olson, deputy commander, U.S. Special Operations Command; Retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director, National Counterterrorism Center; Jeffrey N. Rapp, director, Joint Intelligence Task Force-Combating Terrorism, Defense Intelligence Agency. Location: Room 222, Russell. Notes: Closed session, with open session following in Room 222 Russell.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the nomination of Richard Capka to be administrator of the Federal Highway Administration. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Indian government's nuclear plan. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on methamphetamine abuse in Indian regions. William P. Ragsdale, director, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Christopher B. Chaney, deputy director, Office of Law Enforcement Services, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Jerry Gidner, deputy director, Tribal Services, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Robert G. McSwain, deputy director, Indian Health Service, HHS; Jon Perez, director, Division of Behavior Health, Indian Health Service; Anthony Dekker, associate director, Clinical Services, Phoenix Indian Medical Center, Phoenix; Matthew H. Mead, U.S. Attorney's Office, Wyoming; Kathleen Wesley-Kitcheyan, chairwoman, San Carlos Apache Tribe; Ivan Posey, chairman, Wind River Eastern Shoshone Tribe; Joseph A. Garcia, president, National Congress of American Indians; Gary Edwards, chief executive officer, National Native American Law Enforcement Association; Karrie Azure, North Dakota Intertribal Justice Program on Methamphetamine. Location: Room 485, Russell.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Bioterrorism and Public Health Preparedness Subcommittee. Hearing on all hazards medical responses. Panel 1: John Agwunobi, MD, assistant secretary for health, HHS; Ellen Embrey, deputy assistant secretary of defense for force health protection and readiness; director, Deployment Health Support; DOD; Lawrence Deyton, MSPH, MD, chief public health and environmental hazards officer, Department of Veterans Affairs. Panel 2: Thomas V. Inglesby, MD, chief operating officer and deputy director, Center for BioSecurity, University of Pittsburgh Medical Center; Richard Serino, chief of department, Boston Emergency Medical Services; Eddy Bresnitz, MD, deputy commissioner/state epidemiologist, Public Health Services Branch, New Jersey Department of Health and Senior Services; and Rob Gougelet, MD, director of emergency preparedness, Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Green Lane Maritime Cargo Security Act. Deputy DHS Secretary Michael P. Jackson; Capt. Jeffrey W. Monroe, director, Department of Ports and Transportation, Portland, Maine; M. R. Dinsmore, CEO, Port of Seattle, Wash.; Andrew Howell, U.S. Chamber of Commerce; James P. Hoffa, general president, Teamsters Union. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Legislative Branch Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 appropriations for the Sergeant of Arms and the Capitol Police. William Pickle, sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, Senate; Wilson Livingood, chairman, Capitol Police Board and Capitol Guide Service; Alan Hantman, member, Capitol Police Board and Capitol Guide Service; Christopher McGaffin, acting chief, U.S. Capitol Police. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; FBI Director Robert Mueller; Karen Tandy, administrator, Drug Enforcement Administration; Carl J. Truscott, director, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; John Clark, director, U.S. Marshals Service. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Army Corps of Engineers. Assistant Army Secretary John Paul Woodley; Corps Commander Lt. Gen. Carl Strock. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Global Climate Change and Impacts Subcommittee. Hearing on the currenyt and future role of science in the Asia Pacific partnership. James L.

DOJ_NMG_0025207

Connaughton, Chairman, Council on Environmental Quality; David Montgomery, CRA International; Margo Thorning, American Council for Capitol Formation; David D. Doniger, Natural Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Public Lands and Forests Subcommittee. Hearing on the 2005 wildfire season and preparations for the 2006 season. Undersecretary of Agriculture Mark Rey; Tom Harbour, Forest Service; Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Nina Rose Hatfield. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ European Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on Islamist extremism in Europe. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on federal funds for museums. David Ucko, NSF; Edward Able Jr., American Association of Museums. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Closed. members only. Location: Room 219, Hart.

3 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on improving contractor incentives. Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Krieg; Comptroller General David Walker. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (13 bills): 1) H.R. 3127 - Darfur Peace and Accountability Act of 2006; 2) H.Con.Res. 320 - Calling on the Government of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam to immediately and unconditionally release Dr. Pham Hong Son and other political prisoners and prisoners of conscience, and other purposes; 3) H.Res. 578 - Concerning the Government of Romania's ban on intercountry adoptions and the welfare of orphaned or abandoned children in Romania; 4) H.Con.Res. 360 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the National Peace Officers' Memorial Service; 5) H.Con.Res. 371 - Honoring and congratulating the Minnesota National Guard, on its 150th anniversary, for its spirit of dedication and service to the State of Minnesota and the Nation and recognizing that the role of the National Guard, the Nation's citizen-soldier based militia, which was formed before the United States Army, has been and still is extremely important to the security and freedom of the Nation; 6) H.Con.Res. 370 - Expressing the sense of the Congress that Saudi Arabia should fully live up to its World Trade Organization commitments and end all aspects of any boycott on Israel; 7) H.Res. 737 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Financial Literacy Month, and for other purposes; 8) H.R. 4688 - Mayor John Thompson 'Tom' Garrison Memorial Post Office Designation Act; 9) H.R. 4561 - Francisco 'Pancho' Medrano Post Office Building Designation Act; 10) H.R. 4646 - Coach John Wooden Post Office Building Designation Act; 11) H.Res. 556 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that a National Methamphetamine Prevention Week should be established to increase awareness of methamphetamine and to educate the public on ways to help prevent the use of that damaging narcotic; 12) H.Con.Res. 366 - To congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration on the 25th anniversary of the first flight of the Space Transportation System, to honor Commander John Young and the Pilot Robert Crippen, who flew Space Shuttle Columbia on April 12-14, 1981, on its first orbital test flight, and to commend the men and women of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and all those supporting America's space program for their accomplishments and their role in inspiring the American people; 13) H.Res. 541 - Honoring Drs. Roy J. Glauber, John L. Hall, and Theodor W. Hansch for being awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics for 2005, and Drs. Yves Chauvin, Robert H. Grubbs, and Richard R. Schrock for being awarded the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for 2005, and for other purposes.

9 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Housing and Community Opportunity Subcommittee. Hearing on reforms in the Federal Housing Administration. Federal Housing Commissioner Brian Montrgomery; Stella Adams, Board Member, The National Community Reinvestment Coalition; Gerald M. Howard, Executive Vice President and CEO, National Association of Home Builders; Regina Lowrie, Chairwoman, Mortgage Bankers Association of America; A.W. Pickel, III, President and CEO, Leader One Financial Corporation. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

9:15 a.m. RESOURCES _ Forests and Forest Health Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

DOJ_NMG_0025208

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Commerce Department. Secretary Gutierrez. Location: Room H-309, Capitol.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Treasury Department. Secretary Snow. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations on energy supply and conservation. Undersecretary of Energy David Garman; Shane Johnson, acting director, Office of Nuclear Energy; Douglas Faulkner, acting assistant secretary of Energy; Jeffrey Jarrett, assistant secretary of Energy; Kevin Koleva, director, Electricity Delivery and Energy Reliability. Location: Room 2362B, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Environment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 National Park Service budget. NPS Director Fran Mainella; Deputy NPS Director Steve Martin; Comptroller Bruce Shaeffer. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on implementary of the 2005 base closings. Assistant Army Secretary Keith Eastin; Assistant Navy Secretary B.J. Penn; Assistant Air Force Secretary William Anderson. Location: Room H-143, Capitol.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on major defense acquisition initiatives. Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani, vice chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Undersecretary of Defense Tina Jonas; Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Krieg; Comptroller General David M. Walker, GAO. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Regulatory Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4975 - Lobbying Accountability and Transparency Act; H.R. 3509 - Workplace Goods Job Growth and Competitiveness Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on IRS enforcement and small businesses. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson; Thomas L. Sullivan, chief counsel, Office of Advocacy, SBA; Kevin Brown, commissioner, Small Business/Self-Employed Division, IRS; Nina Olson, national taxpayer advocate, IRS; John Satagaj, president and general counsel, Small Business Legislative Counsel; others. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

April 5 - 6. 10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 4200 - Forest Emergency Recovery and Research Act. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the U.S.-Oman Free Trade Agreement. Susan Schwab, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative, Office of the U.S. Trade Representative; Frances D. Cook, Chairman and Principal, The Ballard Group LLC, and former U.S. Ambassador to Oman; Nicholas E. Billotti, President and Chief Executive Officer, Turner Construction International LLC, Michael P. Weitzel, Program Manager, DynCorp International, and President, Muscat American Business Council, Muscat; Richard L. Trumka, Secretary-Treasurer, AFL-CIO. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

11 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Full Committee. Markup of H. Con. Res. 235 - Expressing the sense of the Congress that States should require candidates for driver's licenses to demonstrate an ability to exercise greatly increased caution when driving in the proximity of a potentially visually impaired individual; H. Con. Res. 349 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the Greater Washington Soap Box Derby; H. Con. Res. 359 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the District of Columbia Special Olympics Law Enforcement Torch Run; H. Con. Res. 372 - Recognizing the 50th Anniversary of the Interstate Highway System; H.R. 3858 - Pets Evacuation and Transportation Standards Act. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

12 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending resolution directing the Secretary of DHS turn over doucments on the Dubai Ports World deal. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

1 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the U.S.-India nuclear deal. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0025209

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on State Department's international organizations. Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg; UN Amb. John Bolton. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on implementatiuon of the 2006 Quadrennial Defense Review. Assistant Defense Secretary Peter Flory; James Tegnelia, U.S. Strategic Command. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness Subcommittee. Hearing on the impact of service contracting on military readiness. Assistant Army Secretary Claude Bolton Jr.; Air Force Lt. Gen. Donald Hoffman; Ronald Poussard, Air Force Program Executive officer, Combat Mission Support. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Domestic and International Monetary Policy, Trade and Technology Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank. Acting President James Lambright, James Morrison, President, Small Business Exporters Association of the U.S.; World Resources Institute Chairman James Harmon; Coalition for Employment Through Exports President Edmund Rice. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on the Improper Payments Information Act. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on water demand in the West. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

2 p.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee. Hearing on the Bureau of Reclamation's challenges. Assistant Interior Secretary Mark A. Limbaugh; John Keys III, commissioner, Bureau of Reclamation; Lloyd A. Duscha, National Research Council; attorney Bennett Raley; Dan Keppen, Family Farm Alliance; George Caan, Colorado River Commission of Nevada; Charles Dumars, Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District; Shannon McDaniel, South Columbia Basin Irrigation District; Robert Stackhouse, Central Valley Project Water Association; Richard Atwater; WateReuse Association. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

2:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4975 Lobbying Accountability and Transparency Act. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

3 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on Federal judiciary overview. Sixth Circuit Court Judge Julia Smith gibbons; Leonidas Mecham, Director, Administrative office of the U.S. Courts. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

3 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on enhancing public benefit programs. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Strategic Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on Department of Energys nuclear weapons complex infrastructure. Dr. David Overskei, Chairman, Secretary of Energy Advisory Board, Nuclear Weapons Complex Infrastructure Task Force; Peter Stockton, Project on Government Oversight; Tom DAgostino, Deputy Administrator, Defense Programs, National Nuclear Security Administration; Charles Anderson, Principle Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Environmental Management, Department of Energy. Location: Room 2237, Rayburn.

4 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Projection Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on Gary Powell, Acting Deputy Undersecretary of Defense, Office of the Secretary of Defense; Allison Stiller, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Ships, Department of the Navy; Vice Adm. Paul E. Sullivan, USN, Commander, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rear Adm. Charles S. Hamilton, II, USN, Program Executive Officer for Ships, Naval Sea Systems Command; Damien Bloor, Principal Consultant, First Marine International Limited. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

4 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Courts, Internet & Intellectual Property Subcommittee. Hearing on patent quality enhancement. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

5 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on defeating improvised explosive devices. Gen. Montgomery Meigs, Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defveat Organization. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

Other: PAKISTANI INTERIOR MINISTER AFTAB AHMAD KAHAN SHERPAO _ 9:30 a.m. Meets with the Pakistan-US Joint Working Group on Counter-Terrorism and Law Enforcement. State Department.

HISPANIC BUSINESSES _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce (USHCC) holds its 16th Annual Legislative Conference Immigration reform, telecommunications reform, and advancing federal procurement opportunities are among the key issues that will receive top billing at this years legislative conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. - 9 a.m. Plenary session on federal procurement. 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Telecommunications briefing with Congressman Xavier Becerra, Lonnie Taylor, Sprint/Nextel; Emilio Gonzalez, Verizon, others. 11:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. Legislative luncheon with keynote address by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. 1:30 p.m. - 5 p.m. Lobbying on Capitol Hill. 5:45 p.m. Legislative awards reception. Senator Robert Menendez will be honored. 7:15 p.m. Legislative Awards Dinner. Congressman Joe Baca to will receive the Presidents Achievement Award. Location: Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0025210

US-CANADA _ 8:15 a.m. - 2 p.m. The US Chamber of Commerce holds a US-Canadian business dialogue. Participants include US Ambassador to Canada David Wilkins, Canadian Amb. Michael Wilson, Canadian Chamber of Commerce President Nancy Hughes Anthony, Toronto Stock Exchange CEO Richard nesbitt, others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SHIPPING CONTAINERS-TERRORISM _ 8:30 a.m. - 5:30 p.m. GE Security has on display a 40-foot shipping container that it has outfitted with its CommerceGuard technology designed to thwart terrorists by securing the container from the inside, where it can't be tampered with or removed. Location: New Jersey Avenue and C Street SE, between Longworth and Cannon Buildings.

FRIST _ 8:30 a.m. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist speaks at a US Chamber of Commerce Policy Insiders event. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

JUMP$TART _ 9:30 a.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke an the Jump$tart Coalition for Financial Literacy hold a news conference to announce the group's 2006 survey results. Location: FRB offices, 20th and C Sts. NW.

DEMOCRATS-GOP BUDGET _ 10 a.m. The House Democratic leadership holds a news conference to discuss the Republican budget, which they say fails to provide real security. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside Room 345, Cannon House Office Building.

EVANGELICALS-IMMIGRATION _ 10 a.m. Evangelical leaders hold a news conference on the need for comprehensive immigration reform, with Rev. Mark Gonzales, Hispanic Coalition for Comprehensive Immigration Reform; Rev. Samuel Rodriguez, Jr., National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference; Sammy Mah, World Relief; Richard Cizik, National Association of Evangelicals. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., will participate. Location: Room S-207, Capitol.

GOP-SECURITY SPENDING _ 10 a.m. Speaker of the House J. Dennis Hastert and other mebers of the Republican leadership hold a press conference immediately following GOP Conference to discuss what they is their commitment to spending tax dollars wisely on national security. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

GOP-HEALTH CARE _ 11 a.m. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., holds a pen and pad briefing on what he feels are Senate Republican health care accomplishments. He also will preview the health care priorities for the second session. Location: Senate Press Gallery.

IRAQ _ 11 a.m. Members of Congress, led by Rep. Walter Jones, hold a news conference to announce their support of House Resolution 543 and call on colleagues to adopt the resolution, which would require a full and immediate debate on US policy in Iraq and provide up to 17 hours of deliberation on the House floor. Location: Room 122, Cannon.

PIG BOOK _ 11 a.m. Citizens Against Government Waste holds a news conference to release its 2006 Congressional Pig Book on pork barrel spending, with Sens. Tom Coburn, Jim DeMint, John McCain and Rep. Jeff Flake. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

DEMOCRATS-VETERANS _ 12:15 p.m. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean will join General Wesley Clark, former DNC Chairman Don Fowler and Kentucky Congressional candidate and retired Marine Corps Lt. Colonel Andrew Horne participate in a conference call announcing membership of new Democratic National Veterans and Military Families Council and unveiling ``Fighting Dems" website. Notes: To RSVP for the conference call and obtain the call-in number, contact Damien LaVera at laveraddnc.org or call (202) 863-8148.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 2 p.m. Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., and Gov. Bill Richardson, D-N.M., hold a conference call with members of the media on immigration reform legislation pending before the Senate. Contacts: Nadeam Elshami, 202-228-5643. Notes: Call-in: 202-228-2663 or 866-909-2663. Password: 2707649.

DOJ_NMG_0025211

IMMIGRATION-ECONOMY _ 2 p.m. The Immigration Policy Center and the Manhattan Institute hold a telephone press briefing on temporary immigrant workers, permanent workers, high-skill/low-skill visas, border security, and what it will mean for the U.S. economy and various economic sectors. Contacts: Nick Terzulli, 646-839-3342. Notes: Dial 800-289-0494 and ask for the Immigration Press Conference (Conf . 8674368). International callers: dial 1-913-981-5520.

PATRIOT ACT _ 3 p.m. Rep. Maxine Waters and the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation hold a forum on the Patriot Act. Participants include Caroline Fredrickson of the ACLU, Stephanie Jones of the Urban League, others. Location: Room 1539, Longworth.

CLEMENT _ 4:30 p.m. Solicitor General Paul Clement gives a lecture at Georgetown University. Location: Leavey Center Ballroom, Salon G, Georgetown University.

REID-UK DEFENSE _ 6 p.m. - 7 p.m. John Reid, Secretary of State for Defense, The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Location: The Washington Club, 15 Dupont Circle NW.

GLOBAL WARMING _ 7 p.m. Sens. John McCain and Joseph Lieberman, and Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. others, address global warming at the premier of an HBO documentary on the subject. Location: Amphitheater, Reagan Trade Building.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Begin Second Stage Of Sentencing Process ... 3
FBI Opposes Changes To Bank Transaction Reporting Requirement ... 3
Amnesty Report Claims Rendered Yemenis Likely Held In Europe ... 4
Trials Resume At Guantanamo ... 4
Pakistani Sentenced To Five Years For Missiles-To-Al Qaeda Plot ... 4
9/11 Mastermind Clashed With Bin Laden Over Plot Details ... 4
Bin Laden Half-Brother Contends With Police Suspicions ... 4
FBI Agent Testifies Earlier Hayat Interviews Spurred Leading Questions ... 4

Homeland Response:

Shays Says Nuclear Plant Security May Not Be Meeting "Very Realistic Threat." ... 5
Chertoff Says He Will Recommend X-Ray Technology Used At Hong Kong Ports ... 5
Federal Judge Crafts Deposition Compromise In 9/11 Suits ... 5
DHS Plans To Move Ahead With Pay System Changes ... 5
9/11 Movies Quickly Generate Controversy ... 5
NYC, New York State Urged To "Take Back The Towers." ... 6
Senate Appropriations Committee Votes To Add $8 Billion To Hurricane Request ... 6

War News:

Bush Urges Iraqi Leaders To Form Unity Government Quickly ... 7
Iraqi Vice President Calls For Al-Jaafari's Resignation ... 8
Rice Says US Will Not Establish Permanent Bases In Iraq ... 8
Sadr Spokesman Wants Timetable For US Withdrawal ... 8
Voters In 19 Wisconsin Towns Support Withdrawing US Troops From Iraq ... 8
Kerry Says US Should Set Deadline For Troop Withdrawal ... 8
Car Bomb Kills Ten Iraqis In Sadr City ... 9
Iraqi Prosecutors Unveil New Charges Against Saddam ... 9
Russian Oil Giant Hopes To Regain Iraqi Oil Field ... 9
First Cavalry Division Dedicates Memorial To Iraq Dead ... 9
Mother Mourns Loss Of Marine Son In Iraq ... 9
Iraq Wounded Have Transformed Walter Reed's Staff ... 9

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Witness Says Layoffs Were "Redeployments." ... 9
SEC Alleges Fraud In Case Of DC Charter Funds ... 10
Executive Says Rules In Section 404 Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law Should Be Narrowed ... 10

Criminal Law:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Committee DOJ Moving To Slowly On Pedophiles ... 11
DHS Deputy Press Secretary Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online 11
Federal Judge Revokes Mississippi Attorney's Bond In Judicial Bribery Case ... 12
Final Closing Statements Made At "Mafia Cops" Trial ... 12
Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Stolen Rembrandt ... 12
More Charges Possible In Hollywood Private Eye Scandal ... 13
Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer Waives Extradition, Returns To US ... 13
Tenet Case Judge Declares Second Mistrial ... 13
Chicago Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Ongoing Probe 13
Former Nevada Commissioner's Friend Testifies About Alleged Bribes ... 14
Alleged Philadelphia Ticket-Fixer Requests Jury Trial ... 14
FBI, Postal Inspectors Arrest Three For Alleged Credit-Counseling Fraud ... 14
New York Investor Found Murdered In Greenwich Mansion ... 14
Report Finds Fatal Abuse Of Children Increased In 2004 ... 14
Female Homicide Detectives In Maryland Profiled ... 14

Civil Law:

GAO Report Finds Agencies Lax In Protecting Privacy Rights ... 15
FDA Accuses Anthrax Vaccine Maker Of Exaggerated Claims ... 15

Civil Rights:

DOJ To Probe Baton Rouge Police Shooting Death ... 15
Tennessee Police Sergeants To Face Trial Again On Civil Rights Charges ... 15
Report Critical Of BOP Response To Inmates' Chemical Concerns ... 15
9th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In Gay Marriage Case ... 16
Texas Couple Wins Judgment Against Housing Authority ... 16
Alabama Legislature Nears Approval Of Bill To Delay Runoff Elections ... 16

WPost Says Early Voting Bill Taints Maryland Elections..... 17

Antitrust:

Analyst Sees Potential Problems For AT&T-BellSouth Merger... 17
EU Urges Governments To Open Gas Markets..... 17
Fed Clears Citigroup For Future Large Acquisitions..... 18
Arcelor Blocks Mittal Takeover By Transferring Dofasco Unit..... 18
Blockbuster Sued By Netflix For Web Expansion..... 18
EU Raids Color Line Ferry Company Headquarters 18

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Controversial EPA Air-Quality Draft May Color Wehrum Confirmation Hearing..... 19
Plan To Expand Yucca Mountain Nuclear Dump Draws Fire..... 19
Lawsuit Challenges DOE On West Valley Demonstration Project Cleanup..... 19
AK Steel Settles Toxin Contamination Claims With US, Ohio..... 19
Former Tribal Casino Workers Seek Venue For Sexual Harassment Lawsuits 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Police Officers, Others Accused In $10 Million Cocaine-Smuggling Plot 20
DEA Investigates California Humane Society..... 20
Reporting Continues On Harden Case 20
Marijuana Dispensary Moratorium Extended By California Council 20
Major New York State Drug Ring Smashed 21
Selig Defends Handling Of Baseball's Steroid Investigation 21
Alleged Minnesota Courthouse Bombing Plot Uncovered..... 21

Immigration:

Bush Under Pressure To Intervene In Stalled Senate Immigration Debate 21

Tax:

California Anti-Tax Activist Sentenced..... 24
GAO Finds Widespread Errors By Tax Preparers..... 24
Richest Americans Said To Be Reaping Windfall From Investment Tax Cuts..... 25

Congress-Administration:

Bush Comments Fuel Speculation Snow Resignation Imminent 26
Justice Kennedy Decries Congressional Effort To Force High Court Cameras 26
Spellings Defends No Child Left Behind Act..... 27
Senators Will No Longer Block Highway Nominee..... 27
Boehner Says Budget Should Get To Floor This Week 27
Both Parties Jostle For Advantage As DeLay Announces Resignation 27
Backed By Boehner, Ney Says He Won't Resign From Congress..... 31
Democrats Seek Distance From McKinney As Controversy Continues..... 32
GAO Criticizes Funding For Abstinence As Part Of AIDS Fight.. 32
First Lady Emphasizes Homeland Defense During St. Louis Visit33
House To Take Up Lobbying Reforms Today 33
Senate Democrats Believe Prevention Act Will Strengthen Party's Position On Abortion..... 33
Democrats Seen As Showing Unity While GOP Appears Divided34
Biden Asks IG To Probe State Department Screening 34
Bush Daughters Run In Richmond 10K Under Fake Names 34
Santorum Makes Case For Anti-Poverty Agenda..... 34

Other News:

Shareholders Push For More Disclosure Of Corporate Political Donations..... 34
Morris Says Clinton Has Opened Herself To Challenge From Left 34
Massachusetts To Require Residents To Carry Health Insurance 35
Rumsfeld, Powell Eulogize Weinberger..... 35
Boy Scouts Plan $17 Million Camp In Virginia..... 35
Couric To Announce Plans To Leave "Today" This Morning 35
Academic Paper On Pro-Israel Lobby Dismissed As "Bigotry." .. 36
Iran Open To Limited Negotiations On Enrichment..... 36
Israeli Missile Strike Hits Base In Abbas Compound..... 37
Rice Could Face Skeptical Reception As She Presents US-India Nuclear Deal To Congress 37
US-Russian Relationship Increasingly Testy..... 38
Hughes To Lead US Delegation To Benin..... 38
DHS Near Agreement With China On Illegal Immigrants..... 38
Tokyo Conference Could Stimulate Stalled North Korea Talks... 38
Syrian Regime Cracks Down On Domestic Critics..... 38
Muslim Scholars Exempt One Danish Firm From Boycott 38
Pakistan Pressures Foreign Students To Leave Madrassahs 39
Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run For Office For First Time 39
Thai Premier Says He Will Step Aside 39
Sri Lankan Candidate Vows To Reform UN 39
De Villepin Defies Renewed Demonstrations Over Labor Law ... 39
Former British Spy Killed In Northern Ireland 39
NYTimes Column Comments On Rice-Straw Trip's Gender Issues..... 39
NYTimes Editorial Criticizes Arroyo 39

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 39

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 40

DOJ_NMG_0025214

TERRORISM NEWS:

Moussaoui Prosecutors Begin Second Stage Of Sentencing Process. The New York Times (4/5, Lewis) reports, "When the jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial take their seats again on Thursday, they will begin a vastly different proceeding than the one they concluded on Monday with the verdict that he was responsible for some of the deaths of Sept. 11, 2001, and is thus eligible for execution." The Times continues, "At the end of this next phase, which may take several weeks, they will be confronted with a verdict form that will be without the subtleties and complex questions of the first phase and instead will ask them to make a more mechanical calculation. … The form will ask them to decide which carries more weight: mitigating factors like Mr. Moussaoui's troubled mental state, or aggravating factors surrounding the deaths of nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11." The Times adds, "The Justice Department has asked the judge to list 26 aggravating factors on the form, including the deaths of hundreds of firefighters and police officers; the grief brought to the victims' families and friends; the disruption to New York City, including the closing of parks, playgrounds and schools and the displacement of businesses; and the destruction of parts of the Pentagon. … Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers are expected to offer two main factors in mitigation: that he is mentally unbalanced and that he is seeking martyrdom. … In the eyes of several death penalty experts and lawyers, there is little doubt as to which way the scale will tilt, no matter what the final verdict form looks like. If the nine men and three women on the jury find that the aggravating factors are greater, they will turn to the simple checkoff on the form, marking whether they believe that Mr. Moussaoui should be jailed for life or executed. The death penalty would mean lethal injection at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind."

The AP (4/5, Sniffen) reports, "Thanks largely to Zacarias Moussaoui himself, prosecutors have cleared their highest hurdle that might deter execution of the al-Qaida conspirator. The path to the death chamber might still contain unpleasant surprises for the government." The AP continues, "When the case began more than four years ago, it looked easier. The government at first thought Moussaoui had been intended to be a 20th hijacker on Sept. 11, 2001. Once it became clear that wasn't his role, the government dialed back its case. … It didn't want to drop the death penalty for the high-profile prisoner who admitted having been trained to fly a plane in an attack similar to Sept. 11. The biggest problem was that Moussaoui was in jail on 9/11 and had been for almost a month." The AP adds, "The final government theory bore some resemblance to a pretzel: Moussaoui was directly responsible for deaths on 9/11 because he hadn't confessed all he knew when arrested. Thus, the contention was, the FBI was prevented from moving to block some or all of the four hijackings that day. … Another twist was added when many of the government witnesses for the prosecution gave as much or more comfort to the defense: They acknowledged misstep after misstep in handling leads about Moussaoui and other terrorists in the summer of 2001, raising doubts about what if anything Moussaoui could have said to change things. … Then Moussaoui took the stand over the objections of the court-appointed defense lawyers. He abandoned claims he'd made for three years that his plot to fly a 747 into the White House was unrelated to 9/11. For the first time, he said he had been training to hijack a fifth jetliner on 9/11 and fly it into the White House. … 'This stage of the penalty phase was probably harder for the government, but that was before he took the stand and connected all the dots for the jury,' said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group that advocates more equitable administration of the death statute." Under the headline "Jurors Will Relive 9/11 In Life-Or-Death Case," The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Serrano, 958K) also report on the prosecution's plan to introduce testimony from victims' family members

Analysts Differ On Whether Execution Equals Martyrdom For Moussaoui. The Washington Post (4/5, A9, Markon, 744K) reports Zacarias Moussaoui's "own words have raised questions about whether he wants to be executed to achieve martyrdom for the terrorist cause that he so passionately embraces. Experts on al-Qaeda and Islam think he does. Moussaoui's flip-flops on the subject make it impossible to be sure." Additionally, legal analysts differ on whether his execution would make him a martyr among Muslim extremists. Rand researcher Bruce Hoffman believes it would, while author Peter Bergen does not, noting that "Even al-Qaeda cut this guy loose."

FBI Opposes Changes To Bank Transaction Reporting Requirement. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports, "U.S. law-enforcement agencies are opposing efforts by the financial-services industry to cut back a federal requirement that banks report cash transactions in excess of $10,000." Testifying yesterday before the Senate Banking Committee, FBI Terrorist Financing Operations Section Counterterrorism Section Chief Michael Morehart said, "To dramatically alter currency transaction reporting requirements -- without careful, independent study -- could be devastating and a significant setback to investigative and intelligence efforts." The Journal notes, "Such viewpoints may sway committee members who seem to want to tread lightly when considering whether to modify bank reporting requirements." Sen. Paul Sarbanes "said law-enforcement officials 'laid out a strong rationale for the utility of the reports. We've got to strike a balance.'"

DOJ_NMG_0025215

Amnesty Report Claims Rendered Yemenis Likely Held In Europe. The Financial Times (4/5, Dombey, Sevastopulo) reports, "Three Yemeni men abducted and mistreated by the US were probably held in eastern Europe, Amnesty International said in a new report." The report, "based on interviews with the former captives, is intended to cast light on Washington's practice of 'rendition'," and it "adds that after being arrested and transferred to US custody in 2003, the men were brought back to Yemen in 2005 and released in February this year. Although all were sentenced for forgery in connection with false travel documents, none was charged with any terrorism-related offences."

Trials Resume At Guantanamo. The Wall Street Journal reports (4/5, Bravin) that "the Bush administration resumed military proceedings against suspected terrorists here." The Journal reports that "the chief military prosecutor [criticized] Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer" for speculating last week on "whether current counterterrorism operations gave rise to nearly unlimited presidential war powers."

Pakistani Sentenced To Five Years For Missiles-To-Al Qaeda Plot. AFP (4/5) reports, "A Pakistani who plotted to peddle heroin and hashish to buy Stinger anti-aircraft missiles for Al-Qaeda or the Taliban has been jailed for nearly five years, US prosecutors said." AFP continues, "Muhammed Abid Afridi, who pleaded guilty in March 2004 to conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish, was sentenced Monday in the California city of San Diego. … US District Judge James Lorenz sentenced Afridi to 57 months behind bars, followed by five years of supervised release, for taking part in the conspiracy along with two other men. … Co-conspirators Ilyas Ali and Syed Mustajab Shah, who pleaded guilty to the same charges, are scheduled to be sentenced next Monday and on June 19, respectively." AFP adds, "The trio of conspirators travelled from the Pakistani city of Karachi to Hong Kong on September 15, 2002 to meet with US undercover officers to negotiate for the sale of large quantities of drugs, the indictment showed. … The next day, the defendants agreed that they could offset the purchase price of five tonnes of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin against the cost of four Stinger shoulder-launched missiles, according to prosecutors."

9/11 Mastermind Clashed With Bin Laden Over Plot Details. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Meyer, 958K) reports that to "hear Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed tell it, Osama bin Laden was a meddling boss whose indiscretion and poor judgment threatened to derail the terrorist attacks." Bin Laden also "saddled Mohammed with at least four would-be hijackers who the ringleader thought were ill-equipped for the job. And he carelessly dropped hints about the imminent attacks, violating Mohammed's cardinal rule against discussing the suicide hijacking plot." The "repeated conflicts between the two Al Qaeda leaders emerged last week during the penalty phase of the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui." Jurors heard "new details of the plot from the interrogation summaries of several captured Al Qaeda officials, including an extraordinary account of a series of interrogations of Mohammed."

Bin Laden Half-Brother Contends With Police Suspicions. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) reports that Swiss businessman Yeslam Bin Laden is being sued for alleged "hidden financial connections" to his half-brother Osama. Yeslam "says he barely knows Osama," but his ex-wife has joined forces with 9/11 victims' survivors and charges in a court filing that "his complex finances, also a focus of police investigators in several countries, support suspicions that the half-brothers have had financial ties."

FBI Agent Testifies Earlier Hayat Interviews Spurred Leading Questions. The Sacramento Bee (4/5, Walsh, 301K) reports FBI Special Agent Gary Schaaf "agreed Tuesday in federal court testimony that he asked leading questions during a videotaped confession of Hamid Hayat," but Schaff "testified that, immediately before he interviewed Hayat…he had been in an adjacent room observing the questioning of Hayat by another agent. That prior interview, which was not recorded, gave him ideas on areas to pursue with Hayat, Schaaf said. In addition, the agent testified, he was familiar with the contents of many hours of secretly recorded conversations in 2002 and 2003 between Hayat and Naseem Khan, a former fast-food and mini mart worker operating undercover for the FBI.

Relief Worker Testifies Alleged Terror Camp Is Pakistani Military Post. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/5, Bohm) reports that in additional testimony yesterday, DC-based disaster relief worker James Lazor testified for the defense that he "was on an independent humanitarian mission to earthquake victims in Pakistan when Hayat's defense team asked him to visit the camp" which the prosecution alleges Hayat attended to receive terror training. "When he arrived there Feb. 17…he was turned away by a uniformed man who identified himself as a sergeant in the Pakistani military. … 'He said it was a military camp that wasn't open to the public and that the whole ridge was controlled by the military,'" Lazor testified. KXTV-TV Sacramento (/44, Hedlund) also reports on Lazor's and Schaaf's testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0025216

FBI Informant Finds Previously-Undisclosed Surveillance Tape. The Lodi News-Sentinel (4/5, Bohm) also reports it was revealed at court yesterday that FBI informant Naseem Khan "has suddenly found another tape that was never given to investigators or attorneys." The recording of a "telephone conversation is about 20 minutes long and was marked Oct. 13, 2002, about two months after Khan met Hamid Hayat." Umer Hayat defense attorney Johnny Griffin "said in court that he wants to know why Khan didn't give the tape to the FBI more than three years ago," and Hamid Hayat lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi "said outside court that it bolsters the defense claim. 'That just puts a lot of things into question,' she said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Shays Says Nuclear Plant Security May Not Be Meeting "Very Realistic Threat." The New York Times (4/5, Wald, 1.19M) reports on a House subcommittee hearing on nuclear power plant security, in which witnesses clashed over "who was responsible for defending nuclear power plants against terrorist attack, and whether the combination of private guard forces and police agencies was adequate." Rep. Christopher Shays said that he believed security requirements had been eased "because we've made a decision that it's not practical to meet what may in fact be a very realistic threat." Meanwhile, a GAO report released at the hearing said the Nuclear Regulatory Commission "had created the appearance of a government agency submitting to industry pressure," though members of the commission testified that that was not the case.

Chertoff Says He Will Recommend X-Ray Technology Used At Hong Kong Ports. The AP (4/4, McDonald) reported that Secretary Chertoff said Tuesday that the US and China were "close to reaching an agreement" that would allow for the repatriation of up to 39,000 illegal Chinese immigrants in the US. He "also said he would recommend implementing new X-ray technology to screen US-bound cargos at foreign ports after seeing a successful pilot program in Hong Kong." Chertoff said he was "going to suggest that we get to the stage of implementing some kind of proposal to put into effect a combination of this X-ray technology and this radiation technology at the ports of embarkation."

Federal Judge Crafts Deposition Compromise In 9/11 Suits. The New York Law Journal (4/5, Hamblett) reports, "Frustrated by the government's approach to protecting sensitive security information, a federal judge has crafted a compromise so depositions can proceed in earnest in the litigation against airlines and airports over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein said he had to intervene "to avoid further and unnecessary delay in the progress of these cases and relieve counsel of the inherent conflicts and artificial roles" that the position of the Transportation Security Administration has created for plaintiffs lawyers." The Journal adds, "The judge's ruling in In Re September 11 Litigation, 21 MC 97 and 21 MC 101, concerned the refusal of the Transportation Security Administration to attend depositions of the airline defendants in the litigation -- and require that defense lawyers be charged with safeguarding the security information. … The TSA intervened in the cases, which involve family members of Sept. 11 victims who opted to proceed to court instead of applying to the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund. … The transportation administration intervened to protect what is called Sensitive Security Information -- information about security plans and procedures of the airports and airline industry."

DHS Plans To Move Ahead With Pay System Changes. The Washington Post (4/5, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Department of Homeland Security is moving ahead with its plan to change how it evaluates and pays employees, even as it tries to fend off unions in court. The pay changes and the court case are separate issues, but the union litigation has altered the department's timetable and injected some uncertainty into how far Homeland Security can go in changing some key workplace rules. … The litigation is scheduled to resume tomorrow, when the unions, led by the National Treasury Employees Union, and the government make oral arguments before a federal appeals court. … Although the unions have focused their legal efforts on stopping the department's new work rules, they also are wary of the new pay system, contending that the government has a poor track record in creating performance-based management systems that are viewed as fair and credible by workers."

9/11 Movies Quickly Generate Controversy. The release of the first movies documenting the events of September 11, 2001 has touched a raw nerve with many. The trailer for one movie, "United 93," has been pulled from some theatres after complaints. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 7, 2:45, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Many audience members have been shocked by seeing a trailer advertising a movie called 'United 93,' playing, now, as a preview in theaters. Which raises the question -- is it appropriate to make a movie about a national tragedy? And if not now, when?" ABC (Snow) added, "After complaints, this theater in New York City pulled the trailer. But Universal Studios, the distributor, stands by the film. The studio has been working with the families of all 40 people on flight 93."

DOJ_NMG_0025217

NYC, New York State Urged To "Take Back The Towers." In an op-ed in the New York Times (4/5, Smith, 1.19M), ex-firefighter and financier Dennis Smith says that, given the feuding over the World Trade Center site, City Hall and Albany need to invoke "the eminent domain clause." He calls Mayor Bloomberg "the natural choice to become chief engineer and contractor of a smaller, smarter, more appropriate ground zero."

Senate Appropriations Committee Votes To Add $8 Billion To Hurricane Request. The New York Times (4/5, Eaton, 1.19M) reports the Senate Appropriations Committee voted yesterday to add about $8 billion in hurricane aid to President Bush's $19 billion request, meaning "that Louisiana will most likely retain all of the $4.2 billion that the House approved for home rebuilding." Meanwhile, Sen. Thad Cochran "added considerable aid for his state," including "$700 million to relocate a privately owned freight rail line in Mississippi, $1.2 billion for a pilot program favored by Mississippi's governor to replace trailers with cottages and $1 billion in block grants that are likely to go to Mississippi and Texas." However, "some senators are pledging to fight the ballooning supplemental appropriation, which they say should be used for emergency spending only."

Landrieu Threatens To Hold Bush Nominations Over Levee Funding. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 4, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu has "vowed to hold up all of President Bush's executive branch nominations unless he asks Congress for all the money needed to rebuild the New Orleans levees. The government said last week the job could cost $6 billion, twice the amount that has already been appropriated."

The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 3, 0:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Sen. Landrieu "warned President Bush today she means business about getting Katrina recovery money for her state." Landrieu "also wants a 30-year commitment of $2 billion a year for Gulf Coast recovery."

The Hill (4/5, Allen) reports that in a letter sent to Bush yesterday, Landrieu wrote, "Mr. President the piecemeal approach that has marked your administration's response to providing adequate levee and flood protection for Louisiana has not worked. It needs to be replaced by a comprehensive approach that is both more effective and cost-efficient." Landrieu "hinted that she has other arrows in her quiver but did not specify what other means she might have to put pressure on the president or the GOP-led Senate."

CNN's The Situation (4/4, Blitzer) reported that Sen. Mary Landrieu said on the Senate floor "that she is going to block all of the president's appointments unless he moves quickly, expeditiously, to provide billions of dollars for Hurricane Katrina relief in Louisiana and to improve the levee system." CNN added, "No word yet from the White House on this threat from Mary Landrieu to hold up all, all presidential nominations, all presidential appointments until she gets what she wants as far as Hurricane Katrina relief is concerned."

Flood Maps Seen As Important Factor In Deciding Whether To Return To Louisiana. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Jonsson, 61K) reports that for most residents of Plaquemines Parish, "the decision of whether to return is becoming more complex." With the cost to make the state's levees able to withstand "Katrina-size storms" at $9 billion, flood plain maps have become "a key to the recovery riddle, since they will guide rebuilding and factor in developers' calculations. … The Army Corps of Engineers completed its first repairs on the Plaquemines levees on March 17, bringing them up to their original height and bolstering them with sturdier clays. But a harsh prospect overshadowed its restoration. 'Another Katrina would overtop this levee,' said Army Corps of Engineers Col. Lewis Setliff during a press conference near the Empire Lock in Nairn, La."

FEMA Says Trailer Park That Prompted Suspension Was Approved Months Ago. In an article that seems to find fault with Mayor C. Ray Nagin's decision to suspend construction of FEMA trailer parks in New Orleans, the New York Times (4/5, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports that with New Orleans' mayoral election less that three weeks away, "the sympathy of elected officials for the irritations of voters in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is boundless. As a result, there will be no trailer park in Lakewood Estates, a collection of solid, spacious homes behind a high locked gate in the Algiers section." FEMA "was already well along" in constructing the site, "but fortunately for the residents of Lakewood Estates, campaign season is also well along." Mayor C. Ray Nagin said that the construction of the site, and, "for the moment, all other trailer sites in the city," was suspended. FEMA, meanwhile, "said it was puzzled, especially since the Algiers trailer site had been approved by the mayor months ago, said Darryl Madden, an agency spokesman."

NYTimes Says Difficulty Finding Brown Replacement Shows Major Reforms Needed At FEMA. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) editorializes that top candidates to replace Michael Brown as director of FEMA are sending the administration the message that no one wants "to take over as captain of a ship that's already sinking." Though "high-profile positions like that are sought after, even fought over," the Times writes that "no one seems to want to take over the rudderless agency after the mess that followed Hurricane Katrina." The Times states that "President Bush needs to set a clear agenda for reform and make tangible commitments on the agency's future role." Also, naming acting director David Paulison as the permanent chief, "would create the impression that this crucial government function was being handed over to the only person willing to take it on."

DOJ_NMG_0025218

64% Chance Of Major Hurricane Predicted For East Coast. USA Today (4/5, O'Driscoll, 2.31M) reports the Tropical Meteorology Project at Colorado State University predicted Tuesday that the 2006 "hurricane season is likely to be very active, though not as bad as last year's record-shattering barrage on the Gulf Coast." Meanwhile, the team's "'landfall probability' outlook sees a 64% chance that a major hurricane — Category 3 or higher… — will hit" the East Coast. "The central Gulf Coast…rates a 30% likelihood for a major hurricane."

Insurers See Record Profits. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Gosselin, 958K) reports, "The companies that provide Americans with their homeowners and auto insurance made a record $44.8-billion profit last year even after accounting for the claims of policyholders wiped out by Hurricane Katrina and the other big storms of 2005, according to the firms' filings with state regulators." Executives said the profit was "a fluke," and "said that even with the increase, insurers face deep problems that can be fixed only by substantial premium hikes, a scaling back of commitments by several firms to the most disaster-prone portions of the country and, according to some, a greatly expanded role for the state and federal governments in insuring individuals against the largest of catastrophes."

International Red Cross Officials Criticize US Organization's Katrina Response. The New York Times (4/5, Strom, 1.19M) reports that international Red Cross officials that aided their American counterparts during the response to Hurricane Katrina have filed "unusually harsh reports" detailing "mismatches between the needs of victims and the supplies the Red Cross had arranged, the absence of a plan to guide the distribution of supplies and a lack of record-keeping, which allowed inventory to go astray." The Times adds that they "closely echo concerns raised by volunteers in the disaster area."

The Washington Post (4/5, A14, Salmon, 744K) reports, "The reports continue the drumbeat of criticism of the charity, which has escalated in the months since hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents flocked to Red Cross shelters and relief trucks after Katrina struck." The reports, prepared in September by the British Red Cross and the International Committee of the Red Cross in September, were not released by the American Red Cross "until yesterday, after The Washington Post asked the British Red Cross for a copy."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Urges Iraqi Leaders To Form Unity Government Quickly. President Bush yesterday urged Iraqi leaders to move quickly to form a unity government. The AP (4/4, Sidoti) reported that Bush called on the leaders to "stand up and do their job," noting that the formation of a new government "would give Iraqis confidence in their future." Bush made his statement "during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House."

Administration Scales Back Funding For Organizations Promoting Democracy In Iraq. The Bush Administration has been scaling back funding for the organizations attempting to carry out the President's vision in Iraq. A front page story in the Washington Post (4/5 A1, Baker, 744K) reports, "The administration has included limited new money for traditional democracy promotion in budget requests to Congress. … The shift in funding priorities comes as security costs are eating up an enormous share of U.S. funds for Iraq and the administration has already ratcheted back ambitions for reconstructing the country's battered infrastructure. While acknowledging that they are investing less in party-building and other such activities, administration officials argue that bringing more order and helping Iraqis run effective ministries contribute to democracy as well."

US Seen As Pressuring Iraq For Political Action While Encouraging Sovereignty. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the US strongest influence in Iraq may be "the simple fear of what would happen if the US up and left." The US is showing signs of "growing increasingly impatient with Iraqi leaders over their inability to name a new government," does not want "to look as if it is determining Iraq's future. The result is a delicate balancing act: It's applying pressure for political action even while encouraging a sovereign Iraq that appears to stand on its own two feet." The US is "operating with the knowledge that too much pressure could have the negative result of prolonging the leadership stalemate among politicians who are sensitive about foreign influences in Iraq."

Ignatius Says US Should Not Pull Plug Prematurely On Iraq Talks. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K), "Americans are getting impatient about the formation of a new Iraqi government. That's what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told political leaders in Baghdad this week, and she was putting it mildly. But it would be folly if American impatience torpedoed the slow but real progress Iraqi leaders are making toward a government that could step back from the brink of civil war. The "X-factor in this delicate game is U.S. political support. Khalilzad could fail in his effort to midwife a unity government, and Iraq could spiral into full-blown civil war. But it would be crazy for an impatient America to talk itself into defeat and pull the plug prematurely."

DOJ_NMG_0025219

Iraqi Vice President Calls For Al-Jaafari's Resignation. Iraqi Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi yesterday called for the resignation of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. The AP (4/5, Reid) reports that Abdul-Mahdi's comments make him "the most senior Shiite official publicly to endorse demands for a leadership change to halt the slide toward civil war." Abdul-Mahdi said he met with al-Jaafari on Monday "and urged him to give up the nomination for a second term because he had lost the confidence of the Sunnis and Kurds. But Abdul-Mahdi said al-Jaafari refused, insisting he wanted to take his case to parliament, which must approve the new prime minister and his Cabinet by a majority vote."

Rice Says US Will Not Establish Permanent Bases In Iraq. The AP (4/5, Sidoti) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday "brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq. 'The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that,' Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel. 'I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to.' ... However, Rice did not say when all US forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman, D-NJ, when he asked, 'Will the bases be permanent or not?'" Instead, Rice responded, "I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days."

WSJournal Criticizes Rice's Iraq Trip. In a critical editorial entitled, "Condi's Iraq Stumble," the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) blasts Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's recent trip to Iraq, saying, "Try as we might, we can't see what good purpose was served by Condoleezza Rice and Jack Straw's lobbying in Baghdad earlier this week. If the American Secretary of State and British Foreign Secretary were aiming to be diplomatic, they failed. That's because with both words and gestures the two publicly took sides in a contentious dispute over forming Iraq's government." Rice "is surely right that the US sacrifice for Iraqi freedom has earned us the right to speak up. But except where US interests are clearly threatened, pressure is best applied behind closed doors by the seasoned US Ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, not the unsubtle endorsement of candidates by overnighting officials."

Sadr Spokesman Wants Timetable For US Withdrawal. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 7, 3:15, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "When you enter the vast Shiite slum of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, your life is in the hands of one of the most formidable militias in the capital, the Mahdi army." In an interview, Sheikh Abdel Hadi al-Daraji, "who speaks for their leader, rebel Shiite cleric Moqtada Al-Sadr…blamed America for trying to create civil war in Iraq, saying, 'I tell President Bush that the freedom you want is the freedom of blood.' His armed guards agreed, and although they wouldn't talk on camera, made it clear they want American forces to leave Iraq." The militia's "political leaders are publicly at least calling for restraint. 'American forces leaving Iraq immediately might not make any sense, so what we want is a timetable,' the sheik told us. 'Everything depends on setting a timetable for American withdrawal.'" A "wave of sectarian killings here is being blamed on the various militias, and with more tortured bodies turning up every day, the US Ambassador has called on Iraq's leaders to act against them." Zalmay Khalilzad, US Ambassador to Iraq: "It's time that the government, with the help of the international community, deals with the militia issues by decommissioning, demobilizing and re-integrating them."

Voters In 19 Wisconsin Towns Support Withdrawing US Troops From Iraq. USA Today (4/5, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Voters in 32 Wisconsin communities went to the polls Tuesday to decide referendums calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. By late Tuesday night, ballots had been counted in 25 towns and cities. The measures passed in 19 of them, including Madison, and were defeated in six." USA Today adds, "Organizers hope the outcome in Wisconsin will encourage people in other states to put similar referendums on November ballots and prompt members of Congress to put pressure on the Bush administration to bring troops home. … A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month found that 54% of Americans want U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq now or within a year, and 60% said it wasn't worth it to go to war in Iraq." The Washington Post (4/5, A7, Kydersen, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Majority Of 32 Wisconsin Towns Vote For Iraq Pullout."

Kerry Says US Should Set Deadline For Troop Withdrawal. Sen. John Kerry writes in the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M), "For three years now, the administration has told us that terrible things will happen if we get tough with the Iraqis. In fact, terrible things are happening now because we haven't gotten tough enough." Kerry notes, "Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines -- a deadline to transfer authority to a provisional government, and a deadline to hold three elections. Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet. Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet."

DOJ_NMG_0025220

Car Bomb Kills Ten Iraqis In Sadr City. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 7, 3:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Ten Iraqis were killed by a car bomb in Sadr City, a Shiite district of Baghdad."

Iraqi Prosecutors Unveil New Charges Against Saddam. Iraqi prosecutors yesterday unveiled new charges against former dictator Saddam Hussein, this time seeking to hold him to account for the slaughter of possibly 100,000 Kurds and the use of chemical weapons during the 1980s. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Raman) reported "prosecutors allege it was a campaign meant to systematically destroy the Kurdish people of Iraq. Conservative estimates say that well over 100,000 Kurds were killed in the course of that campaign."

The story was briefly reported by each of the networks. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 5, :20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Six former aides were also charged, including one of his cousins, the man known as Chemical Ali, for allegedly directing deadly gas attacks." The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 6, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Saddam is still on trial on other mass murder charges." NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 6, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The special Iraqi court that is trying him announced today it has charged him with trying to wipe out the Kurds with a military campaign that killed at least 50,000 civilians back in 1988."

The New York Times (4/5, Wong, 1.19M), Los Angeles Times (4/5, Moore, 958K), Washington Times/AP (4/5, Yacoub) and Washington Post (4/5, A18, Finer, Nouri, 744K) run similar reports. The AP (4/5, Deutsch) reports Michael Scharf, director of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, "said the genocide case against Saddam won't be easy to prove 'despite the large number of Kurdish victims (reportedly more than 100,000).'" Scharf "said a number of issues could undermine the case including the sparing of Kurdish villagers, the killing of non-Kurds and potentially legitimate military goals and economic aims."

Russian Oil Giant Hopes To Regain Iraqi Oil Field. The Washington Times (4/5, Mihailescu, 90K) reports that the Russian firm Lukoil views the "formation of a new Iraqi government as an opportunity to deal itself back into that country's huge West Qurna oil field." Lukoil lost its Qurna contract "in December 2002 as coalition forces were building up for the 2003 invasion."

First Cavalry Division Dedicates Memorial To Iraq Dead. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 11, 2:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the 1st Cavalry Division "is deployed in Iraq and went there more than two years ago. Since then, this division has suffered more than most. 168 soldiers lost. Today, at their home base in Ft. Hood, Texas, they dedicated a memorial." ABC (Hayes) added, "This memorial was built, fashioned after the Vietnam Memorial, with names etched in granite." It was "designed with blank slates, room for names that may still be etched here before the war is over."

Mother Mourns Loss Of Marine Son In Iraq. The Washington Post (4/4, A21, 744K) reports Danielette James, a federal custodian who cleans congressional offices five nights a week, learned over the weekend that that her son, Eric McIntire, "had been killed by a roadside bomb near Baghdad." McIntire "was traveling in a Humvee with other members of his platoon on Sunday when a bomb exploded, killing him and several other men, James said." James "last saw her son at Christmas. She last talked to him a few days before he returned to Iraq in early March. Before, he had wanted to go to Iraq because all of his friends were there, James said. This time he was reluctant, she said.'

Iraq Wounded Have Transformed Walter Reed's Staff. A front page story in the Washington Post (4/5, A1, Levine, 744K) reports that the Iraq war "remains ubiquitous in the operating rooms" of Walter Reed Medical Center. The Post adds, "So many have arrived in the past three years -- so many continue to arrive -- that they have transformed the hospital's routine. The staff has been redeployed, programs created, a special military company activated just for the injured. … But the cumulative effect of nearly 4,900 patients, including 1,458 battle casualties, has done more than change the institution. It has deeply affected the hundreds of doctors, nurses and therapists who work there -- who have been inspired by the resiliency and motivation of the individuals in their care, yet shaken and exhausted by the magnitude of loss."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Says Layoffs Were "Redeployments." The AP (4/5, Graczyk) reports, "A former Enron Corp. human resources supervisor testified Tuesday that people who moved from its struggling broadband venture were given opportunities to shift assignments, disputing earlier testimony that they were laid off." The AP continues, "Sarah Davis, testifying for a second day at the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay, said the March 2001 cuts at Enron Broadband Services were 'redeployments' and not layoffs. … Kenneth Rice, who ran Enron's money-losing broadband venture, testified in February that Skilling told him to characterize layoffs at the unit in early 2001 as redeployment so some 250 employees would believe they would keep their jobs and Wall Street analysts who influenced the company's stock would remain bullish on the weakening venture." The AP adds, "Asked by Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher if Rice or anyone else at Enron told her the cutbacks were 'a ruse to lay people off' or 'some sort of disguised layoffs,' Davis replied: 'No. It was redeployment.' … But under cross-examination, she said it wasn't part of her duties to keep up with the business reasons for any redeployments or layoffs."

DOJ_NMG_0025221

Witness Testifies Skilling Did Not Favor Partnership. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, McWilliams) reports, "A former Enron Corp. executive testified that former President Jeffrey Skilling insisted that a controversial partnership run by the company's chief financial officer be treated the same as other bidders during the sale of an Enron subsidiary." The Journal continues, "The defense witness's testimony is intended to show that the relationship between Enron and the partnership, known as LJM, was proper and at arm's length, as opposed to the conflict-laden relationship that prosecutors allege was used to manipulate the company's finances." The Journal adds, "J. Mark Metts, who negotiated asset sales and acquisitions while at Enron, testified that Mr. Skilling never sought any favors for the LJM partnership amid the partnership's efforts to involve itself in a prospective asset sale that Mr. Metts was handling. LJM, a partnership set up and run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former finance chief, is at the core of the government's conspiracy case. Prosecutors contend LJM was used improperly to hide losses from investors and to boost profits."

Skilling On The Stand Will Be Confronted With Past Testimony. The New York Times (4/5, Eichenwald, Barrionuevo) reports, "As Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, moves from the defense table to the witness stand as soon as today, he will have to be prepared to confront his own past testimony." The Times continues, "At his trial in Houston, Mr. Skilling will be bound by the very words he spoke under oath in secret testimony given more than four years ago, at a time when the Enron criminal investigation had not yet begun. … The testimony, taken in December 2001 as part of an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into the Enron debacle, serves as a road map to the defense Mr. Skilling will offer on the stand. It also points up some potential pitfalls he faces. A transcript of the testimony, which has not been made public, was obtained by The New York Times." The Times adds, "The transcript lays out not only what is sure to be the foundation of Mr. Skilling's own explanation for what went wrong at Enron, but also the words that could be used against him in cross-examination. … At the heart of Mr. Skilling's statements in his previous testimony was a simple refrain: Enron took every precaution; everything was legal; nothing was hidden; nothing was improper. But Mr. Skilling also advanced the argument that if anything illegal had occurred, he could not possibly have been on top of every transaction at Enron, simply because the company was too sprawling for any one person to control."

Lay Attorney Awaits Further Surgery. The Washington Post (4/5, Johnson) reports, "The lead lawyer for former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay has been hospitalized for more tests while he awaits surgery, a move that could put him out of commission for a significant portion of his client's defense against fraud charges." The Post continues, "Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are evaluating Michael W. Ramsey, 66, for a new blockage in his carotid artery that doctors uncovered in tests Tuesday. … Last month, during a short break in the trial, Ramsey had a stent successfully implanted in a different artery to help correct shortness of breath and other symptoms he had since at least the third week of Lay and protege Jeffrey K. Skilling's trial."

SEC Alleges Fraud In Case Of DC Charter Funds. The Washington Post (4/5, B1, Montgomery) reports, "Federal securities regulators yesterday accused a Maryland firm of defrauding the District of millions in federal and local funds earmarked for D.C. charter schools, saying the firm used the cash to try to prop up two failing subsidiaries." The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission "alleges that Geneva Capital Partners LLC and its owner, Eric M. Westbury of Silver Spring, obtained investments of more than $21 million from the District without telling D.C. officials that two of the city's advisers had a financial stake in Westbury's firms. Westbury then used some of the cash to cover losses at his other companies, which together owe about $33 million to more than 2,000 small investors nationwide, the complaint says." Geneva also "owes the District about $11 million." John M. Fedders, Westbury's attorney, said, "We dispute paragraph after paragraph of these SEC allegations." U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow "gave Fedders until April 26 to file his objections, and she set a hearing date for May 12."

Executive Says Rules In Section 404 Of Sarbanes-Oxley Law Should Be Narrowed. In a piece in the Wall Street Journal (3/5, A20), Richard C. Pozen, chairman of MFS Investment Management, discusses "Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires an annual assessment by public companies of their internal controls over financial reporting." Pozen says that "instead of exempting small companies from Section 404," the SEC and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board "should apply to all public companies narrower rules on internal controls. Management's assessment of internal controls should focus on the material information contained in the company's reports to the SEC, and the auditors should attest to management's assessment by reviewing its processes and sample testing. Both should apply the traditional concept of materiality -- financial significance relative to the whole company. In this manner, Section 404 will be very helpful in preventing material misstatements in a company's reports to the SEC, but at a much lower cost."

DOJ_NMG_0025222

CRIMINAL LAW:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Committee DOJ Moving To Slowly On Pedophiles. Justin Berry, a victim of the $20 billion Internet child pornography trade, yesterday testified before Congress. The story was covered by ABC in its first two stories, while CBS covered it early in its lineup.

ABC World News Tonight (4/4, lead story, 3:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Justin Berry described how he was lured into the world of child sex Websites when he was just 13 years old. It is a booming business. An estimated $20 billion is spent worldwide on child pornography each year. Law enforcement is overwhelmed by the number of new cases every day. And Justin Berry is one of thousands of victims. But his story, told on Capitol Hill, today, is now a lesson on how to stop the predators." ABC (L. Stark) added, "Lawmakers were riveted and stunned by the testimony they heard today. How easy it is for online predators to lure in a lonely teenager. Justin Berry was an honor student, class president, when he was lured into the world of online child pornography." Rep. Joe Barton: "I've never been more revolted in preparing for a hearing, than in reading the materials I had to read for this one." Stark: "There was criticism today of the Justice Department, saying there's been little aggressive prosecution. And that online predators have nothing to fear. The Justice Department insists that child online pornography is a high priority. And they say prosecutions have jumped 300% in the last ten years."

The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 4, 2:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "Congress was riveted by the story of how an honor student from Bakersfield, California, used a web camera to delve into a world of online predators where he was first explorer, then exploited." Help "came last June when a New York Times reporter investigating web cam child porn found Justin and convinced him to leave the business." But "out of more than 1,000 names Justin turned over to the Justice Department last summer, only two have been charged. Part of today's hearing was about trying to get more prosecutions going."

The AP (4/4, Kellman) reports, "Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told a House panel Tuesday that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year. … 'I believed that the government would protect the children being abused. I believed they would act quickly,' Berry, now 19, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee. 'I was wrong.'" The AP continues, "Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra disputed that, citing a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases nationally over the past decade. The unit investigating Berry's case, which Sierra could not discuss, has seen its workload increase 450 percent in the last four years. … 'One of law enforcement's highest priorities is the protection of innocent children from sexual predators who lurk on the Internet,' Sierra said. … The same committee will hear from the Justice Department, among other federal agencies, on Thursday." The AP adds, "Berry's story of a lonely teenager who sought friends on the Internet but instead grew rich attracting pedophiles was reported in December by the New York Times after a six-month investigation. Its author, Kurt Eichenwald, told the Energy and Commerce Committee on Tuesday that Berry is the first such teenage witness known to turn over such a vast cache of evidence to the government. … But even Berry's catalog of his clients' names, credit card numbers and other details has resulted in only one arrest, he and Eichenwald said. … 'From the time that the government was notified of Justin's information to the point where the children in direct danger were saved, more than 50 days passed,' Eichenwald told the panel. 'Some people identified as perpetrators literally could not get themselves arrested if they tried.'"

DHS Deputy Press Secretary Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online. The Washington Post (4/5, A24, Hsu, 744K) reports DHS' deputy press secretary, Brian J. Doyle, "was arrested last night on charges that he used the Internet to seduce an undercover Florida sheriff's detective who he thought was a 14-year-old girl, the Polk County Sheriff's Office said." He was "charged with seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful materials to a minor, according to a sheriff's office statement." The sheriff's office said that "Doyle told an undercover computer-crimes detective who he was and that he worked for the Department of Homeland Security, later disclosing numbers for his office phone and government-issued cellphone and using those lines." Chertoff press secretary Russ Knocke released "a written statement, saying, 'We take these allegations very seriously and we will cooperate fully with this ongoing investigation.'"

Appearing on CNN's Anderson Cooper (4/4), with the words "D.H.S. Sex Allegations" across the bottom of the screen, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said Doyle "clearly identified himself as the deputy press secretary for Homeland Security. And if he would provide that kind of information, to include a photograph of himself with his identification tags, who else may he be talking to around the world who he thinks to be a 14-year-old girl?"

DOJ_NMG_0025223

Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (4/4) reported that "Doyle engaged in sexually explicit conversations with, who he believed was a 14-year-old girl over the internet, even sending her pornographic movie clips. The girl turned out to be an undercover agent."

The Washington Times (4/5, Hudson, 90K) reports, "Doyle will be placed on administrative leave today pending an investigation and may be extradited to Florida to face charges." Beyond his written statement, "Mr. Knocke declined to comment further on the charges or say how long Mr. Doyle has been under investigation by the sheriff's office, by the Florida State Attorney's Office and the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general."

Federal Judge Revokes Mississippi Attorney's Bond In Judicial Bribery Case. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (4/5, Lee) reports, "U.S. District Court judge Henry T. Wingate revoked attorney Paul Minor's bond in the judicial bribery case Tuesday because Minor violated the terms of his release by getting drunk. … The order to revoke bond was handed down in a hearing Tuesday morning in Jackson." The Sun Herald continues, "Wingate said he would have considered a treatment plan had the defense presented one. Instead, defense attorney Dennis Sweet of Jackson argued that Minor wasn't drunk March 6 at the Marriott Hotel in Jackson. … Minor was taken into custody by the U.S. Marshals Service and will be transferred to the Madison County jail, where he is scheduled to remain until trial. However, Minor attorney Brad Pigott of Jackson said the defense plans to present an alternative treatment plan for alcohol abuse as soon as possible." The Sun Herald adds, "Wingate indicated he would be willing to consider such a plan as an alternative to incarceration. … A morning's testimony about his condition that night conflicted, but Wingate found Drug Enforcement Administration agents who witnessed Minor's intoxication more convincing than testimony from two Marriott employees who got to know Minor over the course of his first judicial bribery trial last summer."

Final Closing Statements Made At "Mafia Cops" Trial. The AP (4/5, Hays) reports that in his closing statement yesterday at the trial of alleged "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, defense lawyer Bruce Cutler said Caracappa "was a dedicated lawman and aspiring screenplay writer who was fingered by corrupt government cooperators." Cutler "attacked the credibility of two key government witnesses -- confessed drug dealer Burton Kaplan…and admitted embezzler Steven Corso," saying that Kaplan "led a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life" and calling Corso a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief." In his rebuttal, Assistant US Attorney Robert Henoch "argued that the defense never explained why Kaplan knew personal details about the lives of 'Brooklyn's finest.' He also asked jurors to focus on Corso's testimony about asking the ex-officers to help him score drugs for some potential film backers from Hollywood who were visiting Las Vegas in 2005." The New York Times (4/5, Feuer, 1.19M) notes Cutler's "summation was less a legal argument than a free-associative ode, a lawyerly tone poem on the themes of hope, justice and the spoken word." But Henoch said in his rebuttal, "You can't just say it and it becomes true. You need evidence in a temple of justice — not just words from the dictionary."

Newsday (4/5, DeStefano) reports on Cutler's and Henoch's summations, and adds that "after hours of being cajoled, roused and emotionally tugged at by the closing arguments of prosecution and defense attorneys, the jury went home for the day" and "is set to return to court at 9:30 Wednesday morning." In a second story, under the headline "Time Of Essence In 'Mafia Cops' Trial," Newsday (4/5, DeStephano) reports, "More than 40 witnesses have testified and numerous exhibits have been introduced as evidence that prosecutors contend are strong enough to convict both men," but "the 500-pound legal gorilla in the case involves the statute of limitation for racketeering conspiracy, something that concerns Judge Jack Weinstein. … If the jury finds that the conspiracy and Eppolito's and Caracappa's involvement in it ended before March 9, 2000, then the two defendants would be acquitted of the racketeering charges, including the murders. However, drug and money laundering charges would remain regardless."

The New York Daily News (4/5, Marzulli, 729K) notes in its story on the summations, "In keeping with the previous four weeks, Cutler offered no alternative theory or alibi to clear his client or suggest reasonable doubt. But there was plenty of name-calling." The New York Post (4/5, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Cutler's colorful closing, under the headline, "Wily 'Mob Cop' Defense."

Missouri Man Sentenced To Prison For Attempt To Fence Stolen Rembrandt. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5, Shinkle, 310K) reports, "A man who admitted posing as a Saudi sheik as part of a scheme to sell a fake Rembrandt painting for $2.8 million, was sentenced Tuesday" to five months in prison and five months home confinement. Majed A. Ihmoud of St. Charles "took the fake of Rembrandt's 'Man with the Golden Helmet' to the Adam's Mark Hotel in downtown St. Louis on Aug. 12, 2004, expecting to sell it to a buyer for $2.8 million, the FBI said." FBI Art Crime Team senior investigator Robert Wittman noted, "He said he had a Rembrandt for sale that had come out of the Middle East," but "the buyer, who provided a check for $2.8 million at the meeting in the Adam's Mark, was an undercover FBI agent."

DOJ_NMG_0025224

More Charges Possible In Hollywood Private Eye Scandal. The CBS Evening News (4/4, story 9, 2:10, Bowen) reported on the scandal surrounding Hollywood private investigator Tony Pellicano. Director John McTiernan "of 'Die Hard' fame" is "the 14th person to face Federal charges for lying about his connection to the man at the center, tough-talking Tony Pellicano, self-styled private investigator and problem fixer to the stars." Prosecutors "say he used illegal wiretaps to get information for other clients in legal disputes." George Cardona, acting US Attorney: "This is not, we don't think, how most private investigators do their job." Bowen: "Several Hollywood heavyweights have been called in to talk – celebrity lawyer Bert Fields, former super agent Michael Ovitz, and Paramount Chief Brad Grey – but the speculation and questions continue."

Pellicano Probe Focuses On Links To Director. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Eller, Krikorian, Christensen) reports, "About noon on Feb. 24, two FBI agents visited veteran producer Charles Roven in his Sunset Boulevard office after calling to tell him that he was allegedly a victim of Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano. … The agents brought a tape recording that would startle Roven, according to sources close to the investigation. Director John McTiernan, whom Roven worked with on the 2002 box office flop 'Rollerball,' was allegedly on the tape with Pellicano, discussing the details of Roven's wiretapped conversations." The Times continues, " Pellicano allegedly briefed McTiernan on Roven's conversations regarding "Rollerball," the sources said, as well as Roven's personal calls. … Authorities charged McTiernan on Monday with lying about having hired Pellicano. A day later, the full extent of McTiernan's reliance on the indicted detective was beginning to come into focus." The Times adds, "McTiernan's association with Pellicano began years ago, long before the alleged Roven wiretap, when the director allegedly hired the private eye in 1998 as part of his highly publicized divorce. But it did not end there. Pellicano also allegedly intimidated a witness in a manslaughter case involving the son of McTiernan's ex-wife, Donna Dubrow. … In an interview Tuesday, Dubrow said she has seen financial records indicating that her ex-husband paid Pellicano in the neighborhood of $100,000 during their protracted divorce. The payments began at least as far back as June 1998, she said, adding that she did not know what services they were for."

Alleged New Mexico Cop Killer Waives Extradition, Returns To US. The Albuquerque Tribune (4/5, Shepard) reports "Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in connection with two Albuquerque-area homicides, waived his extradition hearing in an El Paso, Texas courtroom" yesterday afternoon. "Astorga, who spent a day on the FBI's top 10 'Most Wanted' list over the weekend, was captured Monday in Mexico. He's wanted in the March 22 killing of Bernalillo County sheriff's Deputy James McGrane Jr." KTSM-TV El Paso (4/4) adds, "Officials say Astorga is a flight risk and will be heavily guarded in all of his transfers. 'There will be a great deal of protection and security, especially because he killed a law enforcement officer. I t shows that he doesn't have much regard for those with guns or law enforcement. So he'll be well guarded,' says Andrea Simmons, FBI."

The AP (4/5) notes, "Police in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, handed" Astorga "to the FBI and Bernalillo County authorities in El Paso, Texas, early Tuesday morning. By Tuesday evening, Astorga - wearing shackles and handcuffs - was escorted into the Metropolitan Detention Center in Albuquerque." KOB-TV Albuquerque (4/4, Upton) also reports on Astorga's transfer.

Tenet Case Judge Declares Second Mistrial. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Rundle) reports, "A federal judge in San Diego declared a mistrial in an 11-month criminal case against a unit of Tenet Healthcare Corp., its Alvarado Hospital Medical Center and its former chief executive officer. It was the second mistrial declared by the same judge on nearly the same charges against the defendants." The Journal continues, "The Tenet unit, the hospital and its former CEO, Barry Weinbaum, were accused by U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam of violating the federal antikickback statute by paying bribes to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital. The alleged conspiracy involved the illegal use of relocation packages to recruit physicians to Alvarado's service area. … 'Like the two juries that have deadlocked in February 2005 and now April 2006, Tenet and the prosecutors disagree over whether anyone at Alvarado Hospital Medical Center intended to break the law when they recruited physicians to the fast-growing eastern part of San Diego County,' Peter Urbanowicz, Tenet's general counsel, said in a statement." The Journal adds, "The case is important to Tenet, which has been negotiating a settlement with the Justice Department to resolve a multitude of allegations of misconduct. Some investors yesterday said the mistrial could clear the way for a final settlement, assuming that the government doesn't pursue a third trial. Tenet, based in Dallas, is the nation's second-largest hospital company."

Chicago Truck Driver Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Ongoing Probe. The Chicago Tribune (4/5, 643K) reports independent truck driver Carl Edwards "pleaded guilty Tuesday to bribing two Chicago city foremen to obtain at least

DOJ_NMG_0025225

$45,000 in city-owned asphalt for private paving projects." Edwards "said in a plea agreement that he paid bribes to Patrick Stillo and Robert Laino from April 2002 to November 2004. … In exchange for Edwards' guilty plea and cooperation, prosecutors agreed to recommend a 9-month prison sentence." The Tribune notes, "Edwards is the 35th defendant convicted in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program."

Former Nevada Commissioner's Friend Testifies About Alleged Bribes. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (4/4) reports that at the corruption trial of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera yesterday, "It was a potentially damaging day…as one of his former best friends testifies Herrera often bragged about his relationship with strip club owner Mike Galardi." Terry Lamuraglia "told the jury he and Herrera could get comped drinks and lap dances at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club anytime. … Lamuraglia believes every time he and Herrera visited Cheetahs, he received sexual favors from dancers there. Further damaging Herrera's case, Lamuraglia testified Herrera bragged about 'getting a free trip, getting free golf, getting entertainers, getting things paid for' by Galardi."

Alleged Philadelphia Ticket-Fixer Requests Jury Trial. The Philadelphia Daily Mail (4/5, Hinkelman) reports Molden David Faison, "a former city hearing officer accused of fixing parking tickets for $200 in cash and Prince concert tickets worth $169," said yesterday that he wants a jury trial "after U.S. District Judge Norma L. Shapiro refused to accept his guilty plea. On Monday, the judge had expressed 'doubts' that the government's charge of Hobbs Act extortion against Faison could be proven at trial. … Yesterday, after reviewing case law on the subject, Shapiro said an FBI sting would meet the test if Faison had known or had been informed that he was accepting concert tickets from a company involved in interstate commerce."

FBI, Postal Inspectors Arrest Three For Alleged Credit-Counseling Fraud. Newsday (4/5, Kessler) reports, "In a federal crackdown on allegedly crooked operators of consumer credit-counseling businesses, three managers of a former service in Huntington were charged yesterday with defrauding 17,000 customers around the country out of $24million, according to court papers and officials." Former Debticated Consumer Counseling managers Bradley Dorman, Louis Mustachio and Daniel Ruggerio were "arrested by FBI agents and inspectors from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service." Newsday notes, "Dorman, Mustachio and Ruggerio pleaded not guilty at arraignment before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert, who released them on $50,000 bail."

New York Investor Found Murdered In Greenwich Mansion. NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 10, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Police in Greenwich, Connecticut, a wealthy suburb north of New York City, say tonight they do not know who stabbed and murdered a 46-year-old millionaire, a man who was in some pretty big legal trouble." NBC (Taibbi) added New York investor Andrew Kissel "was found dead Monday morning in the basement of a rented Connecticut mansion," and "the allure of quick money for him, millions he was about to officially admit belonged to others, had dozens of creditors and investigators in hot pursuit." He is "the second Kissel to die a violent and untimely death. His brother Robert, a Hong Kong banker, bludgeoned to death four years ago by his former waitress wife Nancy after she'd drugged him with a sedative-laced milkshake."

Report Finds Fatal Abuse Of Children Increased In 2004. The Washington Times (4/5, Wetzstein) reports, "The number of fatally abused children rose slightly in 2004 from the previous year as the overall number of abused and neglected children dropped, a new report says." The Times continues, "Officials from the Department of Health and Human Services said that one reason for the increase in fatalities is improved reporting by states, but that the drop in abuse was encouraging. … 'Nevertheless, we cannot tolerate the abuse of even one child,' said Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families." The Times adds, "The number of fatally abused children rose 2 percent from 1,460 in 2003 to 1,490 in 2004, according to the 'Child Maltreatment 2004' report. Overall neglect and abuse dropped 4 percent from 872,000 in 2003 to 838,000. … More than 80 percent of the children who died of abuse or neglect were 3 or younger. Among infant boys, the fatality rate was 18 deaths per 100,000 boys. Among infant girls, the fatality rate was 17 deaths per 100,000 girls. … More than three-quarters of the children were killed by one or more parents, and almost a third were killed by their mothers acting alone."

Female Homicide Detectives In Maryland Profiled. The Washington Post (4/5, B1, Klein) profiles Kelly Rogers and Meredith Binley, the only two female homicide detectives in the Prince George's County Police Department. The Post reports, "Cpls. Rogers and Bingley are the only female homicide detectives in the county. There have been just six before them in the 75-year history of the department. … The small number of women is typical of area homicide units -- three of 15 homicide detectives in Montgomery County and one of 10 in Fairfax County are women." The Post adds, "The Prince George's detectives work in the most violent of Washington's suburbs, where last year there were 173 homicides, an average of one slaying about every other day. … Although the gender barrier may have crumbled in many respects, the world of guns and violence is still fueled by testosterone. Of the department's 1,348 officers, about 17 percent are women."

DOJ_NMG_0025226

CIVIL LAW:

GAO Report Finds Agencies Lax In Protecting Privacy Rights. The Washington Post (4/5, A9, O'Harrow) reports, "Government agencies that use private information services for law enforcement, counterterrorism and other investigations often do not follow federal rules to protect Americans' privacy, according to a report yesterday by the Government Accountability Office." The Post continues, "The Justice Department, the Department of Homeland Security and two other agencies examined by the GAO spent about $30 million last year on companies that maintain billions of electronic files about adults' current and past addresses, family members and associates, buying habits, personal finances, listed and unlisted phone numbers, and much more. … But those agencies often do not limit the collection and use of information about law-abiding citizens, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974 and other laws. The agencies also don't ensure the accuracy of the information they are buying, according to the GAO report. That's in part because of a lack of clear guidance from the agencies and the Office of Management and Budget on guidelines known as 'fair information practices,' the report said." The Post adds, "At the same time, the contractors are not bound by those "fair information practices," and they often don't comply with all of them, the report said. Companies do not notify individuals when information is collected, for instance. They limit individuals' access to records about themselves, and they generally do not have provisions for correcting mistakes, the report said. … The 83-page report, the subject of a congressional hearing yesterday, was spurred in part by massive security breaches reported last year by ChoicePoint Inc. and LexisNexis in which sensitive files involving almost 200,000 people were sold to fraud artists."

FDA Accuses Anthrax Vaccine Maker Of Exaggerated Claims. The Washington Post (4/5, Gillis, 744K) reports that the FDA has accused VaxGen of "making exaggerated claims about the purity and effectiveness of a new vaccine for anthrax." The Post reports that VaxGen has "acknowledged that it is at least a year behind in producing the anthrax vaccine."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Probe Baton Rouge Police Shooting Death. The AP (4/5) reports, "A federal investigation has been opened into the shooting death of a businessman, who was killed by a bystander during a scuffle with a Baton Rouge police officer." The AP continues, "The Justice Department has ordered the FBI to investigate, department spokesman Eric Holland said Monday. He would not speculate on how long the investigation would take." The AP adds, "George Temple II was killed Feb. 17 during a scuffle with a police officer that began when he was pulled over for cutting into a funeral procession. During the fight with Officer Brian Harrison, Temple was shot five times. … Authorities said one of the shots came from the officer's gun. The other four came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities say came to help the officer during the struggle. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head and killed him, according to an autopsy. … Police said Temple offered a bribe to the police office and a struggle began when the officer attempted to arrest Temple."

Tennessee Police Sergeants To Face Trial Again On Civil Rights Charges. The Knoxville News (4/5, Stambaugh) reports, "Two Newport police sergeants accused of shaking down a pair of Hispanic men during a 2005 traffic stop will face trial a second time today on federal civil-rights charges." Sgts. James W. Roach Jr. and Patrick Sheldon "were arrested last year by the FBI after they were swept up in a five-year probe into public corruption in Cocke County dubbed 'Rose Thorn.' They were acquitted of felony civil-rights conspiracy charges in February, but jurors couldn't reach a verdict on misdemeanor charges of depriving the alleged victims of their civil rights." The News notes, "Through motions filed by his attorneys, Sheldon has maintained that he has been pressured by the FBI to implicate Roach and was told he would be 'prosecuted to the fullest extent of the federal government's resources' if he refused to cooperate."

Report Critical Of BOP Response To Inmates' Chemical Concerns. The New York Times (4/5, Zernike) reports, "The federal Bureau of Prisons failed to address concerns that inmates and staff members at several prisons were exposed to toxic chemicals in recycling programs where inmates use hammers to smash discarded computers, according to the agency that handles whistle-blower complaints." The Times continues, "In a letter to President Bush and Congress on Monday, the agency, the Office of Special Counsel, called for an independent investigation into the complaints, which were brought to the federal government by a whistle-blower from a California prison in 2004. … The office criticized the Bureau of Prisons for not investigating the accusations thoroughly, saying the agency's review was deficient and 'appears to be cursory at best.'" The Times adds, "The inmates dismantled the computers as part of the federal prison industries program, or Unicor, which has become one of the nation's largest recyclers, providing low-cost recycling to government agencies, schools and private companies. … The whistle-blower, Leroy A. Smith Jr., the former safety manager at Atwater Federal Prison outside Merced, Calif., said factory workers in the recycling facility there and at four other federal prisons in the country were exposed to hazardous materials including lead, cadmium, barium and beryllium when the inmates took hammers to cathode ray tubes from computers. … The Justice Department referred the complaints to the Bureau of Prisons, which produced two reports responding to Mr. Smith's complaints in June and August 2005, concluding that the bureau, the federal prison industries program and prison staff members 'took appropriate steps' to make sure the programs were operating safely."

DOJ_NMG_0025227

9th Circuit Panel Hears Arguments In Gay Marriage Case. The AP (4/5, Kravets) reports, "A lawyer for a gay couple suing for the right to wed told a federal appeals court Tuesday that it's unconstitutional to prevent same-sex marriage, but one judge appeared unmoved and two others said the case could die on procedural grounds. … 'Everything that is wrong is not discrimination,' said Judge Jerome Farris, part of a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that heard 40 minutes of arguments." The AP continues, "The case was brought by two gay men who sued after being denied a marriage license in Orange County. They claim California's ban on same-sex marriage and federal laws against it are unconstitutional because gays and lesbians are treated differently than heterosexuals. … U.S. District Judge Gary Taylor last year ruled against the pair Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer, both 46, of Mission Viejo. They appealed. … Taylor ruled the law 'has a disproportionate effect on homosexual individuals,' but said the government's desire to promote procreation is a valid reason for infringing on the rights of gays. … Farris agreed with that assertion. … 'I think marriage is a bundle of sticks and sticks include procreation,' Farris said." The AP notes, "Richard Gilbert, the gay couple's attorney, said procreation is not the important element of marriage and Judge Sidney Thomas appeared to agree. … 'I don't understand, really, the procreation argument,' Thomas said. … After the hearing, Hammer said he would prevail all the way to the Supreme Court 'if they acknowledge that we are human.' … Still, the heavyweights of the same-sex marriage movement aren't supporting the case and instead are waging their campaigns in the state courts of California, Iowa, Washington, New Jersey, New York and elsewhere, seeking rulings similar to the 2003 decision that led to legal gay marriage in Massachusetts."

Feingold Backs Gay Marriage. Sen. Russ Feingold, who is seen as a possible 2008 presidential candidate, said yesterday he supports the right of gays and lesbians to marry. The AP (4/5) reports that Feingold's ,comments position him "to the left of possible 2008 rivals. … Feingold said he decided to express his support for gay marriage in response to a Wisconsin constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and civil unions, which will appear on the state ballot in November."

The Washington Post (4/5, A9, Balz, 744K) reports that Feingold called the Wisconsin amendment "'a mean-spirited attempt' to single out gay men and lesbians for discrimination and said he would vote against it." Feingold "said he is prepared to work with supporters of same-sex marriage to ensure that it is legal in the future."

Texas Couple Wins Judgment Against Housing Authority. The San Antonio Business Journal (4/5) reports, "U.S. Judge John Primomo ordered the Housing Authority of San Antonio, the San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., Pat Matherly and the Pilgrim Allena Housing Development Corp. to pay $125,000 to resolve a tenant disability discrimination case." The Journal continues, "On June 2, 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a complaint on behalf of local residents Antonio and Josefina Maldonado in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas alleging that the Westminster Square Apartments unlawfully discriminated against the couple because of their disabilities." The Journal adds, "According to the complaint, Pilgrim Allena Housing owns the local apartment complex where the Maldonados have lived since 1989. The San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., a subsidiary of the local Housing Authority, manages the apartments. Matherly was the on-site manager at the property at the time. … Antonio Maldonado is a double-leg amputee and Josefina Maldonado has osteoporosis, hyperlipidemia, angina, diffuse arthritis and diabetes. Over the years, Josefina Maldonado increasingly had been experiencing difficulty maneuvering her husband in his wheelchair from their third-floor apartment to the ground floor via elevator. … Last week, lawyers from the Justice Department and the Housing Authority reached a settlement. With the judge's signature in hand, the Maldonados will receive the $125,000, with part of that settlement going to the Fair Housing Council of Greater San Antonio for their help in the suit."

Alabama Legislature Nears Approval Of Bill To Delay Runoff Elections. The AP (4/5) reports, "The Alabama Legislature moved a step closer Tuesday to approving legislation to delay the June 27 primary runoff elections to July 18 to give military personnel overseas more time to vote." The AP continues, "The House Constitution and Elections Committee approved a Senate-passed bill to delay the party primary runoffs on a unanimous voice vote. The bill is expected to come up in the House Wednesday or Thursday, when it could receive final passage." The AP adds, "Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley asked the Legislature to delay the runoffs in response to a lawsuit filed against the state by the U.S. Justice Department. … The lawsuit claims there is not enough time between the June 6 primaries and the June 27 runoffs for service members, particularly those fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, to receive and cast ballots." The AP notes, "The House originally passed a bill that would have kept the runoffs on June 27, but allowed service members to vote by a special ballot that would have been sent to them at the same time as the primary ballot. … King has said he doubts the Justice Department would go along with the special ballot, partly because it would not allow soldiers who did not vote in the primary to vote in the runoffs."

DOJ_NMG_0025228

WPost Says Early Voting Bill Taints Maryland Elections. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) says Democrats in the Maryland legislature "have sacrificed fairness to partisan advantage," by pushing through "a bill allowing voting to take place for five days before Election Day -- but mostly at polling stations in Democratic strongholds. This isn't the first time a majority in a state legislature has sought electoral advantage by ramming a brazenly partisan measure down the throat of the minority party. … But no matter which party is behind such partisan mischief, the effect is the same: to subvert the faith that Americans place in the electoral system's fairness." The Post adds that "tilting the early-voting system toward heavily Democratic areas in strategically key jurisdictions taints the election even before it occurs. With such arrogance and abuse, the Democrats will only erode their majority in Maryland."

ANTITRUST:

Analyst Sees Potential Problems For AT&T-BellSouth Merger. In an analysis piece for CNET News (4/5), attorney Mark Del Bianco writes, "The conventional wisdom in Washington is that regulatory approval of the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is a done deal. The consensus is that this deal will sail through with flying colors--and a few not very onerous merger conditions. … The conventional wisdom may be wrong. There is a twist that ought to give the regulators pause. Both BellSouth and AT&T own considerable chunks of prime wireless spectrum that is unused and that could quickly and relatively cheaply be used to provide broadband services that would compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services--in other words, the long-sought "third pipe" to the home or business." Del Bianco continues, "Competitors will no doubt argue that the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department should worry about the loss of intermodal competition that will result if the two companies are permitted to retain this valuable spectrum. … The proposed merger will concentrate huge blocks of spectrum in one company with every incentive not to use it." Del Bianco adds, "Provided (the DOJ Antitrust Division) found that the spectrum controlled by the postmerger company represents a source of substantial potential competition, it would be fairly straightforward for it to conclude that without divestiture of the spectrum, the effect of the merger "may be to substantially lessen competition"--the standard it must follow in reviewing mergers under the Clayton Act. … Whether the FCC or the Antitrust Division in this administration will take competition-preserving action is an open question. But for those who seek competition in U.S. broadband markets, and for proponents of network neutrality for whom a third pipe could be a godsend, it certainly looks like a fight worth fighting."

EU Urges Governments To Open Gas Markets. The AP (4/5) reports, "European Union regulators on Tuesday started legal proceedings against 17 countries for not doing enough to open up their energy markets, just weeks after the EU criticized France and Spain for trying to protect their national energy companies." The AP continues, "Delays in drafting new rules to liberalize gas and electricity markets are keeping prices too high, the European Commission has said. … Austria, Belgium, Britain, the Czech Republic, Germany, Estonia, Spain, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Sweden and Slovakia will be sent a warning to put rules in place." The AP adds, "The Commission sent the 17 countries a letter of formal complaint. The member states concerned have two months to reply to the Commission. The final stage of the proceedings would mean taking countries to the European Court of Justice. … The Commission also said it would take Spain and Luxembourg to court for not sending it information to show they had put the legal framework in place. A court ruling can force a country to change national laws under threat of heavy fines. The Commission is still examining Portugal's and Hungary's laws. … It criticized the lack of free choice of supplier for many customers and the continued existence of regulated prices, saying that made it harder for new companies to break into the energy sector. Certain long-standing electricity and gas contracts still get preferential access, the Commission said. … It also criticized the way some energy companies do business -- without naming names -- saying there was often not enough separation between electricity and gas transmission and distribution to make sure each was independent. Many companies own the network and sell directly to customers, meaning they are wholesalers selling network access to the rivals they compete with on the retail market."

DOJ_NMG_0025229

Fed Clears Citigroup For Future Large Acquisitions. The Financial Times (4/5, Wighton) reports, "One of the clouds hanging over Citigroup was lifted on Tuesday when the world's largest financial services company revealed that the Federal Reserve had removed the ban on it making large acquisitions." The Times continues, "The New York Fed, Citigroup's lead regulator, said in a letter to the company that it had dropped the ban because of the "significant progress" it had made in improving its internal controls. … The Fed imposed the restriction a year ago following Citigroup's string of regulatory problems, including the forced closure of its private bank in Japan and the furore in Europe over controversial government bond trades." The Times adds, "Mr Prince said the move reflected the 'cumulative effect' of moves taken over the last year, including his introduction of a "five-point plan" to improve Citigroup's compliance culture. … Although the Fed ban was a blow to Citigroup's reputation, Mr Prince said the company had not been significantly hampered by the restriction, which applied only to very large transactions. … Mr Prince has shifted Citigroup's focus onto organic growth, following the deal-making of his predecessor, Sandy Weill. Moreover, most large potential targets look expensive, particularly given Citigroup's own depressed stock price."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Riley) reports, "The Fed's letter came just days after securities regulators in Australia accused Citigroup of insider trading. Citigroup has denied any wrongdoing and says it will 'vigorously defend' its actions. While Citigroup executives and a team of in-house regulators from the Fed stay in regular contact, it is unclear whether the Fed considered the merits of the lawsuit filed by the Australian regulators before lifting the ban on acquisitions."

Arcelor Blocks Mittal Takeover By Transferring Dofasco Unit. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Singer, Fleming) reports, "Arcelor SA transferred its lucrative Canadian operations to a Dutch foundation in an effort to block a €20.4 billion ($24.8 billion) hostile offer by rival steelmaker Mittal Steel Co., a move that drew rebukes from Arcelor shareholders and corporate-governance activists." The Journal continues, "Arcelor also raised its dividend by 54% to €1.85 a share and said it will make a special payment to shareholders of $5 billion after Mittal drops its bid or the takeover attempt fails. The two payouts are meant to make siding with Arcelor financially equivalent to accepting Mittal's bid, boiling the choice down to which management team investors prefer." The Journal adds, "Mittal vowed to press on with its bid, which has sparked debate over national pride, cultural compatibility and economic openness across Europe and in other parts of the world. But Mittal, based in Rotterdam, the Netherlands, said it would reduce the cash portion of its cash-and-stock bid because it considers the increased dividend an advance, though it hasn't yet disclosed details."

Blockbuster Sued By Netflix For Web Expansion. The Wall Street Journal/AP (4/5) reports, "Online DVD rental service Netflix Inc. on Tuesday accused Blockbuster Inc. of illegally copying its ideas in a patent infringement lawsuit challenging the video store chain's recent Internet expansion." The AP continues, "The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, focuses largely on the online wish lists that prioritize the DVD desires of about 5.4 million people who subscribe to either Netflix or Blockbuster's Internet service. … Netflix also believes its patents cover perhaps its most popular feature -- the option of renting a DVD for an unlimited time without incurring late fees." The AP adds, "That change, introduced by Netflix seven years ago, became so popular that Blockbuster last year stopped charging late fees for tardy rental returns to its video stores. Dallas-based Blockbuster once pocketed hundreds of millions of dollars annually from those late fees. … Both Netflix and Blockbuster's online service charge $17.99 per month to rent up to three DVDs at a time. When subscribers return a DVD in a postage-paid envelope, the rental services automatically send the next available movie on their wish lists."

EU Raids Color Line Ferry Company Headquarters. The AP2 (4/5) reports, "European competition authorities on Tuesday raided the headquarters of Norway's Color Line AS ferry company as part of an antitrust investigation." The AP continues, "The surprise inspection was to check for possible competition violations by the Norwegian ferry operator, the EFTA Surveillance Authority, or ESA, said in a statement. … 'Surprise inspections are a preliminary step in antitrust investigations. The fact that the EFTA Surveillance Authority carries out an inspection does not mean that the company is guilty of anticompetitive behavior,' the ESA said." The AP adds, "ESA is the enforcement arm of the European Free Trade Association, or EFTA. Through treaties with the European Union, EFTA members Norway, Iceland and Liechtenstein have open markets with the 25-nation European bloc even though they are not members. … Color Line spokesman Helge Otto Mathisen said the company was cooperating fully with the ESA inspectors, who were assisted by the Norwegian Competition Authority."

DOJ_NMG_0025230

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Controversial EPA Air-Quality Draft May Color Wehrum Confirmation Hearing. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Clayton, 61K) reports, "The Environmental Protection Agency has drafted a plan that would allow so much extra industrial air pollution that 7 of 10 of the agency's own regional air-quality directors have signed on to a memo condemning it. While disagreement on policy issues is not unusual, former EPA officials say the regional directors used particularly strong language in criticizing the plan developed on William Wehrum's watch in a December memo, which surfaced Monday. The stinging internal criticism is likely to pop up Wednesday at Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Wehrum, who is nominated to become the nation's top air-quality officer." Eric Schaeffer, director of the Environmental Integrity Project in New York and a former chief of the EPA's office of regulatory enforcement, is quoted as saying, "Wehrum is the architect of a lot of changes to the Clean Air Act that have weakened environmental protection. ... This new proposal on toxics pushes past science, law, and fair public process."

Plan To Expand Yucca Mountain Nuclear Dump Draws Fire. In a move designed to encourage development of a controversial nuclear dump site under construction near Las Vegas, the Department of Energy has proposed removing a cap that limits how much waste the facility could handle. USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) reports, "The Bush administration wants to bury tens of thousands of tons more nuclear waste at the Yucca Mountain dump in Nevada than now allowed. ... The Energy Department proposed lifting the 77,000-ton storage limit on the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas and allowing as much waste as the facility can hold." Longtime Yucca Mountain opponent, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, "said the bill was 'not even on life support. It's dead when it gets here.'"

In its coverage, the Wall Street Journal (4/5, Fialka, 2.11M) cites Department of Energy Deputy Director Clay Sell as saying that the changes will help spur the construction of new nuclear power plants, bolster domestic energy supplies and help curtail air pollution. "We need an expansion of nuclear power in this country," he is quoted as saying. The Journal goes on to note, "The enlargement would accommodate one of the administration's longer range plans to remove and reuse parts of the spent fuel, leaving a relatively small percentage of waste for permanent storage. Without the reduction, the department has estimated, it might need at least six more permanent storage sites."

Lawsuit Challenges DOE On West Valley Demonstration Project Cleanup. The Times Herald (4/5, Miller) of Bradford, PA, reports, "The New York State Energy Research and Development Authority has authorized a lawsuit against the US Department of Energy over the nuclear cleanup at the West Valley Demonstration Project." The Herald adds that Authority chairman Vincent Delorio, said that the DOE "has taken a very limited view of its responsibility to clean up nuclear wastes at West Valley," and added, "we have been working for 10 years to convince the Feds to live up to their obligations, but have been unable to reach agreement." Legislation sponsored by a number of New York lawmakers would give the NRC "authority over DOE activities at the site" after the DOE "reduced the funding levels for cleanup activities and staffing levels at the West Valley Demonstration Project to about $70 million this year."

The AP (4/5) reports, "Talks between New York and the US Department of Energy stalled during the Clinton administration. Now, with the DOE cutting staff and funding at the site, state energy officials worry the federal agency is getting ready to leave." The AP adds, "From 1966 to 1972, spent nuclear fuel from commercial nuclear power plants and DOE sites was chopped and dissolved, and its uranium and plutonium were extracted."

AK Steel Settles Toxin Contamination Claims With US, Ohio. The Middletown (OH) Journal (4/5) reports, "AK Steel Corp. will launch a nearly $13 million effort to clean up two streams contaminated with 'significant' toxins as part of an agreement reached with federal and Ohio environmental protection agencies to settle a six-year-old lawsuit, the company and government officials announced Monday." The Journal continues, "The settlement — filed in the U.S. District Court for Southern District in Cincinnati Monday morning — addresses claims that AK Steel violated the federal Clean Water, Clean Air and Resource Conservation and Recovery acts, as well as, Ohio environmental regulations in and surrounding its 2,700-acre Middletown Works." The Journal adds, "The 103-page federal consent degree ends decades of contamination from Middletown Works, according to Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant Attorney General for the U.S. Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division. … 'By removing contamination from the areas currently known to contain significant polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB) concentration, AK Steel will immediately begin cleanup work to protect the environment and reduce the potential for human exposure to PCBs,' Wooldridge said. … As part of the agreement, AK Steel will pay $460,000 in civil penalties to be split equally between the state of Ohio and U.S. governments. AK Steel also will spend an additional $750,000 on an "environmentally beneficial project that will remove ozone-depleting refrigerants from certain equipment at the plant.""

DOJ_NMG_0025231

Former Tribal Casino Workers Seek Venue For Sexual Harassment Lawsuits. Several former casino workers are seeking a venue to sue their one-time employers for sexual harassment, but may be turned away from state and Federal courts because they worked for native American casinos. ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 9, 2:20, Tapper) reported, "Seven female former employees of the Thunder Valley Casino are suing their former employer in California state court." The case "against Thunder Valley Casino alleges sexual harassment, age and gender discrimination, and many other charges. But it's unclear a state or Federal court even has the jurisdiction to hear the case. That's because Thunder Valley Casino is on sovereign native American land. Attorney Howard Dickstein represents the United Auburn Indian Tribe." Dickstein: "The one thing the tribe will not do is simply subject itself to the jurisdiction of the state."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colombian Police Officers, Others Accused In $10 Million Cocaine-Smuggling Plot. There was wide media coverage concerning several suspects linked to the shipment of millions of dollars of cocaine, with more than 100 references to the story. For example, The Washington Times (4/5, Seper) reports the DEA "said seven drug-smuggling suspects, including five Colombian police officers and an airline employee, have been arrested in Bogota in connection with the shipment of more than $10 million in cocaine to the United States. An indictment handed up in the case and unsealed yesterday accused the seven of smuggling the cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota for importation into the United States, said DEA Special Agent-in-Charge John P. Gilbride. … DEA spokesman Rusty Payne in Washington said the arrests were part of Operation Caso Dorado, a joint undercover investigation by DEA agents in New York and Bogota, the U.S. attorney's office in New York, agents from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities."

The AP (4/5) reports the arrests "were based on a U.S. indictment in New York that alleges the Norte del Valle cartel recruited the airline worker and police involved with security at El Dorado Airport. It alleges the ring shipped the cocaine in October through Avianca's cargo facility after an airline employee approved false paperwork. The drugs were allegedly destined for the United States via Mexico." ABC News, CBS News, the New York Times, Washington Post, New York Newsday, Houston Chronicle, Seattle Post Intelligencer, and the UK's Guardian published in newspapers and/or posted on their Web sites the AP story.

CNN (4/4) reports on its Web site that eight people have been charged and adds, "The indictment in the case alleges that between August and December of last year members of a Colombian cartel recruited police officials responsible for airport security and airline employees to allow drugs to be smuggled from Colombia to Mexico and, ultimately, the United States."

On its Web site, WNYC, New York Public Radio (4/4) reports Boyd Johnson of the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan "says the smugglers used Avianca jets, which fly to New York daily."

DEA Investigates California Humane Society. KGTV-TV, San Diego (4/4) reports on its Web site that one of the county's oldest animal organizations "is under investigation. The Federal Drug Enforcement Agency is investigating Oceanside's North County Humane Society. … A spokesperson for the DEA confirms agents conducted an investigation at the North County Humane Society regarding its handling of controlled substances. The DEA will not say what agents found, if anything."

The North County Times (4/5) reports, "Officials with the North County Humane Society on Tuesday confirmed both the resignation of Executive Director Stacy Steel and an inquiry of the humane society by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration."

Reporting Continues On Harden Case. The Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch (4/5) continues to report on a case in which Richmond-based DEA agent William Carter Harden "pleaded guilty March 28 in U.S. District Court to the crime of lying to a federal officer." The Times Dispatch now reports that a woman connected to the case claims she had sex with Harden in an attempt to avoid a prison term.

Marijuana Dispensary Moratorium Extended By California Council. The San Luis Obispo Tribune (4/4, Van Beurden-Doust) reports Grover Beach "has extended its moratorium on medical marijuana dispensaries and has taken steps to make the ban permanent. The council voted 5-0 Monday to extend the 180-day moratorium that would have expired April 19. … The council voted 4-1 to make the ban permanent. The soonest it could become effective is 30 days after a second vote on April 20."

California City Council Considers Yearlong Moratorium. The AP (4/4) reports from Buellton that the City Council "will decide this month on a yearlong moratorium on new medical marijuana dispensaries. During that year, City Manager Steve Thompson said, city officials would decide whether a permanent ban is needed. The city recently enacted a 45-day moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries."

DOJ_NMG_0025232

Major New York State Drug Ring Smashed. The Utica (NY) Observer-Dispatch (4/5) reports, "Local, state and federal law enforcement have charged 13 people as the result of an investigation into a major cocaine and crack cocaine distribution ring that officials claim trafficked drugs throughout the Mohawk Valley." The Observer-Dispatch adds, "In a news release, U.S. Attorney Glenn T. Suddaby said today police recovered several ounces of cocaine and crack cocaine, as well as three pistols and ammunition, more than $80,000 in cash, drug paraphernalia, a large quantity of gang photos and eight cellular phones. … The 13 people arrested were each charged with conspiracy to possess cocaine and crack cocaine with intent to distribute, Suddaby said:" The Observer-Dispatch notes, "The investigation included officers from the Oneida County Drug Task Force, which encompasses the Utica, Rome and New Hartford police departments, as well as the Oneida County Sheriff's Office, state police and the FBI. Assisting in the investigation were the U.S. Marshals Service, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the state Office of Parole."

Selig Defends Handling Of Baseball's Steroid Investigation. The AP (4/5) reports baseball Commissioner Bud Selig "defended his choice of George Mitchell to head baseball's steroid investigation, saying the former Senate Majority Leader has independence. Selig brushed off criticism that Mitchell is too much of an insider for the job -- Mitchell is a director of the Boston Red Sox and chairman of The Walt Disney Co., a national broadcaster of baseball and the network airing Barry Bonds' new reality show. … The investigation is already under way and has no time limit." The AP reports Selig said Mitchell has "complete autonomy" in the investigation.

Bonds TV Show Debuts On ESPN2. The AP (4/5) reports, "'Bonds on Bonds' debuted Tuesday night on ESPN2, opening with footage of fans booing, a syringe being thrown at the San Francisco Giants' slugger and announcers discussing the steroid allegations on opening day in San Diego. 'If it makes them happy to go out of their way to destroy me or whatever they want to try to do, go right ahead. It doesn't bother me,' Bonds said. 'You can't hurt me anymore than you've already hurt me. You can't hurt my family anymore than you've already hurt them.'"

Alleged Minnesota Courthouse Bombing Plot Uncovered. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/5, Franklin, Furst) reports, "A plot to blow up the Rice County Courthouse and law enforcement center and perhaps kill several public officials has been uncovered, authorities said Monday." The Tribune continues, "Law enforcement officials said they recovered two propane tanks, the type used with outdoor grills, that appeared to be filled with explosives made of diesel oil and fertilizer -- similar to those used to blow up the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City 11 years ago." The Tribune adds, "Each of the 62-pound devices 'probably could kill everybody here,' Rice County Sheriff Richard Cook said Monday at a news conference. … No timetable for the plot was discovered, Cook said, but 'we believe there was some urgency.'" The Tribune notes, "Allan Weatherford, 44, who lives on a farm near Kenyon, Minn., is being held in lieu of $1 million bail after being charged with seven counts of attempted arson, possession of explosives and being a felon in possession of firearms. … His brother Mark, 34, was jailed last month on an unrelated charge of reckless discharge of a firearm. … The investigation was conducted by the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, FBI, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, State Patrol, Department of Natural Resources, Faribault and Northfield police departments and Bloomington police bomb squad."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Under Pressure To Intervene In Stalled Senate Immigration Debate. The AP (4/5, Espo) reports the Senate "skirmished inconclusively over immigration legislation Tuesday, with Republicans deeply divided over provisions relating to millions of illegal immigrants and Democrats maneuvering to avoid politically difficult votes on border security." The Bush Administration "renewed its call for legislation that includes a temporary worker program to go 'hand in hand with efforts to secure the border.'" For "their part, Democrats made a show of support for legislation that emerged from the Judiciary Committee more than a week ago."

However, the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) reports that with the Senate "at an impasse," Bush "faces growing pressure to intercede more aggressively if he is to salvage a landmark immigration bill and move it into negotiations with the House." Sen. Mike DeWine said, "He's got to get more involved. I'm not sure where we're going, if we're going at all." The Journal adds, "Hoping to force the president's hand, Democrats broke custom and jumped ahead of the Republican leadership last night by filing a petition to force a vote tomorrow on cutting off debate." Minority Whip Richard Durbin "predicted Democrats can deliver close to 40 votes themselves." The Journal adds there "were signals from the White House that Mr. Bush may speak out on the issue today."

Roll Call (4/5, Stanton) reports Senate agreement "remained elusive Tuesday," and "GOP lawmakers have all but abandoned the committee's plan to grant guest worker status to all 12 million illegal workers." The New York Times (4/5, Swarns, 1.19M) reports Senate Republicans "who support legislation that would legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants said Tuesday that they lacked enough support to bring the measure to a vote this week and were working on a more limited compromise that would rally a broader cross-section of Republicans." Democrats, "angered by what they viewed as Republican efforts to gut the legislation, responded by using a parliamentary tactic to force lawmakers to decide Thursday whether the bill should be considered for a vote on the Senate floor." Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "warned that the Democratic maneuver might result in the demise of his bill."

DOJ_NMG_0025233

CQ (4/4, Sandler, Crowley) reports Minority Leader Reid "brought the immigration debate on the Senate floor to a standstill Tuesday, refusing to allow votes on Republican amendments and instead forcing a procedural one to cut off debate on legislation that would allow illegal immigrants in the country to stay and earn citizenship." Majority Leader Bill Frist "called Reid's actions 'disrespectful.' Specter described them as a 'travesty.' And a red-faced Pete V. Domenici, R-N.M., told the chamber Reid 'should not do this, and the Senate should not let him do this.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Reynolds, Gaouette) says that "in essence, Democrats -- who generally favor less restrictive treatment of illegal immigrants than many Republicans do -- sought to take advantage of GOP divisions by forcing a vote on the relatively moderate approach now on the Senate floor before the Republican majority could hammer out an agreement ,:

McCain Says He Lacks Votes To Prevent Filibuster. The AP (4/5, Gamboa) reports supporters "of a guest worker program that would let illegal immigrants stay in the United States said Tuesday they don't have enough Senate votes to overcome objections from conservatives who oppose the measure on grounds it amounts to amnesty." Sen. John McCain said "a majority in the 100-member Senate support his and Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's proposal to provide green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the U.S. for six years." But McCain said he "doesn't have" the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster.

McCain's comments sparked local TV coverage. KTVK-TV Phoenix (4/4, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "Senator John McCain says he doesn't have the votes to pass a measure giving green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the US for six years."

KCNC-TV Denver (4/4, 10:13 p.m.) reported, "McCain says lawmakers are working on a compromise that give green cards of those in the U.S. for six years. President Bush urged lawmakers to include the guest worker program."

KSL-TV Salt Lake City (4/4, 6:31 p.m.) reported, "Senator John McCain says there aren't enough votes in Congress to pass a guest worker program that would let immigrants remain. Protesters across the country have demonstrated against tightening the country's immigration laws. President Bush backs a guest worker program with you conservatives say letting illegal immigrants stay amounts to amnesty. They are working to a compromise to give green cards to immigrants who have been in the U.S. at least six years."

McCain, Kyl Split Seen As Emblematic Of GOP Rift On Immigration. The Washington Post (4/5, A5, Babington, 744K) reports the divergent positions taken on immigration by Sen. John McCain and Jon Kyl of Arizona epitomizes "the divisions" in the Senate GOP caucus. Both "face important elections and represent the same 5.8 million people. But they are leading the two main opposing approaches that Republican senators will have to reconcile if Congress is to address border security, illegal worker status, deportation practices and other issues." McCain "is the chief sponsor of legislation that would give millions of illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship if they pay fines and back taxes, learn English, stay employed and do not break laws." Kyl, "facing a potentially strong Democratic challenger this fall in his bid for a third term, is a key proponent of a guest-worker program that would require undocumented workers to return to their countries when their visas expire, a move that critics call unrealistic."

Democrats Prevent Vote On Provision To Bar Felons From Citizenship. The Washington Times (4/5, Hurt, 90K) reports Senate Democrats "refused to allow consideration of an amendment yesterday that would bar illegal aliens convicted of felonies from obtaining U.S. citizenship." Democrats said the "amendment would 'gut' the immigration bill under consideration in the Senate and refused to allow a vote on it."

McCain Booed At Union Speech Over Immigration Bill. The Washington Times/AP (4/5) reports that during remarks to the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department, Sen. John McCain "threatened yesterday to cut short a speech to union leaders who booed his immigration views and challenged his statements on organized labor and the Iraq war." McCain said, "If you like, I will leave." The Times adds McCain "had been outlining his position on the Senate immigration debate, saying tougher border enforcement must be accompanied by guest-worker provisions that give undocumented aliens a legal path toward citizenship. Murmurs from the crowd turned to booing."

Jeb Bush Says Immigration Debate's Tone "Hurtful" To Himself, Wife. The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Wallsten, 958K) reports, "Accusing politicians of 'pounding their chests' on immigration for short-term political gain, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday that the tone of the debate had been 'hurtful' to him and his Mexican-born wife, Columba." Bush "reserved some of his sharpest criticism for conservatives in his own Republican Party, calling it 'just plain wrong" to charge illegal immigrants with a felony, as a provision passed by the Republican-led House would do. He also opposed 'penalizing the children of illegal immigrants' by denying them U.S. citizenship, an idea backed by some conservatives but not included in the legislation." Gov. Bush wrote in an email, "My wife came here legally, but it hurts her just as it hurts me when people give the perception that all immigrants are bad."

DOJ_NMG_0025234

Evangelical Christians Split On Immigration Bill. The Washington Post (4/5, A4, Cooperman, 744K) reports more than "50 evangelical Christian leaders and organizations voiced their support yesterday for an immigration bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become U.S. citizens without returning to their native countries." The statement "marks a deepening split among evangelicals over immigration. It was signed by a mixture of Hispanic and white church groups. But most of the nation's large, politically influential evangelical organizations either back rival legislation that focuses on border enforcement and the deportation of illegal immigrants, or have been silent on the issue." Hispanic evangelical leaders said "they have received support from Roman Catholic, Jewish and Muslim groups, but have been bitterly disappointed by the response of most of their fellow evangelicals, both white and black."

Municipalities Taking Contradictory Stands. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Wood, 61K) reports on the contradictory stands taken by the California towns of Maywood, "population 45,000 and 96 percent Latino…a self-proclaimed 'sanctuary' for illegal immigrants," and Costa Mesa, "population 110,000 and one-third Latino," which "is examining ways to train some of its police force to help US immigration officials identify illegals."

Immigration Advocates Set Date For 63-City Rally. The Washington Times (4/5, Summers, Seper, 90K) reports, "Immigration advocates yesterday announced plans for a 63-city rally on Monday that they hope will attract at least 2 million supporters to protest pending immigration reform legislation and press lawmakers into granting millions of current illegal aliens a path toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship." The advocates "also called for a nationwide one-day boycott of work, school and shopping May 1 to protest the House and the Senate immigration reform bills."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Kang, Jordan, 2.11M) reports that to "build on a movement that attracted as many as 500,000 protesters in cities like Los Angeles last month, a new round of demonstrations is set for Monday in an attempt to keep pressure on the immigration issue and broaden the base of support." Turnout is "hard to predict given that the events take place on a Monday rather than the previous Saturday protests. But the events could be disruptive to normal business operations in places where Hispanics are a major part of the work force -- everything from the hotel and restaurant industries to construction and agriculture." In a move that could add "to the impact," organizers "now are aggressively reaching out to other ethnic groups that are affected by the immigration debate, including Koreans and Chinese."

Immigration Debate Draws Attention To 1930s Deportation Of Mexicans. USA Today (4/5, 1A, Koch, 2.31M) reports on the "almost-forgotten story of a 1930s anti-immigrant campaign. Tens of thousands — and possibly more than 400,000 — of Mexicans and Mexican-Americans were pressured, through raids and job denials, to leave the USA, according to a USA TODAY review of documents and interviews with historians and deportees. Many, mostly children, were U.S. citizens." On Thursday, Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., "plans to introduce a bill in the U.S. House that calls for a commission to study the 'deportation and coerced emigration' of U.S. citizens and legal residents. The panel would also recommend remedies that could include reparations. 'An apology should be made,' she says."

Enhanced Border Security Likely To Strain Border Patrol. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Bowers, 61K) reports that "up and down the 2,000-mile border, the US government is throwing more manpower and sophisticated technology into slowing illegal entries into the US. But as it does, immigrants are showing greater ingenuity in circumventing the barriers and patrols." As Congress "considers another overhaul of immigration laws, the encounters and clashes along the border are likely to intensify. Most of the bills in Congress include provisions to expand the border patrol (now part of US Customs and Border Protection), which has already seen agent strength along the nation's southern flank more than double since 9/11, to 11,000. The result is an agency that is becoming increasingly complex and unwieldy."

NYTimes Critical Of Martinez-Hagel Compromise Offer. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the McCain-Kennedy immigration bill, "revised and passed last month by the Senate Judiciary Committee" combines "sensibly, tighter borders with a path to citizenship for people here illegally." While it "has enough votes to pass, it may not have enough to avoid a filibuster by hard-core Republicans. For them, anything other than punishment and border enforcement smacks unforgivably of forgiveness." Sens. Mel Martinez and Chuck Hagel "are offering a 'fallback' compromise if the committee bill fails. They would not eliminate the citizenship track, but narrow it severely." But the "Martinez-Hagel compromise is a bad idea. It's tempting to think flawed reform is better than none, but the wiser approach is to stand firm for what Mr. Kennedy has called 'the real enchilada.'"

Guest Worker Concept Criticized. In a USA Today op-ed (4/5), syndicated columnist Ruben Navarrette says, "Politicians keep pushing 'guest worker' programs, even though the concept is built to fail and always does." Navarrette says he is "talking about importing hundreds of thousands of new foreign workers from a country such as Mexico to work in farming, construction, hotels or restaurants. That's what Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has proposed as part of a reform bill that his Judiciary Committee put together and which serves as a starting point for the Senate immigration debate." The US government has "turned to foreign workers before. And given that these programs are often criticized as indentured servitude, it's ironic that the person who kicked off the phenomenon also freed the slaves." Congress "should forget about importing new guest workers, or granting a wholesale amnesty to all 12 million illegal workers already here, and focus on reforms that stand a chance of working."

DOJ_NMG_0025235

Immigration Reform May Lead To "Awakening" For Latino Voters. In a USA Today op-ed (4/5), freelance writer Marisa Treviño says the numbers of protesters at demonstrations opposed to immigration reforms aimed at enhancing enforcement show "an awakening. Political pundits and community activists say the prospect of congressional action on immigration reform has stirred up the Latino community." Though "12 million is a huge number of people, it pales in comparison with the 28 million Latinos in the USA who already have access to public services, health care, car insurance, among other taken-for-granted rights that come with legal status. These are the people who must be stirred to action." Undocumented immigrants "can't vote. They can make a lot of noise; they can't make a difference in a politician's future. But there are at least 15 million eligible Hispanic voters, and they can — if only they'd wield the full force of their votes."

Estimates Of Illegal Immigrants Vary Widely. In his Wall Street Journal column (4/5), Carl Bialik says estimates of the numbers of illegal immigrants "remain fuzzy and full of pitfalls, even as lawmakers toss them around in the latest round of debates over whether to offer guest-worker status to illegal immigrants. At the core of the problem is the fact that undocumented immigrants don't generally come forward to be counted. The most widely quoted estimate of 11 million to 12 million is derived indirectly, using what's called a residual method: Researchers subtract the number of immigrants who were authorized to come to the U.S. from the number of foreign-born residents counted by the Census Bureau, then adjust the number using estimates of immigrants' deaths and migration, and of Census undercounting. Some critics say that estimate understates the degree of undercounting: Another estimate making the rounds holds that there are 20 million illegal immigrants."

More Commentary. In his Washington Post column (4/5, A23), Robert Samuelson says, "The immigration debate has become an exercise in political public relations, often disconnected from practical realities. Republicans and Democrats are trying in different ways to appease middle-class anxieties without alienating present and future Hispanic voters. The one saving grace is that we may still have time to fashion a more sensible consensus." Samuelson calls for strengthening "border and employer enforcement," granting "amnesty to existing illegal immigrants," and forgetting "guest workers."

In his New York Times column (4/5), Thomas Friedman says, "Personally, I favor a very high fence, with a very big gate. So far, neither President Bush's proposal to allow the nation's millions of illegal immigrants to stay temporarily on work visas, nor the most hard-line G.O.P. counterproposal, which focuses only on border security, leaves me satisfied. We need a better blend of the two -- a blend that will keep America the world's greatest magnet for immigrants." Because of "its deeply rooted culture of immigration, the US has a huge advantage in such a world. If we are smart, we can still cream off the most first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world — more than any other country -- and bring that talent to our shores to start companies and work in others."

TAX:

California Anti-Tax Activist Sentenced. The AP (4/5) reports, "Nationally known anti-tax crusader George Henry 'Nick' Jesson will serve 27 months in prison for tax fraud, a judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson on Monday also ordered Jesson, 55, to pay $215,454 in restitution to the federal government. The Fountain Valley resident, who ran for California governor in 2002, was taken into custody after his sentencing." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Brown said she believes the sentence was 'wholly appropriate' and would deter others from considering anti-tax protests." The AP adds, "Jesson pleaded guilty last June to filing a false federal tax form in May 2000. He had stated that his Huntington Beach company, No Time Delay Electronics, paid no wages in 1997 when he actually paid wages of $177,083 that year to himself and $273,236 to his wife. He also admitted to falsely obtaining a business tax refund of $215,454. … Jesson and his wife face trial in state court on six felony counts of failing to pay taxes on $3 million in income from 1997 to 1999. Jesson could get nine more years in prison and his wife a seven-year sentence if they're convicted of all counts."

GAO Finds Widespread Errors By Tax Preparers. A GAO report presented yesterday to the Senate Finance Committee notes persistent problems of tax preparers cheating on clients' returns. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Herman, Matthews, 2.11M) reports the GAO report "detailed undercover visits by government investigators to 19 outlets of several commercial tax-preparation chains, which weren't identified. Staffers posed as taxpayers and asked the firms to prepare -- but not file -- federal returns under two scenarios. In 10 of the 19 cases, preparers failed to report side income that had been supplied by the taxpayer, the GAO report said. Some preparers also missed key tax-saving opportunities, such as neglecting to itemize deductions or failing to claim all available deductions, it said."

DOJ_NMG_0025236

The Washington Post (4/5, D2, Crenshaw, 744K) reports that the errors sometimes amounted "to more than $1,000 in incorrect refunds and overpayments." The GAO study "was small -- only 19 returns, which the GAO cautioned cannot be used to generalize to the entire commercial return-preparation industry -- but on only two returns did the preparer produce what the agency determined was the right amount. And even those two had mistakes, though they did not A affect the final tax amount."

NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 4, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported a "government study out today that documents some of the ways commercial tax preparers are doing their customers a disservice, including making significant mistakes on returns and charging taxpayers more than they should." NBC (Thompson) added, "The problems government investigators found with major tax preparer chains were widespread -- high rates for instant refunds and high fees you might not expect to pay." Sen. Max Baucus, Montana: "Frankly, I was amazed at the degree of incompetence, of unprofessionalism." Thompson: "More than half of the tax preparers the GAO visited urged people to underreport side income, the key, the GAO says, behind those high fees." And "then there are those instant refund loans. The GAO found they're often targeted to low-income taxpayers." While "the tax chains have been sued many times over these additional fees, they are legal."

Richest Americans Said To Be Reaping Windfall From Investment Tax Cuts. As Congress debates whether to make permanent President Bush's tax cuts, the New York Times (4/5, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "The first data to document the effect of...cuts for investment income show that they have significantly lowered the tax burden on the richest Americans, reducing taxes on incomes of more than $10 million by an average of about $500,000. An analysis of Internal Revenue Service data by The New York Times found that the benefit of the lower taxes on investments was far more concentrated on the very wealthiest Americans than the benefits of Mr. Bush's two previous tax cuts: on wages and other non-investment income." According to the Times, "When Congress cut investment taxes three years ago, it was clear that the highest-income Americans would gain the most, because they had the most money in investments. But the size of the cuts and what share goes to each income group have not been known."

Wealthiest Families Increase Share Of US Net Worth. New Federal Reserve figures indicate that the share of net worth held by the wealthiest 1% of American families rose slightly between 2001 and 2004. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The top 1% held 33.4% of the nation's net worth in 2004, up from 32.7% in 2001, but still lower than a peak of 34.6% in 1995. Although the increase from 2001 is small, the data suggest that the upper strata, who saw their share of net worth decline between 1998 and 2001 as stock prices crashed, regained some of those losses by 2004."

Economists Worry Real Estate Slowdown Could Hurt Broader Economy. Economists are concerned that the housing slowdown that began late last year will hurt the broader economy more than past downturns because the economy is more dependent on housing now than it has been in n50 years. The Washington Post (4/5, D1, Irwin, 744K) reports, "By almost any measure, the U.S. economy is built on housing more than in the past. In 2005, investment in housing constituted a higher proportion of the goods and services the nation produced than it has since 1950, when the nation was experiencing a massive postwar housing boom. The proportion of jobs in real-estate-related fields is the highest it has been since at least 1970. … Now the companies that have benefited from this expansion are bracing for the great unwinding. The nation appears to be entering a period in which the role of housing in the economy is returning to something more resembling its historical norms."

2000 Fed Transcripts Said To Hold Important Lessons. Newly released transcripts show that Federal Reserve officials were bullish on tech spending through most of 2000 and may have delayed easing monetary policy out of concern for reinflating stock and bond markets. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Ip, 2.11M) reports, "Transcripts of the Fed's deliberations through 2000, released with the customary lag yesterday, offer some lessons for today. Like in 2000, the Fed has been raising interest rates to stave off inflation. In 2000, the economy was being propelled by surging tech spending and high stock prices. Housing plays a similar role today. An important difference is that in part because of the lessons of 2000, the Fed is on the alert for any downdraft in housing."

Stocks Post Gains. Stocks gained Tuesday as investors were "cheered by the potential" for increased merger activity, the AP (4/5) reports. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 58.91 points to 11,203.85. The Nasdaq gained 8.62 points to 2345.36, its best close since Feb. 16, 2001, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 8.12 points to close at 1305.93.

DOJ_NMG_0025237

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Comments Fuel Speculation Snow Resignation Imminent. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, fueling speculation that Treasury Secretary John Snow will depart soon, offered only muted support for the former railroad executive when asked whether he is likely to survive an expected staff shake-up. With Mr. Snow sitting next to him at a conference on health savings accounts, Mr. Bush said the Treasury secretary 'has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service.'" But "he said nothing to squash widespread talk that Mr. Snow is likely to be replaced." There has been "widespread speculation for months that Mr. Snow, who succeeded Paul O'Neill in February 2003, will leave before the end of this year." The Journal says "speculation" points to Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council and "a longtime friend of the president," as Snow's replacement. Other "possibilities include US Trade Representative Rob Portman, a former Ohio congressman; and Steve Friedman, a former Goldman Sachs executive."

The New York Times (4/5, Bumiller, 1.19M) headlines its story "Treasury Secretary Is Said To Be Thinking Of Quitting," and reports Snow "has expressed interest in leaving his job in the next several months, a person close to him said Tuesday, as speculation raced through Washington that the White House was seeking Mr. Snow's replacement." Bush "did little to tamp down the talk." The Times adds, "When Mr. Bush has been asked in the past about whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would remain in his job, he has spoken out more forcefully and enthusiastically." The Times says "names circulating in Republican circles as possibilities for the Treasury job include Stanley O'Neal, the chairman and chief executive of Merrill Lynch, and Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs." The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) runs a similar report in its "In the Loop" column.

The AP (4/5, Riechmann) reports Bush "dodged questions Tuesday about whether he would keep…Snow in his Cabinet but said he was eager to hear recommendations for change from his new chief of staff. Some staff changes are expected when Joshua Bolten...moves into the West Wing." Bush is quoted as saying, "I told Josh that he is -- will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs. ... And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people." The AP goes on to report, "Republicans close to the White House say they expect changes in Bush's communications, congressional relations and domestic policy shops." Headed by Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, "the political team...is believed to be immune to change." Rumors about Snow's departure "created an awkward moment for Bush in the Roosevelt Room, where Bush discussed his initiative for health savings accounts. When a reporter asked Bush whether Snow was expected to remain in the Cabinet, the president noted that Snow was in the room. ... But he did not say whether Snow would stay."

Justice Kennedy Decries Congressional Effort To Force High Court Cameras. The Legal Times (4/5, Mauro) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy pushed back strongly Tuesday against a bill pending in the Senate that would require the Court to televise its proceedings. … 'Mandating direct televised proceedings would be inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches,' Kennedy said in response to questions from House members at the Court's annual budget hearing Tuesday. 'We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts.'" The Times continues, "Kennedy also spoke out forcefully in favor of a pay raise for federal judges, warning that the failure by Congress to pass salary increases is 'assuming the proportions of an historic wrong.'" The Times adds, "Every spring, justices go before a House Appropriations subcommittee seeking approval for the Court's annual budget, which next year will total $76.4 million if passed. It is a rare and often illuminating encounter between branches, with House members asking pointed questions that put justices on the spot about a range of issues. … There was some of that on Tuesday, but to an unusual degree the hearing became a platform for Kennedy and Justice Clarence Thomas to vent about actions or inactions by Congress on matters of deep interest to the high court."

The New York Times (3/5, Greenhouse) reports that Kennedy and Clarence Thomas, appearing before the House Appropriations subcommittee on transportation, treasury, judiciary, and housing and urban development on Tuesday to discuss the court's budget request, were asked by several panel members for their opinions on the issue of allowing television cameras in the high court. The Times notes that last year, Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter (R), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "introduced a bill to require the Supreme Court to permit its arguments to be televised unless a majority of the justices voted to bar television on a case-by-case basis." Justice Kennedy "said it raised a 'sensitive point' about the constitutional separation of powers. 'It's not for the court to tell Congress how to conduct its proceedings,' and the reverse was also true, he said. He added, 'We feel very strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the mood of the court, and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches.'" Justice Thomas warned "that television in the courtroom would have a negative impact on the argument sessions. 'It runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases,' he said. He added that some members of the court 'feel more strongly than others,' but that all agreed that the court should decide the issue for itself."

DOJ_NMG_0025238

Spellings Defends No Child Left Behind Act. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M), Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings pans a March 24 editorial that criticized the No Child Left Behind program. She writes, "Few voices have been stronger in support of education reform over the years than your editorial page. Which is why it troubles me to have to respond to your March 24 editorial 'Spellings Test.' Instead of challenging reform's opponents, you found fault with its best friend. The Bush administration led the charge to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, the strongest educational accountability measure ever instituted." Through the program, "the Department of Education has challenged states that have tried to water down or wriggle out of its provisions. And we have been immovable on the 'bright line' goals of the law." Spellings continues, "We welcome everyone's effort to use the latest data in support of closing the achievement gap" but "the bottom line is that none of this activity would be happening without the No Child Left Behind Act. It has done more than raise test scores and narrow the achievement gap. It has shone a bright light on the entire public education system, so that parents are no longer kept in the dark."

Senators Will No Longer Block Highway Nominee. The Long Island Newsday/AP (4/5, De La Cruz) reports, "New Jersey's two Democratic senators on Tuesday said they will lift their block on President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after the agency agreed to give the state more than $150 million for transportation projects that had been in jeopardy because of a new rule. Sens. Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez placed a hold last week on Richard Capka's nomination to head the FHA, alleging that the agency was rescinding approvals that allowed New Jersey to spread costs for transportation projects over several years." Lautenberg is quoted as saying, "The Bush administration has blinked and promised to provide the rest of New Jersey's highway money for this year and the amount we have requested for 2007."

Boehner Says Budget Should Get To Floor This Week. Roll Call (4/5, Yachnin) reports, "Although the House Rules Committee postponed its vote Tuesday evening on setting the debate for fiscal 2007 budget resolution, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) insisted that the measure will reach the House floor before Members depart for the two-week Easter recess. 'It will be a tough sell. We will get there,' Boehner said at a Tuesday press conference. ... 'Listen, we are going to do the budget this week. It is going to mean a lot of conversations and a lot of honest dialogue.'" Although "members of the conservative Republican Study Committee have criticized the budget resolution, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the group's chairman, has said that the group could support the matter in exchange for leadership support of a quartet of reform proposals. ... 'I'm satisfied that negotiations are moving along,' Pence said. 'We're encouraged by the progress.'"

Centrist GOP House Members Seek Spending Increases. The Hill (4/5, Young) reports, "Three House Republicans yesterday introduced a substitute to the budget resolution that would boost discretionary spending. The centrists hope to match the success of their Senate counterparts and increase money for education, health and the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) by $7.16 billion above the resolution marked up by Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa). GOP Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Dave Reichert (Wash.) sponsored the substitute amendment." The three "are hopeful that the Rules Committee will allow their amendment to proceed to the floor, Castle spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk said."

Both Parties Jostle For Advantage As DeLay Announces Resignation. Much of the coverage of Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement that he will leave Congress within the next few weeks focuses on its implications for the midterm elections. Both parties offered their analysis on DeLay's resignation. The CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M) reported National Republican Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Thomas Reynolds, reacting to the news, said "DeLay…robbed Democrats of their best issue." Reynolds was shown saying, "I don't know what their national strategy would be. They don't have Tom DeLay to kick around anymore." In an interview on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), DeLay cast his departure as a positive development for Republicans in his Texas district and across the nation. Asked to point to one reason for his resignation. DeLay said, "The Republican majority. I've worked a long time building that majority, and helping build it, and work on it, and my constituents deserve a Republican to represent the 22nd District and now we'll have one."

Democrats disagree about the development's national impact. DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel said on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), "The whole campaign is about change versus the status quo and the philosophy that….DeLay represented is still in play here." DeLay's "philosophy is the operative philosophy of the Republican Party." DNC Chairman Howard

DOJ_NMG_0025239

Dean echoed those views on CNN's The Situation Room (4/4). Asked if DeLay's resignation is good or bad for the Democrats, Dean said, "It's very good for the country. There's an awful lot of corruption, not just, of course, Tom DeLay, but Bill Frist, the leader of the Senate is under investigation for insider trading. Karl Rove still has his…security clearance, despite the fact that he has leaked information to the CIA -- for the CIA identifications in a time of war. The vice president's chief of staff is under indictment. So, this is a very deep problem, this Republican culture of corruption."

Media reports describe Republicans, including the President, as "relieved" DeLay will not be running this November. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Bash) reported that "privately even some of DeLay's Republican colleagues are relieved today, some saying that fair or not, he did put a cloud of scandal over the Republicans here on the Hill that they hope now they can get out from under." CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Henry) later said, "There are absolutely no tears being shed here at the White House." DeLay "was radioactive politically. And, in fact, when the duo spoke yesterday by phone, when DeLay gave the President a head's up about this decision, there was no sign that the President tried to talk him out of it." The Washington Times (4/5, Hallow, Fagan, 90K) reports that yesterday, White House spokesman Scott McClellan was "asked whether Mr. Bush regrets the decision by his key political ally." McClellan said, "The president respects his decision. This was a decision that Congressman DeLay made." The AP (4/5, Espo) quotes Bush saying yesterday, "I wish him all the best. It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas." The Hill (4/5, O'Connor) notes DeLay's decision "coincides with a similar shakeup at the White House, where the president's chief of staff for the past five years offered his resignation last week."

The New York Times (4/5, Hulse, Shenon, 1.19M) reports that "privately, some senior Republicans said Mr. DeLay should have acted months ago," when lobbying Jack Abramoff "entered his guilty plea and when Mr. DeLay abandoned plans to try to regain the majority leader post he vacated after being indicted in Texas." The Times adds, "Party strategists said his decision not to seek re-election could ease the way for other embattled Republicans, with Democrats losing a prime target for their claims of widespread corruption."

Media reports are split on the political implications of the resignation, but most agree that Republicans remain in deep political trouble. Knight Ridder (4/5, Thomma) reports DeLay's "decision to retire from Congress will do little to help his embattled party retain control of the legislature in November's elections and won't erase his image as a poster child for corruption." It "leaves unchanged the larger dynamics of this year's congressional elections: deep dissatisfaction with President Bush, the war in Iraq and problems in the Republican base over such issues as immigration and federal spending." USA Today (4/5, Drinkard, 2.31M) also says "analysts saw few silver linings for the GOP," and the Baltimore Sun (4/5, Davis, Shaw, 296K), under the headline "DeLay's Decision Fuels GOP Concerns," says the congressman's move "underscored broader concerns among some Republican strategists that the still-unfolding corruption charges could cost other vulnerable lawmakers their seats this year." And "Democrats promised a push to make Republican scandals a signature theme of the elections."

USA Today (4/5, Page, Wolf, 2.31M) asks, "Is a tidal wave gathering?," and adds DeLay's announcement "signaled what Democrats hope for and Republicans fear: that Democrats could be swept into power in November by the sort of political tsunami that helped Republicans win control of Congress in 1994. 'We know that there's a hurricane coming, and it's going to hit the Republicans in November,' says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report. 'We're just trying to figure out how big this thing is.'" ABC World News Tonight (4/4, story 3, 3:20, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) offered a similar analysis of DeLay's move, saying the Texan "is a good politician. A lot of people say he sees the writing on the wall. He sees a political tsunami coming."

On NBC Nightly News (4/4, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert seemed to agree that DeLay's move did not significantly help Republicans, "The legal process is going to continue to play out. Two DeLay aides already pleading guilty, another may about to do the same. This is going to involve sentencing, testimony, a whole lot more of bad news coming for the Republicans." Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the House Minority Leader, was shown saying, "This isn't just about Tom DeLay, although he's the ringleader. It's about the Republicans in Congress who enabled and benefited from this corruption."

MSNBC's Hardball (4/4, Matthews) reported, "The political future for the White House and Republicans in Congress is dodgey." Bob Shrum, also on MSNBC's Hardball (4/4), said, "We'll see a referendum on George Bush on the war in Iraq which will hurt the Republicans and Tom DeLay is the tip of the iceberg here. He's the father of the culture of corruption. But his getting out of the way is not going to remove this."

The Financial Times (4/5, Alden, Kirchgaessner) reports "a senior lobbyist with close ties to the Republican party said the resignation would likely have little impact on the Senate races this year, or on the 2008 presidential elections, but said it could hurt House Republicans. 'If you are a Republican running for the House in 2006, there is an impact,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0025240

Some analysts, however, think DeLay's departure will help Republicans. The Philadelphia Inquirer (4/5, Polman, 423K) quotes Larry Sabato, "a nonpartisan political analyst who closely tracks voter behavior, said by phone yesterday: 'If DeLay had stayed in his reelection race, there would have been 1,000 headlines this fall about "Tom DeLay's hot race and his battle to survive." He has eliminated those headlines now. He did his party a favor. Now a different Republican can run and keep that seat for the Republicans. And every seat matters this year.'" Sabato "questions whether the Democrats can get traction with the corruption issue, now that 'their poster boy is off the wall.'"

Roll Call (4/5, Pershing) runs a similar report under the headline "DeLay's Departure A Relief For GOP," and says "with DeLay's announcement, the expected passage of 527 reform this week and consideration of a broader lobbying reform package coming after the Easter recess, House Republicans hope to finally get ahead of the ethics stories that have plagued them for the entire election cycle." The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Mullins, Rogers, 2.11M) also reports, "DeLay's decision to leave Congress is a wake-up call to his colleagues that anti-Washington sentiment is running high, which may dictate quick action on ethics legislation. … Now some Republicans say Mr. DeLay's resignation offers an incentive to act." A similar Washington Times (4/5, Bellantoni, 90K) story says "proponents of stricter lobbying laws say the resignation of embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay underscores the urgent need for reform."

CNN senior political correspondent Candy Crowley said on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (4/4), "What DeLay said, which is look, this is -- was going to be a tough election. We might lose this seat, and probably any other Republican would win it easily. Republicans are not at a place at this point in the election year when they can afford to lose any seat." Pat Buchanan said on MSNBC's Scarborough Country (4/4), "No question about it, the Republican party is going to feel better off having Tom out of there. It's better for him, better for the party."

Tom DeLay's resignation was covered by hundreds of local televisions newscasts. Often, the story noted his former aide Tony Rudy had just pleaded guilty on Abramoff related charges and that Republicans may benefit from his resignation. Some examples: WXYZ-TV Detroit (4/4, 11:36 p.m.) reported, "The bigger they are, the harder they fall. And for a decade, no one in Washington was bigger than Tom Delay." DeLay "had become a political liability for his party, as Democrats painted Tom Delay as the poster child for Washington corruption." KPNX-TV Phoenix (4/4, 4:35 p.m.) said "House Republicans are actually cheering the move saying it should give the GOP a boost with the November elections just seven months a way." KTXL-TV Sacramento (4/4, 10:18 p.m.) reported, "Analysts say the GOP is relieved."

WKYC-TV Cleveland (4/4, 11:15 p.m.) reported, "A number of Republicans were pressuring DeLay to step down." Meanwhile, WJZ-TV Baltimore (4/4, 6:43 p.m.) reported, "Democrats say that the resignation is the latest sign that the GOP is weakening and will not maintain control of Congress in the next election."

KHOU-TV Houston (4/4, 5:03 p.m.) reported, "Our political expert said even with the controversy around DeLay, the state of Texas has benefited because of the power of DeLay and it will be missed. It has been a long time since a Texan has not been running their party and that will hurt us."

The AP (4/5, Raum) calls DeLay "a symbol of the widening ethics scandal that now clouds GOP prospects for continued control. … 'It's hard to believe that in just 12 years, Republicans could end up in the same situation that it took Democrats 40 years to get in,' said Republican strategist Frank Luntz."

DeLay Says Democrats Are Criminalizing Politics. Rep. Tom DeLay was asked on Fox News' Special Report (4/4) about Democratic claims that his resignation will not stop the Republican "culture of corruption." DeLay said, "I don't think they understand it. There is no cultural corruption except theirs, lying about me, trying to work with an outrageous district attorney and being indicted on laws that don't exist. … They themselves announced this whole politics of personal destruction, criminalizing politics. That I think is a culture of corruption."

The Houston Chronicle (4/5, Mack, Mason, 581K) says DeLay "decided more than a week ago to resign his seat, disappointed with the margin of his Republican primary victory and looking at poll numbers that showed he might lose the seat in November, he said today." DeLay said in an interview with Sam Malone on KTRH-AM (740) that "he 'should have done better' than his 62 percent showing against four challengers in the March 7 primary." The Washington Post (4/5, A1, Smith, Weisman, 744K) reports DeLay "had considered resigning on several occasions over the past four months." But "he waited until after he had vanquished his challengers in the Republican primary to deny them the chance to become his successor, associates said."

The Dallas Morning News (4/5, Gillman) reports DeLay said he "hopes to put his talents to work pushing the conservative cause – without the trappings of power, the duties of high office or, perhaps, the huge political bull's-eye on his back. … 'I have a lot of friends in the conservative movement,' Mr. DeLay told MSNBC's Hardball in one of a handful of interviews he gave Tuesday. 'They value my talents, and they listen to me. I think I can work with them.'"

National Review online (4/4) last night ran a story on a "a long discussion with conservative journalists Tuesday afternoon." DeLay "attributed many of his problems to Ronnie Earle, the Texas county district attorney who has indicted DeLay on campaign-finance charges. 'He used this case to drag my name through the mud,' DeLay said, 'and he has abused the grand jury-process to drag my name through the mud.' The problem, DeLay explained, was the interplay of Earle's investigation and a House GOP rule that requires members of the leadership to step down if they are indicted. 'I truly believe that the only reason I was indicted is because we have that stupid rule -- that is, politically, the stupidest thing we've ever done,' DeLay said." NBC Nightly News (4/4, lead story, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) also reported DeLay "says the Texas charges are a political vendetta and that the allegations involving Abramoff are guilt by association." However, said the CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Borger, 7.66M), "Despite DeLay's public confidence, legal experts say the Justice Department is circling him."

DOJ_NMG_0025241

DeLay Eligible For $65,000 Annual Pension. The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that resigning Rep. Tom DeLay "should do well in the private sector -- as long as he doesn't get convicted of anything serious." In addition to the "immensely profitable" speaking circuit, DeLay is "eligible for a pension of a bit over one-third of his $183,500 majority leader's salary, or about $65,000 a year, complete with health benefits and cost-of-living adjustments."

Resignation Frees DeLay To Use Campaign Funds For Legal Bills. The CBS Evening News (4/4, lead story, 3:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported now that DeLay "won that Republican primary, his campaign war chest is available to him to pay for all of his legal bills. Right now, he says, there's about $1.5 million in that campaign war chest, and he's got about $1 million outstanding in legal bills, and of course that could rise." NBC Nightly News (4/4, lead story, 2:40, Reid, 9.87M) also noted "hundreds of thousands of dollars in his campaign committee can now be used to pay his mounting legal bills."

However, Roll Call (4/5, Kane) notes that as it "reported in February, DeLay began earlier this year to dip into his campaign account to defray some of the costs related to the Abramoff probe. In mid-February, while still preparing for a re-election battle that he thought would cost close to $10 million, DeLay's campaign was sitting on $1.3 million." Roll Call adds, "It's unclear how much of that money was spent in beating back several challengers in the March 7 primary, or to what level the campaign fund was replenished in the final weeks of March." Moreover, DeLay "may feel peer pressure to turn over a large chunk of that cash to lawmakers or the National Republican Congressional Committee, as is allowed under the law."

Still Deadlocked, House Ethics Panel Won't Launch DeLay Probe. USA Today (4/5, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports, "The House ethics committee, inactive for more than a year because of partisan disputes, has declined to launch investigations of…DeLay and other lawmakers accused of ethical lapses." USA Today adds, "A six-hour meeting Thursday ended in partisan deadlock, according to one Republican and one Democrat familiar with the panel's deliberations. Both declined to be identified because of committee non-disclosure rules. At issue was whether the committee could begin investigations without interfering with ongoing criminal probes."

GOP Prospects In TX22 Seen As Significantly Improved. Roll Call (4/5, Drucker) reports, "With Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) out of the way, Republicans concerned with holding his seat were breathing a collective sigh of relief Tuesday, while Democrats countered that the 22nd district was still theirs for the taking." DeLay's "surprise resignation announcement touched off a flurry of behind-the-scenes maneuvering Tuesday, as potential Republican candidates sought to gauge their viability as his replacement on the Nov. 7 ballot." A spokesman for the Democratic nominee, former Rep. Nick Lampson, "said the absence of DeLay and his luggage-set of ethics issues to run against would not significantly alter the ex-Congressman's strategy, nor would it hamper his fundraising effort." But "Republican officials based in the Houston area insisted that a once-competitive district in danger of being flipped by the Democrats had just turned into a walk for DeLay's as-yet-to-be-determined replacement as the Republican nominee."

USA Today (4/5, Stone, 2.31M) reports Gov. Rick Perry "is expected to call a special election to fill DeLay's term, said Eric Thode, Republican chairman of Fort Bend County in DeLay's 22nd Congressional District."

The Dallas Morning News (4/5, Nichols) reports, "One thing seemed clear Tuesday:" Lampson "has lost his biggest campaign issue: Mr. DeLay." The New York Times (4/5, Blumenthal, 1.19M) reports DeLay "told Fox News that his departure was intended to hurt Mr. Lampson. 'This is probably the worst day of his campaign because he knows that any Republican that replaces me on the ballot will win this seat,' he said."

The Houston Chronicle (4/5, Mack, Minaya, 581K) reports, "Those who acknowledged interest in the seat or were mentioned as contenders included Harris County Judge Robert Eckels, state Rep. Robert Talton, Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, former state District Judge John Devine and lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran against DeLay in the March Republican Primary." Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill "said he started receiving calls from interested officials within minutes of hearing the news of DeLay's decision." The Washington Times (4/5, Aynesworth, 90K) runs a similar report titled "Republican Contenders Eye DeLay's Seat," adding "most political analysts think that whoever gets the nod from the party has an excellent chance to win in November in the Republican-leaning district." The Times also says Woodfill "said Mr. Echols would have to be considered the favorite because of his lengthy public career and resulting name recognition."

DOJ_NMG_0025242

On its website, Time (4/5, Hylton) reports that "late Monday night Sugar Land Mayor David G. Wallace ,44, a popular second-term city leader whose name is on the ballot for a third term in the May 13 municipal elections, confirmed that he would make a bid for the seat." Wallace "said he had heard rumbles about DeLay's decision over the weekend, and his mayoral reelection website was pulled down for a redesign immediately after the DeLay announcement."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, 2.11M) says in an editorial "DeLay's decision to resign from Congress removes one large Republican liability this election year, but it hardly ends the party's political vulnerability. One pressing question is whether the GOP majority is going to use the few productive weeks it has left to establish a 2006 record and 2007 agenda that are worthy of re-election. Recent evidence is not reassuring." GOP leaders "seem determined to avoid any meaningful legislative fights, lest their own internal fissures show. … On the other hand, the biggest Republican problem now is the demoralization of their own voters. … May we suggest a Plan B? How about at least fighting for the agenda that elected them the last time?"

The Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) editorializes, "It's a measure of…DeLay's diminished political circumstances that those most unhappy about his abandoning his House seat are the Democrats who most revile him." The Post goes on to criticize "DeLayism," which "meant keeping a book on the partisan breakdown of political contributions from lobbyists labeled 'friendly' and 'unfriendly.' It meant strong-arming a trade group not to hire a former Democratic congressman and enlisting Federal Aviation Administration officials to track down Democrats fleeing a vote in the Texas state legislature aimed at cementing Republicans' hold on the House. Mr. DeLay offered to endorse the son of retiring Rep. Nick Smith (R-Mich.) in exchange for Mr. Smith's vote in favor of the Medicare prescription drug bill." DeLay "in his heyday got a lot done, but at a terrible cost to the institution -- and, we would argue, the party -- that he helped lead."

In an editorial titled "The Fall Of The Hammer," the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) writes that "DeLay's political demise hardly ends the influence-peddling culture to which he devoted himself. The DeLay machine's tooth-and-claw approach to politics lives on, from the Texas delegation he brazenly gerrymandered to his quid pro quo debasing of the lobbying industry." The Times adds, "In the smarmy self-justification of Mr. DeLay's statement yesterday, he said he wanted to avoid a 'referendum on me' in November. But, of course, that's exactly what the nation needs as voters come to consider a Congress deeply embedded in the easy money and easier ethics of the DeLay era."

USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "DeLay's decision to resign from Congress has given House Democrats a reason to rejoice. For more than a decade, the Texas Republican infuriated and outmaneuvered them, making them feel the acute pain of their powerlessness." But "perhaps it's the Republicans who should be the most gleeful. They'll be rid of the most potent symbol of Washington arrogance and corruption."

Cris Feldman, an attorney who "was on the civil trial team that won a ruling last spring finding that TRMPAC illegally raised, spent and failed to report corporate contributions in Texas," writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K), "The centerpiece of the Texas indictments is Texans for a Republican Majority PAC (TRMPAC), which DeLay founded and which his operatives ran, with the paid assistance of his daughter. … Corporate contributions to candidates in Texas are illegal. To make such a contribution is a third-degree felony. A contribution is considered to be the direct or indirect transfer of money, including the agreement to make such a transfer. If DeLay in any way participated in an agreement to indirectly transfer $190,000 in corporate cash to Texas candidates, he still has a problem back in Texas."

In a Washington Post column (4/5, A23), David Broder writes, "Symbolically as well as practically, the departure of Tom DeLay from Congress signals the end of an era of Republican dominance. The question now is whether the retreat that clearly has begun will turn into a rout. … Whether that translates to the specific victories needed to give Democrats an extra 15 seats and a narrow House majority cannot be guessed." But "the relief his fellow Republicans expressed that they can now recruit a fresh and presumably unscarred candidate in DeLay's Republican-leaning district shows how nervous they are about holding on to the House."

In the Washington Times (4/5, 90K), Tony Blankley writes, "Tom has served the party magnificently over the last two decades -- both as a principled conservative legislator, and as a shrewd and tireless political operator. And he has had the good judgment to exit on his own two feet. Both the Republican Party and the country are stronger and better for all that Tom DeLay has contributed. So, as a not-always-ally, I wish him Godspeed on the next leg of his journey."

Backed By Boehner, Ney Says He Won't Resign From Congress. Roll Call (4/5, Bresnahan) reports, "The stunning announcement by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) that he would resign from Congress has thrust another embattled Republican even more firmly into the spotlight: Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio)." Ney "went to great lengths Tuesday to deny that he had any intention of leaving office, and he received public support from his fellow Ohioan, House Majority Leader John Boehner." Boehner "said 'there's no pressure' on Ney to quit, although Boehner did acknowledge that Ney faces a difficult re-election battle this fall."

DOJ_NMG_0025243

The Hill (4/5, Kucinich) says Ney "received calls from supporters shortly after stories that DeLay plans to resign hit the Internet on Monday night. His backers wanted to know if he was considering the same course of action." In an interview with The Hill, Ney said on DeLay's announcement, "We are two different people." Asked "whether he had received any information from the Justice Department about whether he would be indicted," he said, "I haven't heard anything."

Democrats Seek Distance From McKinney As Controversy Continues. CNN's The Situation Room (4/4, Todd) reported yesterday that while Federal prosecutors are still considering whether to file criminal charges against Rep. Cynthia McKinney for the incident involving a Capitol Police officer, there are "serious questions being raised about support for McKinney on Capitol Hill, especially among the leadership of her own party. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, who could be a crucial ally on McKinney's behalf, first sought to downplay the incident last week." Pelosi was asked Tuesday whether McKinney should resign." Pelosi: "I think what happened last week was a very unfortunate incident. I think that all members of Congress like to be recognized. That's for sure. And this was a case in which she wasn't. I don't think any of it justifies hitting a police officer. I don't know if that happened. But I'm just saying if it did happen, I don't think it was justified." CNN added that Pelosi "does not appear to be alone here." House Democratic Whip Stenny Hoyer "told CNN radio reporter Lisa Goddard today, it's the responsibility of anyone who visits the Capitol, whether they are members of Congress or visitors to fully cooperate with the Capitol Police. … Now it also looks like the Congressional Black Caucus isn't exactly rushing to McKinney's side."

The New York Times (4/5, Stolberg, 1.19M) also says "Democrats tried to distance themselves from the congresswoman and some Republicans pressed for a resolution praising the police." Meanwhile, Republicans "have tried to make political hay of the episode, saying it did not comport with the Democrats' efforts to portray themselves as committed to national security. Representative Patrick T. McHenry, Republican of North Carolina, said Tuesday that he would introduce a resolution commending the police for their professionalism. A senior House Republican aide said that the resolution would probably not come to a vote, but that Republicans would probably offer comments praising the police Wednesday when a separate police-related resolution was offered." The Hill (4/5, Hearn) runs a similar story under the headline "McKinney Rebuked By Her Leader," in which it reports Pelosi "is no longer on speaking terms with McKinney." USA Today/AP (4/5) reports Rep. Mel Watt, chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, "had no comment, a spokesman said."

The Los Angeles Times (4/5, Neuman, Timiraos, 958K) describes the original incident as "a misunderstanding," in which the officer "touched her on the shoulder and she jabbed him with her cell phone." However, it has "begun to mushroom into a racial and political furor, replete with accusations of racial profiling and threats of criminal charges."

Scores of local newscasts covered McKinney's incident. About half mentioned her supposition that her race was a factor in the confrontation. The GOP resolution in honor of the police was mentioned about a third of the time. Some examples: WSB-TV Atlanta (4/4, 11:12 p.m.) reported, "House Republicans are sponsoring a resolution to honor Capitol Police in reaction to McKinney's confrontation with a security officer and say it is a show of support for the officers." WSB-TV Atlanta (4/4, 5:32 p.m.) reported, "The bill's supporters say ignoring an officer's commands is never acceptable behavior. McKinney is not commenting on the resolution."

WRAL-TV Raleigh (4/4, 11:11 p.m.) reported, "McKinney is not getting much support from either side of the aisle over her reported scuffle with capitol police."

WCPO-TV Cincinnati (4/4, 11:13 p.m.) reported, "McKinney says her dispute with police wasn't about whether she obeyed an officer's order. She says she was inappropriately touched when the officer tried to stop her for not wearing her Congressional pin or showing ID. She refused to stop and hit the officer. McKinney has said she thinks it happened partly because she is black."

WXIX-TV Cincinnati (4/4, 10:29 p.m.) reported, "McKinney blames racial profiling and says she acted in self-defense. Critics say McKinney is playing the race card to distract from her own offense."

More Commentary. USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) editorializes, "McKinney should stop exploiting a phony race issue and apologize for her overbearing behavior. There's little doubt that Capitol Police will remember her in the future."

Roll Call (4/5) editorializes, "With the full-throated support of the House and Senate leadership, the police board should immediately call an end to the practice of allowing Members and those accompanying them to bypass magnetometers and other security measures around the Capitol complex. It's a practice we've always disliked, and one that only fuels perceptions of Congress as a pampered class. Now McKinney has given us new reason to encourage Congressional leaders to get rid of it."

GAO Criticizes Funding For Abstinence As Part Of AIDS Fight. The New York Times (4/5, Dugger, 1.19M) reports, "Insistence by Republican Congressional leaders that American money to fight the spread of AIDS globally be used to emphasize abstinence and fidelity is undercutting comprehensive and widely accepted aid models, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released Tuesday." The report by the GAO, "examines the effect of a mandate from Congress that at least a third of United States money to prevent the spread of AIDS worldwide be devoted to sexual abstinence and fidelity programs." It found that "the provision had limited the reach of broader strategies to fight AIDS that include the use of condoms -- a conclusion strongly contested by a senior Bush administration official."

DOJ_NMG_0025244

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Stecklow, 2.11M) reports, "In an attached response to the GAO report, government officials who oversee Mr. Bush's AIDS program said it was on track to achieve its prevention goal and noted that funding for all prevention methods had increased from previous federal initiatives."

The Washington Post (4/5, A3, Brown, 744K) says "the AIDS coordinator's office, which is in the State Department, has shown considerable flexibility in administering the rules. In June 2004, it notified Congress that it would broaden the definition of 'abstinence until marriage' to include programs that also encouraged fidelity in sexual relationships outside marriage." The office also "exempts some countries' programs from meeting the abstinence-spending target as long as the entire overseas AIDS-prevention budget meets it. Ten of the 20 countries surveyed got exemptions."

First Lady Emphasizes Homeland Defense During St. Louis Visit. Stumping for Republican Sen. Jim Talent's re-election campaign and promoting the Helping America's Youth Initiative, First Lady Laura Bush traveled to St. Louis yesterday where she trumpeted Talent's commitment to homeland defense. At a speech to about 400 Talent supporters, the Kansas City Star (4/5, Douglas, 286K) quotes Mrs. Bush as saying, "At this historic time in our country, no issue is more important than defending America. ... Thanks to the men and women of the United States military, America is winning the war on terror. ... [Sen. Talent] understands the sacrifices made by our armed services personnel, and he understands the importance of their mission." The First Lady also singled out Talent "for his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee." Although "Talent was in Washington Tuesday, chairing a defense subcommittee meeting," in his place was "his wife, Brenda, along with President Bush's uncle, William 'Bucky' Bush, and Gov. Matt Blunt's wife, Melanie."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (4/5, Mannies, 310K) adds, "Mrs. Bush saw counselors and teens during a private visit to a St. Charles adolescent drug treatment center operated by Preferred Family Healthcare" as "part of a series of visits Mrs. Bush is making around the country with various programs that encourage children and teens to avoid drug use or that treat those dealing with addiction." She is quoted as saying that the treatment center is "one really good example" of a good use for federal dollars. She later told at-risk teens: "You can't leave your life to luck. You can't guess. ... Think about the decisions you make."

House To Take Up Lobbying Reforms Today. House Republicans today will begin work on legislation to change lobbying disclosure requirements and house rules of conduct. CQ (4/4, Kady) reported that two committees will vote on the measure while, on the House floor, "Republicans will try to win what is expected to be a close vote on another bill (HR 513) the GOP associates with political reform. It would put new restrictions on groups known as '527s' that have become powerful voices for liberal causes."

Republicans Divided Over Limits On 527s. Republicans are divided over proposed new limits on 527s. The Hill (4/5, Schor) reports that the divisions are "pitting the conservative Club for Growth and its allies against the party's leadership." The Club for Growth argues "that a Republican-backed 527 bill, even one that relaxes caps on aggregate contributions and coordinated campaign spending, violates the party's core principle of deregulated political speech. … Co-signers of the Club's letter of opposition to the House 527 bill include Americans for Tax Reform's Grover Norquist, FreedomWorks' Matt Kibbe, Citizens Against Government Waste's Tom Schatz and conservative elder statesman Paul Weyrich. Even House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), among his conference's leading advocates of 527 regulation, gave a nod to the bill's critics yesterday during a briefing with reporters."

WPost Says House Should Pass 527 Limits. An editorial in the Washington Post (4/5, A22, 744K) says the House should pass legislation that would require 527s "to play by the same rules as other committees that aim to influence federal elections." The Journal adds, "The usual politics of campaign finance reform -- Democrats for (at least publicly), Republicans against -- are upside down this time around. The reason is that Republicans do better than Democrats at raising the (relatively) small donations known as 'hard money,' while Democrats took the lead in the past election cycle in raising soft money for 527 groups. Connoisseurs of hypocrisy should enjoy this spectacle, but the partisan calculations are probably overstated. Democrats, with the rise of the Internet, have been improving their hard-money fundraising. Republicans are bound to draw even in the 527 race if it continues."

Senate Democrats Believe Prevention Act Will Strengthen Party's Position On Abortion. In legislation to expand access to contraceptives and sex education, Senate Democrats believe they have found a wedge issue to strengthen the party's position on abortion rights. The Hill (4/5, Bolton) reports, "Democratic strategists say the time is right for action because women who support abortion rights but are not politically engaged are alarmed by the confirmation of Samuel Alito as Sandra Day O'Connor's replacement on the Supreme Court and by the passage of legislation strictly curbing the availability of abortion there." The Prevention First Act, which is sponsored by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "has the support of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), presumptive front-runner in the 2008 presidential primary and 21 other Democrats. The bill would prohibit group health plans from excluding contraceptive drugs, devices and outpatient services if they cover the cost of other prescription drugs and outpatient services. It would also require the secretary of health and human services to disseminate information on emergency contraception to healthcare providers and require hospitals receiving federal money to provide emergency contraception to victims of sexual assault."

DOJ_NMG_0025245

Democrats Seen As Showing Unity While GOP Appears Divided. Time (4/4, Bacon) reported in exclusive on its web site that while the conventional wisdom in Washington has been that Republicans are "more unified and disciplined and have better-articulated ideas than Democrats, who are often at war with one another and questioning their leadership, lately "the Democrats, looking to create a campaign platform for 2006, have put out some ideas that their famously fractured party largely agrees on. … And Democrats can't be accused of lacking ideas: many of the party's most prominent leaders are putting out long tomes detailing their views." Meanwhile, Republicans "can't find much agreement" on "many key issues."

Biden Asks IG To Probe State Department Screening. Sen. Joe Biden has asked the State Department's IG to investigate whether the department has been using a political litmus test to screen applicants before sending them oversees to represent the US. Knight Ridder (4/5, Landay) reports that Biden "said in a letter to the inspector general that he was requesting the review in part because of a Dec. 2 Knight Ridder report that such a test was being used to weed out critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policy. … The story quoted current and former U.S. officials as saying that potential participants were vetted -- via Internet searches, for example -- for any comments or writings that criticized administration policies, particularly its approach to Iraq."

Bush Daughters Run In Richmond 10K Under Fake Names. The Washington Post (4/5, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 744K) reports in its "The Reliable Source" column that President Bush's daughters Jenna and Barbara ran a 10K through Richmond's Fan district Saturday, "but went barely detected until the Richmond Times-Dispatch put the pieces together yesterday. The paper deduced that the twins ran under the fake names of Sarah and Emily Jackson, finishing at 54:27. Jenna's boyfriend, Henry Hager, finished three minutes faster under his own name. Race director Tracey Russell told us the White House reserved slots for the twins three weeks ago; both they and the Secret Service agents who ran with them blended invisibly into the crowd."

Santorum Makes Case For Anti-Poverty Agenda. Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, writes in the Washington Times (4/5, 90K), "Some in America have not reaped the rewards of our economic bounty; it is to help meet their needs that I have sponsored the Senate Anti-Poverty Agenda. There are three components to the anti-poverty agenda: work, investment and a neighborhood-based focus. … By keeping tax rates low, enabling low-income Americans to develop real assets and amending tax laws to encourage all Americans to give generously to our nation's charities helping those in need, we will help ensure that our economy stays strong and that ours is a nation of opportunity and prosperity for all."

OTHER NEWS:

Shareholders Push For More Disclosure Of Corporate Political Donations. The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Cummings, 2.11M) reports that the campaign for corporate disclosure of companies political donations is gaining momentum. According to the Journal, "Institutional Shareholder Services, which advises investors on how to vote their proxies, is for the first time recommending passage of a shareholder resolution requiring more oversight and disclosure of political giving. … Proponents of corporate disclosure say political giving by public companies can create risks for shareholders, particularly if the firm winds up in the middle of a political scandal."

Morris Says Clinton Has Opened Herself To Challenge From Left. Dick Morris writes in The Hill (4/5) that "Hillary Clinton bet on consensus and centrism in backing the war and an aggressive policy on terrorism — and may have bet wrong. … Hillary may have misjudged the left. She may have opened herself up to a challenge from the left over Iraq and the war on terror. She may have chosen the wrong time and the wrong issue on which to cross party lines." Morris adds, "Now she is in a fix. If she retreats and retracts her support for the war, she will become the ultimate weather vane, shifting with the political wind. If she adopts a pro-peace posture, she undoes all of her work to position herself as a hawkish female, able to overcome the stereotypes that hamper women who wish to be commanders in chief."

DOJ_NMG_0025246

Buckley Says Clinton Is "True Contender" For White House. Conservative writer William F. Buckley said Sen. Hillary Clinton is a true contender for the White House in 2008. The New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) reports that in an interview with Bloomberg Television, Buckley said Clinton "is "' very consequential woman with an extraordinary background,'' adding that she is "a phenomenon, a woman candidate who might easily be president." The Times also reports, "Mr. Buckley suggested that he was less than impressed with the current group of potential candidates for 2008, saying, 'I don't find a commanding presence sort of knocking on the door' for the next presidential campaign."

Massachusetts To Require Residents To Carry Health Insurance. USA Today (4/5, Appleby, 2.31M) reports, "Residents of Massachusetts will be the first in the nation required to carry health insurance, just as motorists in many states are required to carry auto insurance. After months of debate, state lawmakers approved a bill Tuesday that requires individuals to have coverage and tacks a $295 per worker annual assessment on employers who don't provide it, with the aim of reducing the state's 550,000 uninsured to near zero within three years." The bill "goes to Republican Gov. Mitt Romney. He's expected to sign it because he proposed such a measure last summer."

The New York Times (4/5, Belluck, 1.19M) says the bill "does what health experts say no other state has been able to do: provide a mechanism for all of its citizens to obtain health insurance. It accomplishes that in a way that experts say combines methods and proposals from across the political spectrum, apportioning the cost among businesses, individuals and the government. … All told, the plan is expected to cover 515,000 uninsured people within three years, about 95 percent of the state's uninsured population, legislators said, leaving less than 1 percent of the population unprotected."

The Washington Post (4/5, A1, Fahrenthold, 744K) notes the bill "would require all residents to purchase health insurance or face legal penalties." Romney "said the bill, modeled on the state's policy of requiring auto insurance, is intended to end an era in which 550,000 people go without insurance and their hospital and doctor visits are paid for in part with public funds."

The Wall Street Journal (4/5, Hechinger, Amstrong, 2.11M) calls the bill "a far-reaching bid to obtain universal health-care coverage," and says the measure "requires that businesses not offering health insurance pay penalties to help cover the uninsured and uses a combination of added state spending, tax incentives, insurance subsidies and expanded government-insurance programs." The Journal adds, "Though some business groups, such as the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce, have generally voiced support for the bill, others, especially those representing small businesses, are wary of its effects on costs and job creation. In addition, health-care experts say the plan, despite its bold claims, provides little new money to pay for health care." They "note that under Gov. Michael Dukakis, Massachusetts approved a plan for universal health coverage in the late 1980s that died because of lack of money."

Rumsfeld, Powell Eulogize Weinberger. The Washington Post (4/5, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column that former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger was laid to rest yesterday at Arlington National Cemetery. The Post notes that "Cold Warriors of the 20th century" including Margaret Thatcher, Jeane Kirkpatrick, Ed Meese, Frank Carlucci, John Poindexter, Jack Kemp and James Schlesinger attended. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld eulogized Weinberger saying, "His goal was an era of hope and peace, one in which the people of Eastern Europe lived free, one in which the Berlin Wall no longer divided families but instead existed only in memory, or its shards sold as souvenirs." He added, "Today we live in that world, a world made safer and freer by Cold Warriors like Cap Weinberger." Former Secretary of State Colin Powell "concurred on the meaning of Weinberger, saying in his eulogy, that President Ronald Reagan "needed a champion to rebuild the armed forces of the United States to show the Soviets and the world how strength can lead to peace, and that champion was Cap Weinberger."

Boy Scouts Plan $17 Million Camp In Virginia. On the Haymarket, Virginia site where the Walt Disney Co. tried to build a theme park 12 years ago, the Boy Scouts of America is planning to open a $17 million camp catering to Cub Scouts. The Washington Post (4/5, B9, Stewart, 744K) reports, "The camp will be built and operated by the National Capital Council, which represents more than 85,000 Scouts and 23,000 volunteers in the District and 16 counties in Maryland and Virginia. It is one of the most expensive scouting construction projects in the nation, officials said, and unusual because of its focus on Cub Scouts as well as Boy Scouts. … Officials said the Scouts wanted a camp closer to Washington so that Cub Scouts, the organization's youngest members, could enjoy an overnight camping experience."

Couric To Announce Plans To Leave "Today" This Morning. Today show anchor Katie Couric plans to confirm this morning that she is leaving the show after 15 years and CBS will announce as early as today that she will take over the anchor chair of its evening news broadcast. The Washington Post (4/5, C7, Kurtz, 744K) reports that Couric "decided yesterday to use the occasion of her 15th anniversary, when the NBC program will be reflecting on her tenure, to look forward to the next chapter in her career, said sources at both networks and people familiar with her thinking. The sources, who first confirmed Couric's plans Monday, had expected the CBS negotiations to drag on a bit longer, but said now the network has wrapped up the negotiations and wants to go public as soon as Couric does."

DOJ_NMG_0025247

Academic Paper On Pro-Israel Lobby Dismissed As "Bigotry." Eliot Cohen, a professor at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Washington Post (4/5, A23, 744K) criticizes an academic papers posted on a Harvard Web site. John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt's "The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy'" contends that "American national security dictates distancing ourselves from the state of Israel; that U.S. support for Israel has led to such disasters as America's status as the No. 1 target for Islamic terrorists; and that such an otherwise inexplicable departure from good sense can be accounted for only by the power of 'The Lobby' (their capitalization), an overwhelmingly Jewish force abetted by some Christian evangelicals and a gentile neocon collaborator or two, who have hijacked American foreign policy and controlled it for decades." Cohen notes, "I am a public intellectual and a proud Jew; sympathetic to Israel and extensively engaged in our nation's military affairs; vaguely conservative and occasionally hawkish. In a week my family will celebrate Passover with my oldest son -- the third generation to serve as an officer in the United States Army. … Other supposed members of 'The Lobby' also have children in military service. Impugning their patriotism or mine is not scholarship or policy advocacy. It is merely, and unforgivably, bigotry."

Iran Open To Limited Negotiations On Enrichment. Wrangling over Iran's disputed nuclear program continued on Tuesday, with the AP (4/5, Dareini) reporting, "Iran said...it is willing to negotiate with world powers on large-scale enrichment of uranium but will never give way on their key demand — to cease all enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear reactors or material for bombs. ... Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki reiterated that Iran would not comply with the Security Council demand, saying the small-scale enrichment it resumed in February was strictly for research and was within its rights." Mottaki is quoted as saying, "The enrichment of uranium...is Iran's right as defined as a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. ... One thing we can't give up and that is the right of the Iranian nation. ... We can't hold a dialogue with any country about giving up our rights." Mottaki "added, however, that Iran was prepared to talk to the international community about large-scale enrichment."

Harman Calls US Intelligence On Iran Insufficient. With tensions increasing over Iran's controversial nuclear program, the AP (4/5, Shrader) reports, "US intelligence information on Iran is inadequate and may contain misinformation that spy agencies are accepting as solid, the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee said Tuesday. Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., told a Council on Foreign Relations gathering that she and other lawmakers recently received a briefing from intelligence agencies based on information shared with the International Atomic Energy Agency and the UN Security Council. Her bottom line: 'I remain skeptical — lots of unanswered questions.'" She is later quoted as saying, "The conjecture that I have is that if I were Iran, and I wanted to put out disinformation, it might look a lot like what our government is claiming is information. ... I can't tell you that's true, but I can't tell you it's not true."

Iran Runs War Games On State Television. Fox News' Special Report (4/4, Baier) reported, "Iran's five-day military show and tell continued today. War games called the Great Prophet broadcast on state-run television. This time the Iranians unveiled what they called a super modern flying boat. It takes off from the water's surface. They claim it's undetectable by radar and able to launch missiles while traveling at high speeds. The flying boat tests come one day after a high-speed torpedo test. … The Iranian foreign minister said today the war games are designed to send a message that Iran can defend itself." Fox added, "US Intelligence officials and military analysts say Iran's videotaped tests are likely happening for two reasons. One, to try to intimidate the international community as negotiations over Iran's nuclear program continue, and two, to send a message to the Iranian people that the country has an effective military in case of an invasion."

In related coverage, the AP (4/5, Dareini) cites "a top Iranian military official [as saying] Tuesday the country can now defend itself against any invasion originating from outside the region — a clear reference to the United States — as it tested a second new radar-avoiding missile. ... Shortly after the test, the chief of the elite Revolutionary Guards, Gen. Yahya Rahim Safavi, warned that Iran was now able to 'confront any extra-regional invasion,' referring to the United States without mentioning it by name. 'The missile command of the Guards' naval force...via positioning various types of surface-to-sea missiles, is able, while defending the coastlines and islands, to confront any extra-territorial invasion,' the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Safavi as saying. Safavi also called for foreign forces to leave the region." He is quoted as saying, "Iran wants durable peace in the Persian Gulf and it can't be achieved without foreign forces and those which invaded Iraq leaving (the region)."

DOJ_NMG_0025248

Some Experts Say New Iranian Weapons May Originate In Russia. The AP (4/5, Keath) reports, "Iran has unveiled with great fanfare a series of what it portrays as sophisticated, homegrown weapons — flying boats and missiles invisible to radar, torpedoes too fast to elude. But experts said Tuesday it appears much of the technology came from Russia and questioned Iran's claims about the weapons' capabilities. Still, the armaments, tested during war games by some 17,000 Revolutionary Guards in the Persian Gulf, send what may be Iran's real message: its increased ability to hit oil tankers if tension with America turns to outright confrontation."

Israeli Missile Strike Hits Base In Abbas Compound. The AP (4/5, Barzak) reports, "Israeli warplanes fired three missiles into the Gaza compound of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday in response to Palestinian rocket fire — the first such Israeli attack since the violent Islamic group Hamas took power last week." According to the AP, "Abbas denounced the air strike and called for international intervention to stop what he called Israel's 'destruction for the sake of destruction.' He said he contacted 'the UN, Russia, the EU and Arab states and told them that these actions complicate daily life and affect our human and social status.'" Although "Hamas does not appear to be directly responsible for the rocket attacks on Israel, its leaders have said militants who attack Israel will not be arrested."

Hamas Foreign Minister Plans China Visit. After a visit by Hamas leaders to Moscow last month drew fire from the group's detractors, AFP (4/5) reports, "Palestinian foreign minister Mahmud al-Zahar announced plans to visit China as Beijing became the latest power to reach out to Islamists Hamas despite a Western boycott. 'We are going to visit China and we have let the ambassador know,' Zahar...told reporters after meeting the Chinese envoy to the Palestinian territories, Yang Weiguo." Israel immediately criticized the idea. Foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev is quoted as saying, "Anyone who recognizes the Hamas government without this movement bending to the demands of the international community in recognizing Israel, renouncing terrorism and accepting agreements, helps to maintain its extremist positions."

Rice Could Face Skeptical Reception As She Presents US-India Nuclear Deal To Congress. While Congress frets over Delhi's ties with Iran and other issues as it considers the landmark US-India nuclear deal signed last month, the Washington Post (4/5, A17, Linzer, 744K) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will address those concerns and others when she testifies today before the House and Senate foreign relations panels on details of the unfinished agreement, in which the United States would provide India with civilian nuclear technology. She faces pressure from Republican and Democratic lawmakers, some of whom are pushing for changes to the deal out of concern about nuclear proliferation." The Post cites "a letter yesterday [in which] a bipartisan group of nuclear experts urged lawmakers not to authorize technology transfers until India stops producing nuclear weapons material, as the United States, Britain, France, Russia, and China are believed to have done. In response, some administration officials said Rice could announce a new push for an international treaty to end production of all fissile material."

India Nuclear Deal Prompts Heavy Lobbying, For And Against. As Rice prepares for her presentation, Roll Call (4/5, Ackley) reports, "If Daryl Kimball has it his way...Rice will have a bumpy ride today during her back-to-back appearances before Senate and House committees. ... Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, opposes the deal and has spent the days leading up to Rice's testimony trying to make sure Members ask her the toughest of questions. 'We want them to ask her what the potential impact of this will be on the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group. ... [Back then] India used peaceful nuclear assistance to develop its first nuclear bomb test.'" Backing the deal will be the Indian embassy, Indian-American lobbying groups, and, of course, Rice herself. Sanjay Puri, chairman of the US India political action committee, is quoted as saying, "A lot of work is going on behind the scenes to explain the background on the deal, the fine print and how it is beneficial to America. ... We have about 30,000 members around the country, and obviously we've reached out to all our people who are active in every state and have strongly urged them to reach out to Members of Congress and Senators."

Iran Sanctions Bill Could Determine Nuclear Deal's Destiny. The Hill (4/5, Mikhail) reports, "A potential standoff involving dueling Iran sanctions bills could determine the fate of a civilian nuclear-cooperation deal with India — a deal that is a high priority for President Bush. The White House is in the politically awkward position of asking Congress to ratify the high-profile nuclear deal with India while fending off Iran-related legislation that could threaten the US-India pact. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) and Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) have introduced bills that seek to cut off funds from Iran that could be applied toward attaining or creating nuclear weapons, enhancing provisions of the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act (ILSA)." The House version, however, "which has 355 co-sponsors, including most members of the Republican and Democratic leadership, provides less flexibility to the president to determine whether to apply such sanctions." According to The Hill, "Recent actions in the House have substantially increased the likelihood of overlapping discussions of the Iran sanctions bill and the nuclear deal. The legislation was voted out of the International Relations Middle East subcommittee in April 2005 but was not scheduled for a full-committee markup vote until a day before Hyde and Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.)...introduced the enabling legislation for the nuclear deal with India this March." That said, Sam Stratman, a spokesman for International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), is quoted as saying, "It would be very premature to draw any linkages to the fate of these very different pieces of legislation.'

DOJ_NMG_0025249

Former Defense Secretary Cohen Backs India Deal. In a Wall Street Journal (4/5, A20, 2.11M) op-ed, former Secretary of Defense William Cohen writes that "this agreement is key to moving forward in a number of areas of mutual advancement. Some detractors say that it is imperfect and will harm long-held nuclear nonproliferation goals. On balance and over the long term, however, I believe the US stands to gain far more than it will lose by implementing this agreement." He adds, "Make no mistake, this agreement with India is by no means perfect and the Bush administration could have done a much better job in consulting with Congress first." But "if the agreement is rejected in Washington or New Delhi, it is unlikely that India will be able to go forward with further development of its civilian nuclear power generation capability. This will add significant new pressure to the oil market and also force India to burn more coal. Both of these outcomes will damage US economic and environmental objectives." Cohen concludes, "Fundamentally upgrading the US-India relationship represents one of the most important strategic innovations in American foreign policy since the end of the Cold War. Congress should recognize and consider carefully this reality during its deliberations on the civilian nuclear agreement."

US-Russian Relationship Increasingly Testy. The AP (4/5, Ingram) reports, "Like an aging couple, Russia and the United States seem to spend more time squabbling over what divides them than building on their shared interests. Whether it's Iran, the Palestinian militant group Hamas or democracy movements in former Soviet republics, Moscow and Washington increasingly find themselves staring warily at one another across the fence." The story goes on to cite recent quarrels over proposed Russian membership in the WTO and allegations that Russia forwarded to Saddam Hussein intelligence on US troop movements during the 2003 invasion -- among a litany of other sticking points. Ivan Safranchuk, who heads of the Moscow office of the Washington-based Center for Defense Information, is quoted as saying, "There have always been differences, but from time to time they were put aside for shared values: nuclear disarmament, euphoria over the end of the Cold War, the fight against terrorism, things that pushed everything else into the shadows. ... But in the periods of thaw, Russia and the US didn't create any stable mechanisms to solve problems."

Hughes To Lead US Delegation To Benin. The Washington Post (4/5, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush announced yesterday that he has selected Karen P. Hughes, undersecretary of state for public affairs, to lead the U.S. delegation to the inauguration tomorrow of President-elect Thomas Yayi Boni of the beautiful West African Republic of Benin."

DHS Near Agreement With China On Illegal Immigrants. The Washington Times (4/5, A1, Hudson, 90K) reports in a front page story that the Department of Homeland Security "is near an agreement with China to return up to 39,000 Chinese illegally living in the U.S. to the communist country, which previously had refused to accept deportations." Secretary Michael Chertoff "said the tentative agreement, which would let the U.S. deport Chinese illegals as they are arrested, will act as a deterrent to other foreign nationals contemplating illegal immigration."

Tokyo Conference Could Stimulate Stalled North Korea Talks. The Washington Post (4/5, A18, Faiola, 744K) reports that an upcoming private sector conference in Tokyo is "fueling hopes of unofficial meetings that could help restart the long-stalled negotiations [with North Korea]." The conference marks "the first time that leading delegates from all six [countries involved] will be at the same forum since November." However, the Post reports that "diplomats said it was too early to tell whether any talks with the North Koreans would take place."

Syrian Regime Cracks Down On Domestic Critics. The New York Times (4/5, Slackman, 1.19M) reports that Damascus is "aggressively silencing domestic political opposition while accommodating religious conservatives to shore up support across the country." Syrian officials apparently feel "a growing sense of confidence due to shifts in the Middle East in recent months."

Muslim Scholars Exempt One Danish Firm From Boycott. The New York Times (4/5, Fattah, 1.19M) reports that a group of Muslim scholars has recommended "that the company Arla Foods 'should be withdrawn from the boycott on Denmark," after "Arla placed full-page advertisements in Arab newspapers last month condemning the cartoons as an insult to Islam." However, the Times says that "many retailers said they intended to keep Danish goods, including Arla's, off their shelves."

DOJ_NMG_0025250

Pakistan Pressures Foreign Students To Leave Madrassahs. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Montero, 61K) reports that "Pakistan has banned foreigners…from madrassahs after it was discovered that one of the London bombers had visited a Pakistani madrassah." Officially, 65 percent have left, but the Monitor reports that the foreign students "come with long experience in Western classrooms, and could form a bridge between Western and Islamic worldviews and systems of thought."

Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run For Office For First Time. The Christian Science Monitor (4/5, Etheridge, 61K) reports that a Tuesday by-election in Kuwait City "is the first in which women have been able to vote since the National Assembly approved universal suffrage last year." Two women ran for office. The election is "considered a test case for 2007 parliamentary polls."

Thai Premier Says He Will Step Aside. After months of protest and an opposition boycott of elections last Sunday, the Washington Post (4/5, A17, Sipress, 744K) reports, "Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra announced Tuesday that he would resign in an effort to end months of demonstrations that have shaken Thailand. He pledged to leave office as soon as a new parliament convenes. 'I want all Thais to reunite,' he said in a brief televised address to the nation. ... 'We have no time to quarrel. I want to see Thai people unite and forget what has happened.'" The New York Times (4/5, Fuller, 1.19M) notes, "It was a sudden reversal for Mr. Thaksin. ... While he was loved in the countryside, he was despised by the Bangkok elite, who accused him of using his political power to further his business interests. They also accused him of worsening the Muslim insurgency in southern Thailand, stifling media independence, fostering a culture of corruption in government contracts and allowing the police to conduct hundreds of extrajudicial killings, a charge the prime minister has brushed aside."

Sri Lankan Candidate Vows To Reform UN. According to the Washington Times (4/5, Behn, 90K), Jayantha Dhanapala said "that as secretary-general, he would push ahead with reforms to the world organization and take a more proactive stance toward "what is evil and wrong with the world." Dhanapala is in Washington to promote "his reformist agenda and bridge-building style."

De Villepin Defies Renewed Demonstrations Over Labor Law. The New York Times (4/5, Sciolino, Smith, 1.19M) reports that French Premier Dominique de Villepin vowed, ""The government will not give in" to labor-law protestors. More demonstrations occurred on Tuesday, but the Times reports that "the clashes seemed less fierce than those of just a week ago." USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) says that protesters were unmoved by "President Jacques Chirac's promise Friday that the law would not be implemented until Parliament watered it down." USA Today also reports that in spite of de Villepin's stance, "there were signs…that Parliament was ready to negotiate with trade unions." The Washington Post (4/5, A17, Moore, 744K) says that the demonstrations amount "to an outpouring of discontent with an aging leadership" and that "in the past, such huge displays of public anger have resulted in governments collapsing."

Former British Spy Killed In Northern Ireland. The Washington Post (4/5, A20, Pogatchnik, 744K) reports that admitted British informant and former Sinn Fein legislative chief Denis Donaldson "was found fatally shot Tuesday." Donaldson had admitted in December that he had been on the British payroll "for two decades." The Post writes that "the killing appeared certain to harden Protestant opinion against cooperating with Sinn Fein." The New York Times (4/5, Lavery, 1.19M) reports that "the I.R.A. denied any involvement." USA Today (4/5, 2.31M) also ran a brief story on the murder.

NYTimes Column Comments On Rice-Straw Trip's Gender Issues. New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes that the British were "were fascinated with the Condi Rice and Jack Straw two-for-the-road odyssey." She adds that "the British are used to iron ladies" and recalls "chauvinist" US reaction to Geraldine Ferraro's 1984 vice presidential candidacy.

NYTimes Editorial Criticizes Arroyo. An editorial in the New York Times (4/5, 1.19M) says that "President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo has completely lost touch with the ideals that inspired that 1986 'people power' movement." It urges President Bush to warn her that her "increasingly authoritarian tendencies" are "making her country far more vulnerable to terrorist pressures."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"L.A. OKs 'Historic' Homeless Plan."
"Insurers Saw Record Gains In Year Of Catastrophic Loss."
"Chief 9/11 Architect Critical Of Bin Laden."
"Rumble In The Jungle Over Oil."
"GOP Woes Not Likely To Leave With DeLay."
"Links Between Pellicano, Director Come Into Focus."
"Couric Is Set To Join CBS News As Anchor."

DOJ_NMG_0025251

USA Today:
"Second Homes 40% Of Market."
"US Urged To Apologize For 1930s Deportations."
"Third Of Kids Tip Scales Wrong Way."

New York Times:
"Hussein Charged With Genocide In 50,000 Deaths."
"Massachusetts Sets Health Plan for Nearly All."
"Syria Imposing Stronger Curbs On Opposition."
"A Partisan Leaves; Will An Era Follow Suit?"
"Big Gain For Rich Seen In Tax Cuts For Investments."
"Families With Full Plates, Sitting Down to Dinner."

Washington Post:
"Terrapins Land on Top of the World."
"Mass. Bill Requires Health Coverage."
"DeLay Departing On Own Terms."
"GWU President Says He Will Step Down In 2007."
"Walter Reed's World Of Hurt, Hope."
"Democracy In Iraq Not A Priority In US Budget."

Washington Times:
"French Protests Persist."
"House GOP Lacks Agenda, DeLay Says."
"Chief Says Officer Was Right To Halt McKinney."
"U.S. Near Deal With China On Illegals."
"Visions Of A Civil War Battlefield."
"Episcopalians Consider Freeze On Gay Bishops."
"Utilities Face Financial Squeeze, Agencies Warn."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM's Wagoner: Now Is Not The Time To Panic."
"Detroit Is Knee-Deep In Garbage Problems."
"Man Wonders: Could My Dad Be The Oakland County Child Killer?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Georgia Forestland In $6.1 Billion Deal."
"Scandal Throws Kia Off Schedule."
"Judge Voids Boy's Murder Plea."
"UGA May Bounce Hardcore Boozers."

Dallas Morning News:
"DeLay Says He'll Lead From The Outside."
"Area Avoids Bubble Trouble."
"Couric Poised To Be First Woman To Fly Solo As A Network Anchor."
"State Wants Corridor To Shadow I-35."
"Senate Plan Would Treat Immigrants Based On Time In US"

Houston Chronicle:
"Scramble Begins Without DeLay."
"More Spending By Slade Detailed."
"Ailment Sidelines Lay's Lead Attorney."
"NBC's Couric May Say Today She's CBS' Newswoman."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Congress-Child Porn; Child Porn Victim; DeLay Retirement; Landrieu-Nominations; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; France-Labor Protests; 9/11 Movie; TN-Tornado Damage; Indian Casinos-Sexual Harassment; Clock Event; Iraq KIAs Memorial.
CBS: DeLay Retirement; Hurricane Season-Gulf Coast; Landrieu-Nominations; Congress-Child Porn; France-Labor Protests; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; Iraq-Sadr City; No Child Left Behind-Status; Hollywood-Wiretapping Case.
NBC: DeLay Retirement; DeLay Retirement-Analysis; TN-Tornado Damage; Tax Preparer Schemes; Stock Markets; Saddam-Kurd Genocide; France-Labor Protests; Katrina-Traumatized Children; Delta Airlines-Strike; Connecticut-Murdered Investor; Sleep Problems-Consequences; Cancer-Aspartame; Cancer-Sun's Benefits; Date Anomaly.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: DHS Deputy Press Secretary Arrested; Congress-Online Child Porn; WI-Iraq referendums.
CBS: DHS deputy press secretary arrested; MA-health insurance bill; Saddam trial; WI-Iraq referendums; Study-ginger anti-cancer benefits; NCAA women's championship; Wall Street.
NPR: DHS Deputy Press Secretary Arrested; DeLay Resignation; CA-Levee Breaks; Red River Flooding; Wall Street; DE-Military Plane Crash; France-Jobs Law Protests; NCAA Women's Championship.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Breakfast with bicameral Republican Congressional leadership, Oval Office, The White House, closed press; participates in a panel discussion on health savings accounts, Playhouse on the Green, Bridgeport, Conn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full committee. Hearing on U.S.-India atomic energy cooperation. Location: Room SH-216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Emerging Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearingon the FY07 budget for combating terrorism. Assistant Defense Secretary Thomas W. O'Connell; Vice Adm. Eric T. Olson, deputy commander, U.S. Special Operations Command; Retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd, director, National Counterterrorism Center; Jeffrey N. Rapp, director, Joint Intelligence Task Force-Combating Terrorism, Defense Intelligence Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0025252

Location: Room 222, Russell. Notes: Closed session, with open session following in Room 222 Russell.

9:30 a.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the nomination of Richard Capka to be administrator of the Federal Highway Administration. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Indian government's nuclear plan. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. INDIAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on methamphetamine abuse in Indian regions. William P. Ragsdale, director, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Christopher B. Chaney, deputy director, Office of Law Enforcement Services, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Jerry Gidner, deputy director, Tribal Services, Bureau of Indian Affairs; Robert G. McSwain, deputy director, Indian Health Service, HHS; Jon Perez, director, Division of Behavior Health, Indian Health Service; Anthony Dekker, associate director, Clinical Services, Phoenix Indian Medical Center, Phoenix; Matthew H. Mead, U.S. Attorney's Office, Wyoming; Kathleen Wesley-Kitcheyan, chairwoman, San Carlos Apache Tribe; Ivan Posey, chairman, Wind River Eastern Shoshone Tribe; Joseph A. Garcia, president, National Congress of American Indians; Gary Edwards, chief executive officer, National Native American Law Enforcement Association; Karrie Azure, North Dakota Intertribal Justice Program on Methamphetamine. Location: Room 485, Russell.

10 a.m. FINANCE _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Bioterrorism and Public Health Preparedness Subcommittee. Hearing on all hazards medical responses. Panel 1: John Agwunobi, MD, assistant secretary for health, HHS; Ellen Embrey, deputy assistant secretary of defense for force health protection and readiness; director, Deployment Health Support; DOD; Lawrence Deyton, MSPH, MD, chief public health and environmental hazards officer, Department of Veterans Affairs. Panel 2: Thomas V. Inglesby, MD, chief operating officer and deputy director, Center for BioSecurity, University of Pittsburgh Medical Center; Richard Serino, chief of department, Boston Emergency Medical Services; Eddy Bresnitz, MD, deputy commissioner/state epidemiologist, Public Health Services Branch, New Jersey Department of Health and Senior Services; and Rob Gougelet, MD, director of emergency preparedness, Dartmouth-Hitchcock Medical Center. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the Green Lane Maritime Cargo Security Act. Deputy DHS Secretary Michael P. Jackson; Capt. Jeffrey W. Monroe, director, Department of Ports and Transportation, Portland, Maine; M. R. Dinsmore, CEO, Port of Seattle, Wash.; Andrew Howell, U.S. Chamber of Commerce; James P. Hoffa, general president, Teamsters Union. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Legislative Branch Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 appropriations for the Sergeant of Arms and the Capitol Police. William Pickle, sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, Senate; Wilson Livingood, chairman, Capitol Police Board and Capitol Guide Service; Alan Hantman, member, Capitol Police Board and Capitol Guide Service; Christopher McGaffin, acting chief, U.S. Capitol Police. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Justice Department. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; FBI Director Robert Mueller; Karen Tandy, administrator, Drug Enforcement Administration; Carl J. Truscott, director, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; John Clark, director, U.S. Marshals Service. Location: Room 192, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Army Corps of Engineers. Assistant Army Secretary John Paul Woodley; Corps Commander Lt. Gen. Carl Strock. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Global Climate Change and Impacts Subcommittee. Hearing on the currenyt and future role of science in the Asia Pacific partnership. James L. Connaughton, Chairman, Council on Environmental Quality; David Montgomery, CRA International; Margo Thorning, American Council for Capitol Formation; David D. Doniger, Natural Resources Defense Council. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Public Lands and Forests Subcommittee. Hearing on the 2005 wildfire season and preparations for the 2006 season. Undersecretary of Agriculture Mark Rey; Tom Harbour, Forest Service; Deputy Assistant Interior Secretary Nina Rose Hatfield. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FOREIGN RELATIONS _ European Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on Islamist extremism in Europe. Location: Room 419, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Federal Financial Management, Government Information and International Security Subcommittee. Hearing on federal funds for museums. David Ucko, NSF; Edward Able Jr., American Association of Museums. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Closed. members only. Location: Room 219, Hart.

DOJ_NMG_0025253

3 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on improving contractor incentives. Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Krieg; Comptroller General David Walker. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (13 bills): 1) H.R. 3127 - Darfur Peace and Accountability Act of 2006; 2) H.Con.Res. 320 - Calling on the Government of the Socialist Republic of Vietnam to immediately and unconditionally release Dr. Pham Hong Son and other political prisoners and prisoners of conscience, and other purposes; 3) H.Res. 578 - Concerning the Government of Romania's ban on intercountry adoptions and the welfare of orphaned or abandoned children in Romania; 4) H.Con.Res. 360 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the National Peace Officers' Memorial Service; 5) H.Con.Res. 371 - Honoring and congratulating the Minnesota National Guard, on its 150th anniversary, for its spirit of dedication and service to the State of Minnesota and the Nation and recognizing that the role of the National Guard, the Nation's citizen-soldier based militia, which was formed before the United States Army, has been and still is extremely important to the security and freedom of the Nation; 6) H.Con.Res. 370 - Expressing the sense of the Congress that Saudi Arabia should fully live up to its World Trade Organization commitments and end all aspects of any boycott on Israel; 7) H.Res. 737 - Supporting the goals and ideals of Financial Literacy Month, and for other purposes; 8) H.R. 4688 - Mayor John Thompson 'Tom' Garrison Memorial Post Office Designation Act; 9) H.R. 4561 - Francisco 'Pancho' Medrano Post Office Building Designation Act; 10) H.R. 4646 - Coach John Wooden Post Office Building Designation Act; 11) H.Res. 556 - Expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that a National Methamphetamine Prevention Week should be established to increase awareness of methamphetamine and to educate the public on ways to help prevent the use of that damaging narcotic; 12) H.Con.Res. 366 - To congratulate the National Aeronautics and Space Administration on the 25th anniversary of the first flight of the Space Transportation System, to honor Commander John Young and the Pilot Robert Crippen, who flew Space Shuttle Columbia on April 12-14, 1981, on its first orbital test flight, and to commend the men and women of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and all those supporting America's space program for their accomplishments and their role in inspiring the American people; 13) H.Res. 541 - Honoring Drs. Roy J. Glauber, John L. Hall, and Theodor W. Hansch for being awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics for 2005, and Drs. Yves Chauvin, Robert H. Grubbs, and Richard R. Schrock for being awarded the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for 2005, and for other purposes.

9 a.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Housing and Community Opportunity Subcommittee. Hearing on reforms in the Federal Housing Administration. Federal Housing Commissioner Brian Montrgomery; Stella Adams, Board Member, The National Community Reinvestment Coalition; Gerald M. Howard, Executive Vice President and CEO, National Association of Home Builders; Regina Lowrie, Chairwoman, Mortgage Bankers Association of America; A.W. Pickel, III, President and CEO, Leader One Financial Corporation. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

9:15 a.m. RESOURCES _ Forests and Forest Health Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1310, Longworth.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Commerce Department. Secretary Gutierrez. Location: Room H-309, Capitol.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations for the Treasury Department. Secretary Snow. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on FY07 appropriations on energy supply and conservation. Undersecretary of Energy David Garman; Shane Johnson, acting director, Office of Nuclear Energy; Douglas Faulkner, acting assistant secretary of Energy; Jeffrey Jarrett, assistant secretary of Energy; Kevin Koleva, director, Electricity Delivery and Energy Reliability. Location: Room 2362B, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Environment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY07 National Park Service budget. NPS Director Fran Mainella; Deputy NPS Director Steve Martin; Comptroller Bruce Shaeffer. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on implementary of the 2005 base closings. Assistant Army Secretary Keith Eastin; Assistant Navy Secretary B.J. Penn; Assistant Air Force Secretary William Anderson. Location: Room H-143, Capitol.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on major defense acquisition initiatives. Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani, vice chairman, Joint Chiefs of Staff; Undersecretary of Defense Tina Jonas; Undersecretary of Defense Kenneth Krieg; Comptroller General David M. Walker, GAO. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Regulatory Affairs Subcommittee. Hearing on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4975 - Lobbying Accountability and Transparency Act; H.R.

DOJ_NMG_0025254

3509 - Workplace Goods Job Growth and Competitiveness Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SCIENCE _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Hearing on IRS enforcement and small businesses. IRS Commissioner Mark Everson; Thomas L. Sullivan, chief counsel, Office of Advocacy, SBA; Kevin Brown, commissioner, Small Business/Self-Employed Division, IRS; Nina Olson, national taxpayer advocate, IRS; John Satagaj, president and general counsel, Small Business Legislative Counsel; others. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

April 5 - 6. 10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Full Committee. Hearing on H.R. 4200 - Forest Emergency Recovery and Research Act. Location: Room 1300, Longworth.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the U.S.-Oman Free Trade Agreement. Susan Schwab, Deputy U.S. Trade Representative, Office of the U.S. Trade Representative; Frances D. Cook, Chairman and Principal, The Ballard Group LLC, and former U.S. Ambassador to Oman; Nicholas E. Billotti, President and Chief Executive Officer, Turner Construction International LLC, Michael P. Weitzel, Program Manager, DynCorp International, and President, Muscat American Business Council, Muscat; Richard L. Trumka, Secretary-Treasurer, AFL-CIO. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

11 a.m. RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

11 a.m. TRANSPORTATION AND INFRASTRUCTURE _ Full Committee. Markup of H. Con. Res. 235 - Expressing the sense of the Congress that States should require candidates for driver's licenses to demonstrate an ability to exercise greatly increased caution when driving in the proximity of a potentially visually impaired individual; H. Con. Res. 349 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the Greater Washington Soap Box Derby; H. Con. Res. 359 - Authorizing the use of the Capitol Grounds for the District of Columbia Special Olympics Law Enforcement Torch Run; H. Con. Res. 372 - Recognizing the 50th Anniversary of the Interstate Highway System; H.R. 3858 - Pets Evacuation and Transportation Standards Act. Location: Room 2167, Rayburn.

12 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Full Committee. Markup of pending resolution directing the Secretary of DHS turn over doucments on the Dubai Ports World deal. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

1 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Federal Workforce and Agency Organization Subcommittee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2203, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the U.S.-India nuclear deal. Secretary of State Rice. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Science, State, Justice, Commerce and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on State Department's international organizations. Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg; UN Amb. John Bolton. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Terrorism, Unconventional Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. Hearing on implementatiuon of the 2006 Quadrennial Defense Review. Assistant Defense Secretary Peter Flory; James Tegnelia, U.S. Strategic Command. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness Subcommittee. Hearing on the impact of service contracting on military readiness. Assistant Army Secretary Claude Bolton Jr.; Air Force Lt. Gen. Donald Hoffman; Ronald Poussard, Air Force Program Executive officer, Combat Mission Support. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Domestic and International Monetary Policy, Trade and Technology Subcommittee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Export-Import Bank. Acting President James Lambright, James Morrison, President, Small Business Exporters Association of the U.S.; World Resources Institute Chairman James Harmon; Coalition for Employment Through Exports President Edmund Rice. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Finance and Accountability Subcommittee. Hearing on the Improper Payments Information Act. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

2 p.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Energy and Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on water demand in the West. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Crime, Terrorism, and Homeland Security Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

2 p.m. RESOURCES _ Water and Power Subcommittee. Hearing on the Bureau of Reclamation's challenges. Assistant Interior Secretary Mark A. Limbaugh; John Keys III, commissioner, Bureau of Reclamation; Lloyd A. Duscha, National Research Council; attorney Bennett Raley; Dan Keppen, Family Farm Alliance; George Caan, Colorado River Commission of Nevada; Charles Dumars, Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District; Shannon McDaniel, South Columbia Basin Irrigation District; Robert Stackhouse, Central Valley Project Water Association; Richard Atwater; WateReuse Association. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

2:30 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Markup of H.R. 4975 Lobbying Accountability and Transparency Act. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

3 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, Treasury, HUD, the Judiciary and the District of Columbia Subcommittee. Hearing on Federal judiciary overview. Sixth Circuit Court Judge Julia Smith gibbons; Leonidas Mecham,

DOJ_NMG_0025255

Director, Administrative office of the U.S. Courts. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

3 p.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Human Resources Subcommittee. Hearing on enhancing public benefit programs. Location: Room B-318, Rayburn.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Strategic Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on Department of Energys nuclear weapons complex infrastructure. Dr. David Overskei, Chairman, Secretary of Energy Advisory Board, Nuclear Weapons Complex Infrastructure Task Force; Peter Stockton, Project on Government Oversight; Tom DAgostino, Deputy Administrator, Defense Programs, National Nuclear Security Administration; Charles Anderson, Principle Deputy Assistant Secretary, Office of Environmental Management, Department of Energy. Location: Room 2237, Rayburn.

4 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Projection Forces Subcommittee. Hearing on Gary Powell, Acting Deputy Undersecretary of Defense, Office of the Secretary of Defense; Allison Stiller, Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Ships, Department of the Navy; Vice Adm. Paul E. Sullivan, USN, Commander, Naval Sea Systems Command; Rear Adm. Charles S. Hamilton, II, USN, Program Executive Officer for Ships, Naval Sea Systems Command; Damien Bloor, Principal Consultant, First Marine International Limited. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

4 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Courts, Internet & Intellectual Property Subcommittee. Hearing on patent quality enhancement. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

5 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on defeating improvised explosive devices. Gen. Montgomery Meigs, Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defveat Organization. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

Other: PAKISTANI INTERIOR MINISTER AFTAB AHMAD KAHAN SHERPAO _ 9:30 a.m. Meets with the Pakistan-US Joint Working Group on Counter-Terrorism and Law Enforcement. State Department.

HISPANIC BUSINESSES _ The United States Hispanic Chamber of Commerce (USHCC) holds its 16th Annual Legislative Conference Immigration reform, telecommunications reform, and advancing federal procurement opportunities are among the key issues that will receive top billing at this years legislative conference. Highlights: 8 a.m. - 9 a.m. Plenary session on federal procurement. 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Telecommunications briefing with Congressman Xavier Becerra, Lonnie Taylor, Sprint/Nextel; Emilio Gonzalez, Verizon, others. 11:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. Legislative luncheon with keynote address by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. 1:30 p.m. - 5 p.m. Lobbying on Capitol Hill. 5:45 p.m. Legislative awards reception. Senator Robert Menendez will be honored. 7:15 p.m. Legislative Awards Dinner. Congressman Joe Baca to will receive the Presidents Achievement Award. Location: Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-CANADA _ 8:15 a.m. - 2 p.m. The US Chamber of Commerce holds a US-Canadian business dialogue. Participants include US Ambassador to Canada David Wilkins, Canadian Amb. Michael Wilson, Canadian Chamber of Commerce President Nancy Hughes Anthony, Toronto Stock Exchange CEO Richard nesbitt, others. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

SHIPPING CONTAINERS-TERRORISM _ 8:30 a.m. - 5:30 p.m. GE Security has on display a 40-foot shipping container that it has outfitted with its CommerceGuard technology designed to thwart terrorists by securing the container from the inside, where it can't be tampered with or removed. Location: New Jersey Avenue and C Street SE, between Longworth and Cannon Buildings.

FRIST _ 8:30 a.m. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist speaks at a US Chamber of Commerce Policy Insiders event. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 9 a.m. Closed meeting of the House GOP Conference. Location: Room HC-5, Capitol.

JUMP$TART _ 9:30 a.m. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke an the Jump$tart Coalition for Financial Literacy hold a news conference to announce the group's 2006 survey results. Location: FRB offices, 20th and C Sts. NW.

DEMOCRATS-GOP BUDGET _ 10 a.m. The House Democratic leadership holds a news conference to discuss the Republican budget, which they say fails to provide real security. Location: Cannon Rotunda, outside Room 345, Cannon House Office Building.

EVANGELICALS-IMMIGRATION _ 10 a.m. Evangelical leaders hold a news conference on the need for comprehensive immigration reform, with Rev. Mark Gonzales, Hispanic Coalition for Comprehensive Immigration Reform; Rev. Samuel Rodriguez, Jr., National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference; Sammy Mah, World Relief; Richard Cizik, National Association of Evangelicals. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., will participate. Location: Room S-207, Capitol.

GOP-SECURITY SPENDING _ 10 a.m. Speaker of the House J. Dennis Hastert and other mebers of the Republican leadership hold a press conference immediately following GOP Conference to discuss what they is their commitment to spending tax dollars wisely on national security. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

GOP-HEALTH CARE _ 11 a.m. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., holds a pen and pad briefing on what he feels are Senate Republican health care accomplishments. He also will preview the health care priorities for the second session. Location: Senate Press Gallery.

IRAQ _ 11 a.m. Members of Congress, led by Rep. Walter Jones, hold a news conference to announce their support of House Resolution 543 and call on colleagues to adopt the resolution, which would require a full and immediate debate on US policy in Iraq and provide up to 17 hours of deliberation on the House floor. Location: Room 122, Cannon.

DOJ_NMG_0025256

PIG BOOK _ 11 a.m. Citizens Against Government Waste holds a news conference to release its 2006 Congressional Pig Book on pork barrel spending, with Sens. Tom Coburn, Jim DeMint, John McCain and Rep. Jeff Flake. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

DEMOCRATS-VETERANS _ 12:15 p.m. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean will join General Wesley Clark, former DNC Chairman Don Fowler and Kentucky Congressional candidate and retired Marine Corps Lt. Colonel Andrew Horne participate in a conference call announcing membership of new Democratic National Veterans and Military Families Council and unveiling ``Fighting Dems" website. Notes: To RSVP for the conference call and obtain the call-in number, contact Damien LaVera at laveraddnc.org or call (202) 863-8148.

IMMIGRATION REFORM _ 2 p.m. Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., and Gov. Bill Richardson, D-N.M., hold a conference call with members of the media on immigration reform legislation pending before the Senate. Contacts: Nadeam Elshami, 202-228-5643. Notes: Call-in: 202-228-2663 or 866-909-2663. Password: 2707649.

IMMIGRATION-ECONOMY _ 2 p.m. The Immigration Policy Center and the Manhattan Institute hold a telephone press briefing on temporary immigrant workers, permanent workers, high-skill/low-skill visas, border security, and what it will mean for the U.S. economy and various economic sectors. Contacts: Nick Terzulli, 646-839-3342. Notes: Dial 800-289-0494 and ask for the Immigration Press Conference (Conf . 8674368). International callers: dial 1-913-981-5520.

PATRIOT ACT _ 3 p.m. Rep. Maxine Waters and the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation hold a forum on the Patriot Act. Participants include Caroline Fredrickson of the ACLU, Stephanie Jones of the Urban League, others. Location: Room 1539, Longworth.

CLEMENT _ 4:30 p.m. Solicitor General Paul Clement gives a lecture at Georgetown University. Location: Leavey Center Ballroom, Salon G, Georgetown University.

REID-UK DEFENSE _ 6 p.m. - 7 p.m. John Reid, Secretary of State for Defense, The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Location: The Washington Club, 15 Dupont Circle NW.

GLOBAL WARMING _ 7 p.m. Sens. John McCain and Joseph Lieberman, and Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. others, address global warming at the premier of an HBO documentary on the subject. Location: Amphitheater, Reagan Trade Building.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, April 05, 2006 8:38 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, April 05, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060405.pdf; dojclips060405.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, APRIL 5, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

One Verdict Decided, 9/11 Jury Faces Second (NYT) 4
Prosecutors Have Cleared Their Biggest Hurdle In The Moussaoui Case (FINDLAW/AP) 5
Jurors Will Relive 9/11 In Life-or-Death Case (LAT) 7
Martyrdom For Moussaoui? (WP) 8
FBI Resists Easing Rules On Reporting Cash Transactions (WSJ) 9
Amnesty Links 'rendition' Flights With Torture (FT) 10
U.S. Resumes Military Trials At Guantanamo Bay (WSJ) 10
Pakistani Jailed For Five Years In US Over Missiles To Al-Qaeda Plot (AFP-Y2) 11
Chief 9/11 Architect Critical Of Bin Laden (LAT) 12
At His Geneva Shop, Yeslam Bin Ladin Faces Family Trouble (WSJ) 14
FBI Agent Says He Had Basis For Questioning Terror Suspect (SACBEE) 16
Alleged Terror Camp Is A Military Training Center, Defense Witness Testifies (LODINS) 16
Hayat "Terror" Camp May Be Military Facility, Witness Says (KXTV-TV) 18

Homeland Response:

Responsibility For Defending Nuclear Plants Is Debated (NYT) 19
U.S. Security Czar Says Beijing, Washington Close To Pact On Repatriating Migrants (AP) 20
Court Crafts Scheme To Break Deposition Impasse In Sept. 11 Suits (LAW) 20
Homeland Security Pay Plan Goes Forward, But Unions Are Wary (WP) 22
Take Back The Towers (NYT) 23
Senate Panel Adds Billions To Bush Plan For Storm Relief (NYT) 24
Landrieu Threatens Blanket Holds To Get Levee Funding (HILL) 25
For Gulf Towns, Anxious Wait On Flood Plain Status (CSM) 26
FEMA Trailer Park Fails To Survive Storm From Residents (NYT) 27
No Hands On Deck (NYT) 28
Hurricane Prediction: Busy, Again (USAT) 28
In A Year Of Catastrophic Loss, Insurers Saw Record Gains (LAT) 29
Foreign Experts Critique U.S. Red Cross On Katrina (NYT) 32
Counterparts Excoriate Red Cross Katrina Effort (WP) 34

War News:

Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP-Y2) 34
Democracy In Iraq Not A Priority In U.S. Budget (WP) 36
In Iraq, US Still Carries Big Stick (CSM) 37
Let The Iraqis Bargain (WP) 38
Key Iraq Leader Calls For PM To Step Aside (AP-Y2) 39
Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP) 41
Condi's Iraq Stumble (WSJ) 42
Wisconsin Residents Vote On Whether To Keep Troops In Iraq (USAT) 43
Majority Of 32 Wisconsin Towns Vote For Iraq Pullout (WP) 43
Two Deadlines And An Exit (NYT) 44
Hussein Charged With Genocide In 50,000 Deaths (NYT) 45
Iraq Tribunal May Charge Hussein With Genocide Of Kurds (LAT) 47
Saddam Charged With Kurdish Genocide (WT/AP) 47
Court Moves To Try Hussein In Massacre Of Kurds (WP) 48
Saddam Genocide Charge Hard To Prove (AP) 49
Moscow Eyes Lost Oil Contract In Iraq (WT) 50
A Marine's Mother (WP) 51
Walter Reed's World Of Hurt, Hope (WP) 52

Corporate Scandals:

Enron Witness Calls Cuts 'Redeployments' (FINDLAW/AP) 55

Enron Defense Witness Testifies Skilling Didn't Favor Partnership (WSJ) 56
At The Enron Trial, Skilling Then Vs. Skilling Now (NYT) 57
Key Defense Lawyer In Enron Trial Awaits More Surgery (WP) 59
D.C. Was Cheated, SEC Says (WP) 59
Why Sweat The Small Stuff? (WSJ) 61

Criminal Law:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Panel The Justice Department Is Moving Too Slowly On Pedophiles (AP) 62
DHS Spokesman Is Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online (WP) 63
Official Accused Of Soliciting Girl (WT) 64
Minor's Bond Revoked; Attorney Taken To Jail (BSH) 64
Closing Arguments For N.Y. Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY/AP) 65
Defense Closes With Style In Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT) 65
Closing Arguments For Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY) 66
Time Of Essence In 'Mafia Cops' Trial (NSDY) 67
Mob Cops' Dramatic Finish (NYDN) 68
WILY 'MOB COP' DEFENSE (NYPOST) 69
Phony Sheik Selling Fake Rembrandt Is Sentenced (SLPD) . 69
Links Between Pellicano, Director Come Into Focus (LAT) ... 70
Astorga Waives Extradition, Will Return To New Mexico (ALBTRIB) 71
Astorga Headed To New Mexico (KTSM-TV) 72
Man Sought In Deputy's Death Is Captured In Mexico (FWST) 72
Astorga Waives Extradition From Texas (KOB-TV) 73
Judge Declares Second Mistrial In Tenet Case (WSJ) 73
Another Guilty Plea In Hired Truck Case (CHIT) 74
G-Sting: Herrera's Former Friend Testifies Against Him (KLAS-TV) 74
Accused Fixer Now Wants Trial, Not A Guilty Plea (PHI) 76
Feds Bust 3 In Credit Help Scam (NSDY) 77
Fatal Abuse Of Children Up In '04; Neglect Cases Decline (WT) 77
Reflections Behind The Badge (WP) 78

Civil Law:

Agencies Not Protecting Privacy Rights, GAO Says (WP) 80
FDA Warns Maker Of Anthrax Vaccine (WP) 81

Civil Rights:

Federal Authorities To Investigate Businessman's Death (AP) 82
Trial No. 2 For Newport Officers (KNOXNS) 82
Report Faults Prisons Bureau On Chemicals (NYT) 82
Same-sex Marriage Lands Before Federal Appeals Court (AP) 83
Feingold Says He Supports Gay Marriage (AP-Y2) 84
Feingold Backs Legalizing Same-Sex Marriages (WP) 85
San Antonio Couple Wins $125,000 Judgment Against Housing Authority (SABIZ) 85
Bill To Delay Runoff Elections Passes Committee (AP) 86
Tilting Maryland's Vote (WP) 86

Antitrust:

Perspective: Bumps In The Road For AT&T-BellSouth Merger? (CNET) 87
EU Pushes Governments To Open Gas Markets (AP) 89
Citigroup Cleared For Big M&A Deals (FT) 89
Citigroup Is Cleared To Pursue Deals (WSJ) 90
Arcelor Transfers Dofasco Unit To Block Takeover (WSJ) 91
Netflix Sues Blockbuster Over Web Expansion (WSJ/AP) 92
Authorities Raid Color Line Ferry Company (AP-Y2) 93

Environment/Indian Affairs:

EPA Air-toxics Plan Sparks Internal Rift (CSM) 94
Feds Want To Expand Yucca Nuclear Dump (USAT) 95
Congress Is Asked To Set Opening Of Nuclear Dump (WSJ) 95
Cleanup At West Valley Faces Legal Challenge (Times Herald) 96
NY May Sue US Govt To Get W Valley Nuclear Site Cleaned (AP) 97
AK Steel Settles 6-year-old Environmental Lawsuit With Federal And Ohio EPAs (MIDDJOUR) 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

7 In Colombia Face U.S. Drug Charges (WT) 99
7 Arrested In Cocaine Smuggling Ring (AP) 100
8 Charged In Cocaine Smuggling CaseOperation Used Airliners Headed Into New York, Officials Say (CNN) ... 101
Prosecutor: Colombian Smugglers Reveal Air Travel Vulnerability (WNYC) 101
DEA Investigates Oceanside Humane Society North County Humane Society Had Three Visits From DEA (KGTV) 101
North County Humane Society Executive Director Resigns (NCT) 102
Father Says Daughter Acted To Avoid Prison (RTD) 103
Grover Beach Extends Ban On Medical Marijuana Shops (SLOT) 104
News Briefs From California's Central Coast (AP) 104
Officials Say They've Cracked Major Utica Drug Ring (UTOD) 105
Selig Defends Choice Of Mitchell (AP) 105

DOJ_NMG_0025260

Bonds TV Show Debuts With Talk Of Steroids (AP).....106
Alleged Plot To Bomb County Courthouse Uncovered (MINNST).....107

Immigration:

GOP Split Over Immigration Provisions (AP-Y2).....108
Lawmakers Urge Bush To Do More On Immigrant Bill (WSJ)109
Deal On Immigration Elusive (RC).....110
Immigration Measure Stalls In The Senate (NYT).....111
Senate Moves Closer To Vote On Immigration (LAT).....112
McCain Lacks Votes For Guest-Worker Plan (AP-Y2).....114
A Split On The Lines Of Illegal Immigration (WP).....114
Criminal Alien Exception Blocked (WT).....116
McCain Threatens To End Speech After 'boos'Published (WT/AP).....116
Florida Gov. Bush Calls Tone Of Immigration Debate `Hurtful' (LAT).....117
Letter On Immigration Deepens Split Among Evangelicals (WP).....118
Two Towns, Two Stands On Immigration Reform (CSM)...119
63-city Protest Set For Monday (WT).....121
Mobilizing For Monday (WSJ).....122
U.S. Urged To Apologize For 1930s Deportations (USAT)...123
Backstory: Inside 'Border Patrol, Inc.' (CSM).....125
The Amnesty Trap (NYT).....127
Here We Go Again (USAT).....127
A Potential Tidal Wave Come Election Time (USAT).....129
Fuzzy Math On Illegal Immigration (WSJ).....130
The Immigration Impasse: A Way Out (WP).....132
High Fence And Big Gate (NYT).....133

Tax:

SoCal Anti-tax Crusader Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison (AP).....134
Tax Preparers Come Under Fire (WSJ).....135
Some Tax Preparers Don't Add Up (WP).....136
Big Gain For Rich Seen In Tax Cuts For Investments (NYT)137
Wealthiest American Families Add To Their Share Of U.S. Net Worth (WSJ).....139
Is Reliance On Real Estate A Crack In The Foundation? (WP).....139
Fed Debate On 2000 Tech Bust Holds Lesson On Current Risks (WSJ).....141
Stocks Rise On Hopes Of More Mergers (USAT/AP).....142

Congress-Administration:

Snow Gets Muted Bush Support, Fueling Talk He Will Leave Soon (WSJ).....143
Treasury Secretary Is Said To Be Thinking Of Quitting (NYT)143
When DeLay Talks, People Could Pay (WP).....145
Bush Eager To Hear Ideas From Bolten (AP-Y2).....146
Supreme Court Pushes Back On Televised Proceedings (LAW).....146
2 Justices Indicate Supreme Court Is Unlikely To Televise Sessions (NYT).....148
School System Improves Under Our Bright Light (WSJ).....148
NJ Senators To Remove Block On Bush Highway Nominee (AP).....149
Boehner Says Budget Will Reach Floor This Week (RC).....150
House Republicans Seek To Raise Spending (HILL).....151
House GOP Lacks Agenda, DeLay Says (WT).....151
DeLay Announces Resignation From House (AP).....152
GOP Ponders A New Era (HILL).....153
Continuing Legal Troubles Reportedly Left DeLay Dispirited (NYT).....155
DeLay Resignation Unlikely To Affect Election-year Dynamics (KRT).....156
DeLay's Hardball Tactics Coming Back On Him (USAT).....158
DeLay's Decision Fuels GOP Concerns (BSUN).....159
Republicans May Be In Path Of Political 'hurricane' (USAT)160
Indicted DeLay To Resign From Congress (FT).....162
A Clean Slate For The GOP? (PHI).....162
DeLay's Departure A Relief For GOP (RC).....164
Capitalizing On DeLay Dropout (WSJ).....165
DeLay Shows Need For Reform (WT).....166
Analysis: DeLay Leaves Troubling Legacy (AP).....167
DeLay Says Prospect Of Losing Led Him To Step Down (HC).....168
DeLay Departing On Own Terms (WP).....170
DeLay Says He'll Lead From The Outside (DMN).....172
Why DeLay Quit (NAT REV).....174
Legal Costs Will Remain Challenge For DeLay (RC).....175
House Ethics Panel Not Investigating DeLay, Other Lawmakers (USAT).....177
Republicans See Better Prospects In Texas Race (RC).....178
Constituents Look To Fill Void In District (USAT).....179
Announcement Puts 22nd District Up For Grabs (DMN).....180
A Surprise Move Leaves Texas Politics In Disarray (NYT)....182
Many Show Interest In Seat (HC).....183
Republican Contenders Eye DeLay's Seat (WT).....184
Frontrunner: Wallace Launches Bid For DeLay's Seat (TIME).....185
From DeLay To November (WSJ).....186
Exit Tom DeLay (WP).....187

DOJ_NMG_0025261

The Fall Of The Hammer (NYT) 188
DeLay Loses Principle, Then Power (USAT) 188
Out Of The House, Not Out Of Trouble (WP) 189
After DeLay, A New Approach? (WP) 190
Tom DeLay — A Man Of Consequence (WT) 191
Now, The Spotlight Turns To Rep. Ney (RC) 192
Ney Vows He'll Fight On, Not Quit (HILL) 193
New Maneuvers By Lawmakers Over A Colleague's Altercation (NYT) 195
McKinney Rebuked By Her Leader (HILL) 195
After Scuffle, House GOP Acts To Laud Capitol Police (USAT/AP) 196
Lawmaker's Encounter With Guard Raises A Capitol Tempest (LAT) 197
Security On Capitol Hill Is No Joke (USAT) 198
The McKinney Mess (RC) 199
U.S. Focus On Abstinence Weakens AIDS Fight, Agency Finds (NYT) 199
U.S. Abstinence Tack In AIDS Prevention Is Criticized By GAO (WSJ) 200
GAO Criticizes Bush's AIDS Plan (WP) 201
Laura Bush Visits St. Louis For Fundraiser, Youth (AP) 202
Laura Bush Headlines Talent Campaign Fundraiser (SLPD) 203
527 Bill Splits Republicans (HILL) 203
Close The 527 Loophole (WP) 205
Senate Dems To Pursue New Strategy On Abortion (HILL) .205
Turning The Tables (TIME) 207
Biden Seeks Review Of State Department Screening (KRT) 208
The Reliable Source (WP) 208
Help For Families (WT) 209

Other News:

Investors Seek Clarity On Campaign Giving (WSJ) 210
Hillary Leaves Room For Gore (HILL) 211
Buckley Calls Clinton A Contender (NYT/BLOOM) 212
Mass. Residents Face Required Coverage (USAT) 213
Massachusetts Sets Health Plan For Nearly All (NYT) 213
Mass. Bill Requires Health Coverage (WP) 215
Massachusetts Seeks To Mandate Health Coverage (WSJ) 216
A Warm Farewell For A Cold Warrior (WP) 218
Theme Park-Like Camp Built Near Haymarket (WP) 219
Couric To Announce Her Move On 'Today' (WP) 220
Yes, It's Anti-Semitic (WP) 221
Iran: Ready To Negotiate On Enrichment (AP) 222
Democrat: Intelligence On Iran Inadequate (AP) 223
Iran Says It Can Handle Any Invasion (AP) 224
Some Say Iran's Weapons Come From Russia (AP) 225
Israelis Target Base In Abbas' Compound (AP) 227
Hamas FM Says Will Visit China (AFP-Y2) 228
Rice To Lay Out U.S.-India Nuclear Deal Before Some Skeptical Lawmakers (WP) 228
India Nuclear Deal Spurs Lobbying Pro And Con (RC) 230
Indian Nuke Deal's Fate Could Be Linked To Iran Sanctions Bill (HILL) 231
A Pretty Good Deal For America (WSJ) 233
Russia, United States Increasingly At Odds (AP) 234
U.S. Near Deal With China On Illegals (WT) 235
Tokyo Trip Could Aid Talks On N. Korea (WP) 236
Syria Imposing Stronger Curbs On Opposition (NYT) 237
Possible Crack In The Boycott Of Danish Goods (NYT) 239
Westerners In Madrassahs (CSM) 239
Historic First: Kuwaiti Women Vote, Run (CSM) 241
Scandal Pushes Thai Premier To Say He'll Resign (WP) 242
Thai Premier Quits His Post, Ending Turmoil (NYT) 243
Candidate Promises To Reform The U.N. (WT) 244
French Premier Refuses To Bow To Protests By Angry Youths (NYT) 244
Millions In France Protest Law, Leadership (WP) 246
Ex-Spy For Britain Found Fatally Shot In N. Ireland (WP) 247
I.R.A. Turncoat Is Murdered In Donegal (NYT) 248
Former Sinn Fein Official Shot To Death (USAT) 249
Two Worn-Out Diplomats, One Fold-Out Bed (NYT) 250
Dark Days For Philippine Democracy (NYT) 251

TERRORISM NEWS:

One Verdict Decided, 9/11 Jury Faces Second (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025262

WASHINGTON, April 4 — When the jurors in the Zacarias Moussaoui trial take their seats again on Thursday, they will begin a vastly different proceeding than the one they concluded on Monday with the verdict that he was responsible for some of the deaths of Sept. 11, 2001, and is thus eligible for execution.

At the end of this next phase, which may take several weeks, they will be confronted with a verdict form that will be without the subtleties and complex questions of the first phase and instead will ask them to make a more mechanical calculation.

The form will ask them to decide which carries more weight: mitigating factors like Mr. Moussaoui's troubled mental state, or aggravating factors surrounding the deaths of nearly 3,000 people on Sept. 11.

The Justice Department has asked the judge to list 26 aggravating factors on the form, including the deaths of hundreds of firefighters and police officers; the grief brought to the victims' families and friends; the disruption to New York City, including the closing of parks, playgrounds and schools and the displacement of businesses; and the destruction of parts of the Pentagon.

Mr. Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyers are expected to offer two main factors in mitigation: that he is mentally unbalanced and that he is seeking martyrdom.

In the eyes of several death penalty experts and lawyers, there is little doubt as to which way the scale will tilt, no matter what the final verdict form looks like. If the nine men and three women on the jury find that the aggravating factors are greater, they will turn to the simple checkoff on the form, marking whether they believe that Mr. Moussaoui should be jailed for life or executed. The death penalty would mean lethal injection at the federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind.

Richard C. Dieter, the executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a research group based in Washington that has been critical of the application of the death penalty, said it would be a relatively easy phase for jurors.

The unanimous decision on Monday dealt with what seems to be far more complex issues, namely whether Mr. Moussaoui could be held responsible for deaths on Sept. 11 even though he was in jail at the time and did not participate directly in the attacks.

Mr. Dieter said the outcome was still not a foregone conclusion. But like many lawyers following the case, he said he believed that "the balance is so much one way," adding, "Everybody knows what the crime is, the suffering it caused and what it has done to the whole country."

Nonetheless, he said that jurors "are not automatons" and that someone might flinch at imposing the death penalty when the moment comes.

In addition, Mr. Moussaoui, whose testimony in the first phase probably contributed to the verdict against him, is likely to testify again over the advice of his lawyers.

The jury has been what lawyers term "death-qualified," which means that all members have sworn that they are willing to impose the death penalty if warranted. Under the complicated multistep federal death penalty law, if the jury is unanimous in finding for execution, the judge is obliged to impose the sentence.

Beginning on Thursday, the prosecutors will try to focus the jurors' attention on the horrors of Sept. 11. There may be photographs of many of the victims introduced as well as testimony from as many as 45 family members of victims to recount how their lives have been affected.

The theme of the government's presentation will be that Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old admitted member of Al Qaeda, should be regarded as a proxy for the 19 hijackers who died that day.

Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers, whose advice he has spurned and whose character he has reviled, have indicated they would present psychological testimony that he was affected by anti-Muslim bigotry during his childhood in France. They may also urge the jurors to recognize that he seeks martyrdom and ask them to deny him that.

Prosecutors Have Cleared Their Biggest Hurdle In The Moussaoui Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

(AP) - ALEXANDRIA, Virginia-Thanks largely to Zacarias Moussaoui himself, prosecutors have cleared their highest hurdle that might deter execution of the al-Qaida conspirator. The path to the death chamber might still contain unpleasant surprises for the government.

DOJ_NMG_0025263

When the case began more than four years ago, it looked easier. The government at first thought Moussaoui had been intended to be a 20th hijacker on Sept. 11, 2001. Once it became clear that wasn't his role, the government dialed back its case.

It didn't want to drop the death penalty for the high-profile prisoner who admitted having been trained to fly a plane in an attack similar to Sept. 11. The biggest problem was that Moussaoui was in jail on 9/11 and had been for almost a month.

The final government theory bore some resemblance to a pretzel: Moussaoui was directly responsible for deaths on 9/11 because he hadn't confessed all he knew when arrested. Thus, the contention was, the FBI was prevented from moving to block some or all of the four hijackings that day.

Another twist was added when many of the government witnesses for the prosecution gave as much or more comfort to the defense: They acknowledged misstep after misstep in handling leads about Moussaoui and other terrorists in the summer of 2001, raising doubts about what if anything Moussaoui could have said to change things.

Then Moussaoui took the stand over the objections of the court-appointed defense lawyers. He abandoned claims he'd made for three years that his plot to fly a 747 into the White House was unrelated to 9/11. For the first time, he said he had been training to hijack a fifth jetliner on 9/11 and fly it into the White House.

"This stage of the penalty phase was probably harder for the government, but that was before he took the stand and connected all the dots for the jury," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a group that advocates more equitable administration of the death statute.

"Whether this act (lying to agents) fits the federal death penalty law may have been a tougher question without his testimony," Dieter added. "Whether his acts a month or months ahead of time directly caused these deaths is a good question. The fact that the defendant himself says they were directly connected doesn't necessarily prove it, but it was enough for the jury."

Now testimony shifts in the second phase to whether Moussaoui deserves the death penalty for his acts. Prosecutors will introduce evidence of how heinous the crime was, while the defense will try to show mitigating factors.

What do they have: Prosecutors can pick among the personal tragedies of the families of nearly 3,000 people who died in the 9/11 attacks. The defense has indicated it will try to call a doctor to testify Moussaoui was schizophrenic and sociologists to describe his impoverished upbringing in France and the racism he faced there and in England for his Moroccan ancestry.

The testimony of victim families "is going to be a highly emotional, devastating presentation to the jury," said Mary Cheh, a law professor at George Washington University, who thought the eligibility phase could have gone the other way. "I can't imagine his being able to overcome that."

Now defense attorneys "are going uphill all the way," Cheh said. "I have no idea what they will come forward with."

Northwestern University law professor Ronald Allen agreed that Moussaoui's team has "a very uphill fight," but he cautions that the first phase is a formal decision, while "the second decision is whether to kill somebody. That becomes intensely personal. It's moral and complicated and messy."

Dieter agreed: "It only gets more complicated when a person's life is in the balance."

Another George Washington University law professor, Stephen Saltzburg, also thought prosecutors had gotten past the hard part, and their phase two presentation would be pretty straightforward. "You're going to see some powerful testimony from the families," Saltzburg said. "It's going to be a chance for some of them to get closure as best they can."

And Moussaoui could harm his own case again, Saltzburg said. He doubted the 37-year-old Frenchman would cooperate in any effort by his lawyers to portray him as a lunatic, but "he's liable to want to testify again, and do himself even greater harm. I would not be surprised if he doesn't invite them to give him the death penalty."

That would bring on the last step: appeals.

Dieter said the government's unusual case left many questions for an appeal, where anything could happen.

For prosecutors, "the more difficult time is going to be on appeal," said Jesse Chopper, law professor at the University of California at Berkeley. "His appointed lawyers are going to have many, many potential issues to raise. Compared to that, the penalty phase will be a piece of cake."

EDITOR'S NOTE - Michael J. Sniffen has reported on legal affairs from Washington for three decades.

DOJ_NMG_0025264

Jurors Will Relive 9/11 In Life-or-Death Case (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

Family members and victims will testify about their loss. Lawyers for Zacarias Moussaoui plan to paint a picture of a mentally ill man.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — When the Zacarias Moussaoui trial resumes Thursday, gone will be the images of a shadowy world of Muslim extremists, of an FBI and CIA unable to track their movements, of a conspiracy in which Moussaoui's role on Sept. 11 is still unclear.

Now that a jury has found Moussaoui eligible for the death penalty, the trial comes down to a single question: Does he live or die?

Federal prosecutors, wanting Moussaoui dead, intend next to turn Courtroom 700 over to the horror of that day 4 1/2 years ago. They hope to show pictures of all 2,972 who perished, videos of the World Trade Center towers afire and bodies falling, and audiotapes of desperate phone calls to loved ones and emergency crews.

The government has designated up to 45 victims and family members to testify about their collective loss. And they hope to contrast their anguish with Moussaoui's boasts that America remains his enemy.

Separately, defense lawyers believe the jury might spare their client's life if they can show he is insane. They have several mental health professionals standing by, at least one ready to testify that Moussaoui appears to be schizophrenic.

The defense team will also say its 37-year-old client emerged from a tragic childhood only to fall under the spell of terrorist leaders preaching jihad against the West.

Jurors also are likely to hear one more time from Moussaoui. He is insistent on taking the witness stand, despite his devastating testimony last week that all but convicted him.

Moussaoui's behavior is difficult to predict, and his final performance before the jury — as an unrepentant terrorist or simply deranged — could well be the tipping point on whether he is sentenced to death by lethal injection or a life in prison without parole.

Andrew McCarthy, a former federal prosecutor in New York who has successfully tried terrorists, expects the government to prevail. But he warned that flashing thousands of photos and videos of cascading bodies could inure the jury against the human suffering they are watching.

McCarthy noted that in the first trial against four Los Angeles police officers for assaulting Rodney G. King, the beating video was shown over and over and all the officers were acquitted.

"After a while it's like watching a Road Runner cartoon, where the coyote keeps falling off the cliff and you don't wince anymore," McCarthy said. "If you overdo it, you'll lose all sensitivity."

In contrast, Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond in Virginia, believes the insanity claim has merit, especially since the Supreme Court has exempted the mentally ill from capital punishment.

He said that with overwhelming government evidence that Moussaoui is an avowed terrorist, not to mention his self-incriminating testimony, insanity is probably the only option left for defense lawyers hamstrung by a client they cannot control.

"Who better than his counsel would be able to present a judgment about his mental fitness?" Tobias asked.

Evan Kohlmann, an international expert on terrorism who has worked as a trial consultant for the government in Virginia, agreed that prosecutors might find it difficult to knock down the insanity defense.

"The guy has been to some pretty crazy places and is definitely shellshocked," Kohlmann said, referring to Moussaoui's exploits in the war in Chechnya and at Al Qaeda training camps in Afghanistan.

"He also has been brainwashed in the ideology he holds. He's to the point of no return. But I don't know if that amounts to insanity."

Nevertheless, the government could counter the insanity argument by simply using Moussaoui's words. When he testified last week, he did not blather or snarl. Rather, he was well-spoken, polite at times, even as his statements chilled the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0025265

He was "delighted" at the sight of the trade center collapsing. The smoking ruins, he said, were "gorgeous." He praised the 19 hijackers he was unable to join because he was arrested just weeks before the attacks. "They are now in the highest level of paradise," he said.

Moussaoui also had this to say about the judge, the prosecutors, his defense team and the jury: "I consider every American to be my enemy. So for me, any American is meant to want my death because I want their death."

His defense team, to whom he no longer talks, plans to present several mental health experts and sociologists to try to convince the jury that this kind of bombastic talk has deep roots in Moussaoui's troubled psyche.

On the stand, they are prepared to say Moussaoui, born in France to Moroccan parents, was largely raised an orphan, the son of a violent and alcoholic father and a mother who left him with others for child care. As a teenager, Moussaoui and his siblings struggled to eat and to stay in school in France.

He eventually drifted to England and into the arms of a fiery Muslim mosque that preached hate against Americans.

According to a defense brief filed in the case, psychiatrist Dr. Nancy C. Andreasen, "will testify that Mr. Moussaoui suffers from a major thought disorder, most likely schizophrenia."

To reach that diagnosis, "she will rely on her analysis of Mr. Moussaoui's writing and his appearances in court."

Martyrdom For Moussaoui? (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

When Zacarias Moussaoui agreed to plead guilty to terrorism conspiracy charges last year, he told the judge he would accept a death sentence and acknowledged he was headed toward "the gas chamber or the lethal injection."

Two days later, Moussaoui vowed to "fight every inch against the death penalty."

Last week, he seemed to reverse course again, implicating himself in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist plot when he took the stand at his death penalty hearing. That was before he screamed, "You'll never get my blood!" Monday after jurors found him eligible for execution.

Moussaoui's own words have raised questions about whether he wants to be executed to achieve martyrdom for the terrorist cause that he so passionately embraces. Experts on al-Qaeda and Islam think he does. Moussaoui's flip-flops on the subject make it impossible to be sure.

Yet if the Sept. 11 conspirator is indeed seeking martyrdom, it could have implications inside and outside the courtroom as jurors return to U.S. District Court in Alexandria tomorrow to begin the final phase of Moussaoui's sentencing trial.

When the United States sought death in 2001 for two convicted al-Qaeda terrorists for bombing U.S. embassies in East Africa, jurors voted to spare their lives. Ten jurors noted on the verdict form that executing one of the men could "make him a martyr" for terrorist groups.

In Islamic tradition, martyrdom means dying in a way deserving of paradise. Osama bin Laden believes that can be achieved through suicide operations. An al-Qaeda training manual, introduced as evidence at Moussaoui's trial, states that members must "be willing to do the work and undergo martyrdom for the purpose of achieving the goal and establishing the religion of majestic Allah on earth."

Some legal experts believe that's exactly what could happen if the Moussaoui jury votes to put him to death. "There's absolutely no doubt that executing him would turn him into a martyr," said Bruce Hoffman, who has studied terrorism at the Rand Corp. for 25 years.

Hoffman said terrorist groups have historically seized on martyred comrades for propaganda and to boost recruitment. Moussaoui's execution would have the same impact, he said.

"It's time for our government to be thinking about the wider repercussions," Hoffman said.

Others who track terrorist groups disagreed, noting that testimony from al-Qaeda leaders read at Moussaoui's trial portray him as a troublemaker who couldn't get along with his bosses. "I think some people might attempt to turn him into a martyr but with very little success. Even al-Qaeda cut this guy loose," said Peter Bergen, who has written two books about bin Laden's group.

DOJ_NMG_0025266

"He might get the worst of all possible worlds," Bergen said. "He gets executed, which is his desire, and al-Qaeda, because this guy was fairly problematic, doesn't turn him into a martyr for the movement."

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. He is the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11. After a three-week trial, federal jurors Monday said Moussaoui was eligible for execution, finding that his lies to federal agents when he was arrested in August 2001 allowed the attacks to go forward.

In the trial's second phase, jurors will decide whether Moussaoui should be put to death or remain in prison for life.

The French citizen seemed to embrace execution when he told the government and U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema last year that he intended to plead guilty. At an April 20 hearing, Brinkema reminded Moussaoui that he had notified her two days earlier that he wanted "to accept the death penalty, which seems to be totally contradictory to the position you've taken in the past."

The judge added that Moussaoui had "made reference to the concept of martyrdom," according to a transcript.

Moussaoui responded that he had come to understand that "the course I've chosen will lead me potentially -- you say potentially, I say surely, but it's a matter of opinion -- to the gas chamber or the lethal injection. I understand this fact. I understand life and death."

Two days later, as he pleaded guilty, Moussaoui told Brinkema he had "significantly changed my position following the advice I receive from you. . . . I will not apply for death."

Yet courtroom observers thought that's precisely what Moussaoui was doing March 27 when he testified at his sentencing trial. He calmly told jurors that he wanted to kill every American, starting with what he said was his mission to fly a fifth hijacked airplane into the White House on Sept. 11. He also admitted to the government's key argument against him: that he had lied to the FBI to allow the plot to go forward.

Moussaoui said he knew his mission would be a suicide operation. Richard Bulliet, an expert on Islam at Columbia University, said Moussaoui apparently still wants to be a martyr. He said Moussaoui's testimony against himself fits with the Islamic doctrine of "purity of intent."

"If he dies with his intent clearly stated and pure and devoted to religious goals, then the chances of his being a martyr in his mind are greatly improved," Bulliet said.

Other experts noted that terrorists who go to prison for life, such as Ramzi Yousef -- architect of the first World Trade Center bombing in 1993 -- are rarely heard from again. "Moussaoui could achieve a fame and notoriety in death that eluded him in life," Hoffman said. "In life, he was a failed terrorist."

FBI Resists Easing Rules On Reporting Cash Transactions (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. law-enforcement agencies are opposing efforts by the financial-services industry to cut back a federal requirement that banks report cash transactions in excess of $10,000.

A crackdown on money laundering by the federal government in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks has forced banks to tighten their controls but has also led to complaints that government requirements are too onerous and ineffective in catching terrorists.

The House took that view into account when it passed a broad regulation-relief bill last month, which, among other things, would grant some exemptions from filing the cash reports. The Senate hasn't introduced its version of a relief bill.

At a hearing yesterday before the Senate Banking Committee, the Federal Bureau of Investigation argued that the currency-transaction reports filed by banks provide valuable intelligence in money-laundering and terrorist-financing investigations.

"To dramatically alter currency transaction reporting requirements -- without careful, independent study -- could be devastating and a significant setback to investigative and intelligence efforts," Michael Morehart, the FBI's terrorist-financing-operations section chief, told the panel.

DOJ_NMG_0025267

Such viewpoints may sway committee members who seem to want to tread lightly when considering whether to modify bank reporting requirements.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes, the ranking Democrat from Maryland, said law-enforcement officials "laid out a strong rationale for the utility of the reports. We've got to strike a balance."

Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's undersecretary in the office of terrorism and financial intelligence, recommended that the committee request that the Government Accountability Office do a thorough study about the effectiveness of the reporting program before proposing changes.

The American Bankers Association, which pushed for the House provision, has complained that the number of transaction reports now tops 13 million annually, costing $187 million in wages. The trade group argues that the reporting program is "obsolete" because of new customer identification systems and other suspicious-transaction reporting requirements.

Amnesty Links 'rendition' Flights With Torture (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

Three Yemeni men abducted and mistreated by the US were probably held in eastern Europe, Amnesty International said in a new report.

A study by Amnesty, based on interviews with the former captives, is intended to cast light on Washington's practice of "rendition", or extra-legal abduction, which the human rights group says often paves the way to torture or maltreatment.

Washington insists it never sends detainees to places where they would be at risk of torture – but it also defines torture much more narrowly than do other governments.

The study said Muhammad Bashmilah, Salah Ali Qaru and Muhammad al-Assad were "held in at least four secret US-run facilities...from the information subsequently provided by the men [about the climate, food and prayer schedules] it is likely they were held in Djibouti, Afghanistan and somewhere in eastern Europe".

Both Poland and Romania, named last year as likely centres of CIA "secret prisons" by Human Rights Watch, another campaigning organisation, have denied hosting any such facilities.

Wednesday's report adds that after being arrested and transferred to US custody in 2003, the men were brought back to Yemen in 2005 and released in February this year. Although all were sentenced for forgery in connection with false travel documents, none was charged with any terrorism-related offences. The report also says they had been shackled, kept unaware of their location and not allowed to see daylight for months.

While CIA renditions have stirred controversy in Europe, criticism in the US has been relatively muted, particularly on Capitol Hill. John McCain, the Republican senator who was tortured in Vietnam, pushed through legislation banning torture, but other senior Republicans have avoided the renditions debate.

Patrick Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Senate judiciary committee, and Edward Markey, a Democratic congressman, have introduced legislation that would compel the secretary of state to assure Congress that the administration would only transfer prisoners to countries where it believes they would not be tortured, but the legislation stands little chance of approval.

Jennifer Daskal, advocacy director at Human Rights Watch, says Democrats have been unwilling to push the issue because of the lack of Republican support and concerns they could be painted as soft on national security.

U.S. Resumes Military Trials At Guantanamo Bay (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, Cuba -- The Bush administration resumed military proceedings against suspected terrorists here, one week after the Supreme Court heard arguments in a case brought by a Guantanamo prisoner who claims the secretive courts are unlawful.

Outside the hearing room, the chief military prosecutor took the unusual step of upbraiding Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer for a question he asked at last week's oral argument, suggesting that the justice didn't appreciate the gravity of threats facing the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0025268

The hearing yesterday saw a repetition of the interpretation and translation problems that have plagued previous proceedings, as prosecutors said defendant Abdul Zahir hadn't been provided a copy of the charges in Farsi -- his preferred language. Having brought no interpreter of their own to the hearing chamber, prosecutors asked to rely on the defense attorney's Farsi interpreter.

Mr. Zahir, an Afghan said to be about 35 years old, is charged with conspiracy, aiding the enemy and attacking civilians. The Pentagon alleges he joined al Qaeda as a translator in 1997 and later served as a paymaster, propagandist and communications manager. The charges carry a potential life sentence.

The presiding officer, Marine Col. Robert Chester, ordered that a written copy of the charges be provided in Farsi to Mr. Zahir. Mr. Zahir had received the charges in English, Arabic and Pashto, a language related to Farsi. A Pentagon spokeswoman said later that authorities assumed Pashto was his preferred language since he is believed to have come from a province where it is spoken.

Col. Chester, responding to questions raised by Mr. Zahir's Pentagon-appointed defense lawyer, Army Lt. Col. Thomas Bogar, said he was uncertain which domestic, international or military laws might be applied before the military commission, or his view of arguments last week at the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court decision, expected in June, was also on the mind of the chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Moe Davis, who at a news conference after the hearing took aim at Justice Breyer.

Col. Davis recalled that Justice Breyer had questioned whether current counterterrorism operations gave rise to nearly unlimited presidential war powers. "Towards the end of the argument Justice Breyer said, in talking about the current conflict, 'This is not a war, at least not an ordinary war.' "

Col. Davis said "the dictionary defines war as being in a state of hostility or a state of armed conflict" and added that "a few hours after Justice Breyer said this is not a war, enemy combatants launched a major attack on coalition forces in southern Afghanistan," leading to 34 U.S., Canadian and enemy deaths.

Pakistani Jailed For Five Years In US Over Missiles To Al-Qaeda Plot (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 5, 2006

A Pakistani who plotted to peddle heroin and hashish to buy Stinger anti-aircraft missiles for Al-Qaeda or the Taliban has been jailed for nearly five years, US prosecutors said.

Muhammed Abid Afridi, who pleaded guilty in March 2004 to conspiracy to provide material support to terrorists and conspiracy to distribute heroin and hashish, was sentenced Monday in the California city of San Diego.

US District Judge James Lorenz sentenced Afridi to 57 months behind bars, followed by five years of supervised release, for taking part in the conspiracy along with two other men.

Co-conspirators Ilyas Ali and Syed Mustajab Shah, who pleaded guilty to the same charges, are scheduled to be sentenced next Monday and on June 19, respectively.

The trio of conspirators travelled from the Pakistani city of Karachi to Hong Kong on September 15, 2002 to meet with US undercover officers to negotiate for the sale of large quantities of drugs, the indictment showed.

The next day, the defendants agreed that they could offset the purchase price of five tonnes of hashish and 600 kilograms of heroin against the cost of four Stinger shoulder-launched missiles, according to prosecutors.

On September 18, 2002, at a hotel in Hong Kong, the men told the undercover officers they would be able to resell the missiles to the Taliban, who had been swept out of power in Afghanistan, or Al-Qaeda, according to the complaint.

Shah, Afridi and Ali were arrested in Hong Kong on September 20, 2002 by local law enforcement authorities at the request of the US government.

They were indicted by a federal grand jury on October 30, 2002 and extradited to the United States the same year.

The three had initially men denied the charges when they first appeared in court in San Diego.

US authorities have been on a sharp lookout for Stinger missiles which they have warned pose a threat to military aircraft and commercial airlines.

DOJ_NMG_0025269

The United States launched its "war on terror" at home and abroad following the 2001 attacks in New York and Washington.

Chief 9/11 Architect Critical Of Bin Laden (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — To hear Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed tell it, Osama bin Laden was a meddling boss whose indiscretion and poor judgment threatened to derail the terrorist attacks.

He also saddled Mohammed with at least four would-be hijackers who the ringleader thought were ill-equipped for the job. And he carelessly dropped hints about the imminent attacks, violating Mohammed's cardinal rule against discussing the suicide hijacking plot.

The repeated conflicts between the two Al Qaeda leaders emerged last week during the penalty phase of the trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person charged in the United States in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. Jurors heard new details of the plot from the interrogation summaries of several captured Al Qaeda officials, including an extraordinary account of a series of interrogations of Mohammed.

Mohammed described Al Qaeda in a written statement for his U.S. interrogators as an almost mystically efficient corporation that operates in ways Americans would never understand.

The portly Kuwaiti, who had studied engineering in the U.S. and was captured in Pakistan in 2003, told his interrogators that they could learn a lot from Al Qaeda, the organization.

"You must study these matters to know the huge difference between the Western mentality in administration and the Eastern mentality, specifically at Al Qaeda."

The hallmark of the system, he said, was unquestioned control: Everyone up the chain of command did as they were told, didn't ask questions and never bucked authority — all for the common cause of the enterprise, which in this case was killing as many Americans as possible.

"I know that the materialistic Western mind cannot grasp the idea, and that it is difficult for them to believe," Mohammed wrote. "But in the end," he gloated, "the operation was a success."

Yet Mohammed describes a terrorist outfit fraught with the same conflicts and petty animosities that plague many American corporations. Mohammed describes himself in particular as having to fend off a chairman of the board who insists on micromanaging despite not knowing what he was doing.

"[Shaikh] Mohammed stated that he was usually compelled to do whatever Bin Laden wanted with respect to operatives for the September 11 operation," the interrogation summary states. "That said, [Shaikh] Mohammed noted that he disobeyed Bin Laden on several occasions by taking operatives assigned to him by Bin Laden and using them how he best saw fit."

His independence from Bin Laden had its limits, however, because it was Al Qaeda's money and operatives that enabled the plot to go forward.

Mohammed succeeded in rejecting three attempts by Bin Laden to accelerate the plot. But he said his boss canceled an entire overseas element of the hijacking scheme that he was orchestrating.

Bin Laden presumably would have his own version of events. But a former FBI agent who closely tracked Al Qaeda said the testy relationship described by Mohammed was consistent with the accounts of other terrorism suspects in custody.

"They couldn't stand each other," the former official said. "They both had huge egos."

The seeds of conflict were planted at the beginning, when Mohammed first presented his idea in 1996 to hijack U.S. planes and fly them into buildings. He specifically suggested "that they send [mujahedin] to study in the flight institutes and use large planes" rather than the smaller military ones that Al Qaeda operatives were trained in flying.

He was turned away, Mohammed said, because Bin Laden told him the plan was unworkable.

Three years later, Bin Laden summoned Mohammed to Afghanistan and gave him the green light. Soon he moved his family from Pakistan to an Al Qaeda base in Kandahar, Afghanistan, to proceed with the operation.

DOJ_NMG_0025270

By October 2000, Mohammed had risen in the ranks and was in firm control of the Sept. 11 plot, showing an array of management skills.

It was Mohammed who decided to send two hijackers to San Diego after coming across San Diego phone books in a local market in Karachi, Pakistan, and determining that it had numerous flight schools and other important amenities.

Mohammed told the two to visit the zoo and other tourist sites so they would blend in while they were taking flight lessons and otherwise preparing for the suicide hijackings.

He told his interrogators he provided "personalized training" to an estimated 39 Al Qaeda operatives for deployment on missions.

And Mohammed revealed some of his management stratagems to his interrogators.

"Simplicity was the key to success," was one of them.

For instance, he told the plot's co-conspirators not to use codes, especially in routine messages or e-mails.

"He asked the operatives to be normal to the maximum extent possible in their dealings, to keep the tone of their letters educational, social or commercial, and to keep the calls short."

Mohammed also delegated tasks. He entrusted much of the communications and finance details to two underlings so he would not have to be in contact with the hijackers while they were in America. And he gave lead hijacker Mohamed Atta the authority over many operational details.

Mohammed said he was a stickler for security. He insisted on compartmentalizing the details of the plot, to such a degree that even some of Al Qaeda's top officials did not know them.

"When four people know the details of an operation, it is dangerous; when two people know, it is good; when just one person knows, it is better," Mohammed said, according to his interrogators.

Had Mohammed not insisted on such security measures, he suggested, Bin Laden might have endangered the whole mission. That's because Bin Laden, an exiled Saudi multimillionaire with a huge trust fund, apparently had a knack for forcing Mohammed to take operatives who couldn't follow directions or keep their mouths shut.

In the earliest stages, Bin Laden told Mohammed to use two of his favored young operatives as lead members of the hijacking team.

Mohammed had concerns from the outset about Nawaf Alhazmi and Khalid Almihdhar, believing the two men would stick out like sore thumbs while living in the United States. Other team members would ultimately be handpicked, he said, for their worldliness, street savvy and other applicable skills.

Alhazmi and Almihdhar had U.S. visas, which helped. But one hardly spoke English and the other spoke none.

"They barely knew how to function in U.S. society," Mohammed told his interrogators. "The only reason they were involved in the 9/11 plot was because they had visas and because Bin Laden ... wanted the two to go on the operation."

By mid-2000, Mohammed moved to kick Almihdhar out of the group because he defied his orders and left the United States for Yemen, leaving Alhazmi alone in San Diego.

But Bin Laden interceded and instructed Mohammed to allow Almihdhar to return to the United States and the hijacking team, he said.

Mohammed also resented a purported 20th hijacker, Mohammed al-Qahtani, imposed on him by Bin Laden, describing him as "too much of an unsophisticated Bedouin to function in a modern society." Al-Qahtani was turned away by a suspicious customs agent in Orlando, Fla., and never joined the mission.

They had repeated disagreements over Moussaoui, whose run-ins with Al Qaeda operatives in Malaysia convinced Mohammed that he was not a "suitable operative," even with his valuable European credentials, which made him less suspicious to U.S. authorities.

Mohammed recalled Moussaoui to Pakistan and asked Bin Laden and top aide Mohammed Atef for permission to expel him from the organization. At the time, Mohammed says, Moussaoui was to be a participant in a second wave of planned attacks to follow Sept. 11.

"Despite [Shaikh] Mohammed's suggestion, Atef and Bin Laden insisted that Moussaoui remain in the program and instructed that the program should continue as planned," according to the interrogation report.

DOJ_NMG_0025271

Moussaoui was punished by being sent to a school in Kandahar, after which Al Qaeda leaders pronounced him "reformed," the interrogation summary states.

Mohammed, however, "was not convinced." He grudgingly complied with his orders and sent Moussaoui to the United States for flight training. But he purposely kept Moussaoui in the dark about plot details, and told him never to mention aircraft in any communications.

Soon after he reached the United States, Moussaoui violated the order, sending Mohammed an e-mail detailing his attempts to get flight training on various aircraft.

An "exasperated" Mohammed ordered aides to break off contact with Moussaoui for fear that his indiscretion would tip off authorities about Al Qaeda's presence in the U.S.

By then, it was too late. When arrested in mid-August in Minnesota, Moussaoui possessed enough incriminating information to alert authorities to the carefully orchestrated plot, law enforcement officials would later assert.

He also was found with the home address of a top Al Qaeda chemical and biological weapons expert in South Asia, which triggered a manhunt for the operative and raised scrutiny of travelers from Pakistan to Malaysia, a favorite Al Qaeda pipeline.

Meanwhile, to Mohammed's chagrin, Bin Laden was repeatedly dropping hints about what was soon to come.

In one case, Mohammed said, Bin Laden told visitors to his Afghanistan headquarters to expect a major near-term attack against U.S. interests. In another, he said, the boss asked trainees at the Al Farooq camp near Kandahar "to pray for the success of a major operation involving 20 martyrs."

Both Mohammed and Atef "were concerned about this lack of discretion and urged Bin Laden not to make additional comments about the plot," Mohammed told his interrogators.

The interrogation summary also said he had resisted taking a sworn oath of allegiance, or bayat, to Bin Laden for as long as possible, "to ensure that he remained free to plan operations however he chose."

After Sept. 11, Mohammed finally relented, he said. Even then, he did so grudgingly, after he was told "that the refusal of such a senior and accomplished Al Qaeda leader to swear bayat set a bad example for the group's rank and file."

At His Geneva Shop, Yeslam Bin Ladin Faces Family Trouble (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

GENEVA -- A prominent entrepreneur in this posh Swiss city is seeking to build a luxury-goods business by turning his first name into a new brand: Yeslam.

It's a daunting task. Yeslam's last name is Bin Ladin. His half-brother is the world's most wanted terrorist.

American trial lawyers working for victims of the Sept. 11 attacks are suing Yeslam, along with other members of his family and other wealthy Saudis, for billions of dollars, contending they have hidden financial connections to Osama bin Laden (the surname is sometimes spelled differently). Now Yeslam's ex-wife, Carmen, has joined forces with the Sept. 11 victims' lawyers, as she tries to improve her divorce settlement by exposing her ex-husband's finances.

The lawsuit, which is being heard in lower Manhattan at the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, is drawing attention to potentially serious allegations against Mr. Bin Ladin. His ex-wife, who has been investigating his assets for years, has given the 9/11 lawyers a long list of offshore companies that she says he runs. In a court filing, she claims that "the bin Laden family including Yeslam and Osama were very close" -- and that his complex finances, also a focus of police investigators in several countries, support suspicions that the half-brothers have had financial ties.

In an interview and in court statements, Mr. Bin Ladin says he barely knows Osama, and hasn't seen his half-brother in more than 20 years. He hopes to extricate himself from the 9/11 lawsuit, which seeks to establish who gave clandestine support to Osama after he declared war on the U.S. in 1996.

Behind the legal battle is a family drama that illustrates Yeslam's unusual position in the secretive Bin Ladin clan. Born in Saudi Arabia and educated in the U.S., the 56-year-old Yeslam has long struggled to straddle the cultural divide between his native Saudi Arabia and the West.

His failed marriage to the Swiss-born Carmen was the subject of her 2004 book, "Inside the Kingdom," a best-seller in the U.S. Their eldest daughter, who goes by the name Wafah Dufour, is an aspiring pop musician and model in New York who recently posed for a risque photo shoot in GQ magazine. She has signed with Regan Media, a division of News Corp.'s HarperCollins Publishers, to star in a proposed American reality television show about her life. The show hasn't yet been picked up by a network.

The setting for much of the family contretemps is Geneva, a city favored by rich Saudis who patronize its discreet banks. Mr. Bin Ladin sometimes bumps into his daughters on the Rue du Marche, Geneva's pricey main street. He says those encounters are cordial, but he acknowledges that his daughters were once denied admission to a posh party he hosted. Mr. Bin Ladin and his daughters have seldom spoken in recent years. Each side blames the other for the estrangement.

Mr. Bin Ladin says he leaves the fighting to his lawyers and focuses on his various ventures, which include backing films and mounting a huge soiree at the annual film festival in Cannes. "I am having fun," he said during a recent Friday visit to his Geneva boutique. Clean-shaven and clad in a casual sport jacket, Mr. Bin Ladin was conducting business during the day of rest for observant Muslims, while fingering worry beads, a traditional Arab practice.

The Yeslam shop offers expensive perfume, handbags, sunglasses and watches by European designers largely geared to a wealthy Arab female clientele. Yeslam handbag models are named for historic Muslim cities including Jedda and Riyadh.

"Conjugating the historical sophistication of the orient with the demands of today's world," reads the glossy Yeslam catalogue. Mr. Bin Ladin trademarked his first name. A European court turned down Mr. Bin Ladin's effort to trademark his last name, saying it would be "contrary to public policy."

Mr. Bin Ladin is one of 54 children of a construction magnate who made billions of dollars building palaces and other projects for the Saudi royal family. Yeslam married Carmen in 1974 and graduated from the University of Southern California three years later. They settled in Switzerland in 1985.

Since their divorce in 1994, Carmen has pursued her ex-husband through the Swiss courts, seeking a larger divorce settlement than the one that pays her and her three daughters support of about 9,000 Swiss francs, or about $6,900, a month. In an interview, she says she originally agreed to that amount in exchange for a promise from Yeslam not to take their girls to Saudi Arabia.

Last week, a Swiss federal court rejected Ms. Bin Ladin's appeal of the existing settlement. She says she now hopes to go through the U.S. legal system to pressure her ex-husband to revise the settlement.

Ms. Bin Ladin claims to have discovered 76 offshore companies with connections to her ex-husband in the Bahamas and other tax havens -- claims that corporate records support. She says in her affidavit in the 9/11 case that 11 of the companies are U.S. businesses -- which could make it hard for Yeslam to convince the court that he isn't subject to U.S. jurisdiction. She says Mr. Bin Ladin has more than $100 million in assets.

Mr. Bin Ladin says all his companies are legitimate and no longer do business in the U.S. He says his net worth is in the low tens of millions of dollars. His defense lawyers have asked a federal judge to reject Ms. Bin Ladin's affidavit as hearsay. "I have not talked to my ex-wife since 1994. How would she know anything?" Mr. Bin Ladin scoffs.

The controversy is taking place amid police investigations involving Mr. Bin Ladin. Since 2003, he has been the subject of money-laundering and terrorism-finance inquiries by police in Italy and France, according to documents obtained by the NEFA Foundation, a terrorism-research group funded by private donations that works with the 9/11 families.

Mr. Bin Ladin said he has already been cleared by the Swiss government of ties to terrorism after a massive 2002-2003 inquiry and knows of no other investigations.

The French and Italian investigators have complained that the Swiss government isn't cooperating with their inquiries, Swiss government records show. One Italian police letter alleges Mr. Bin Ladin has a secret immunity deal with the Swiss government. Swiss prosecutors wouldn't comment on the subject of Mr. Bin Ladin. Mr. Bin Ladin dismissed the Italian claim, saying, "If I had immunity, I would not have had 80 policemen in my place" during a 2002 Swiss raid.

Mr. Bin Ladin says he hasn't been involved with Osama in any way since the early 1980s. Italian police think otherwise. They are investigating alleged dealings among Yeslam, Banca Svizzera Italiana, and a Switzerland-based, Saudi-founded investment firm called Dar Al Mal. A 2005 Italian financial-police memo from Milan claims the bank "has been sort of a hidden patrimonial manager of the activities linked to Osama bin Laden and his lieutenant Ayman al-Zawahiri."

DOJ_NMG_0025273

Banca Svizzera declined to comment, citing Swiss bank-secrecy laws. Dar Al Mal said neither Osama nor Yeslam is a client but that another relative was once on its board. Dar Al Mal said it isn't under investigation by Italian police.

Yeslam Bin Ladin acknowledges family connections to Banca Svizerra and Dar Al Mal. "I have a brother who works with them," he said, declining to say which one. "All I can say is, it's not me."

FBI Agent Says He Had Basis For Questioning Terror Suspect (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, April 5, 2006

An FBI agent agreed Tuesday in federal court testimony that he asked leading questions during a videotaped confession of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man charged with terrorism, but the agent said those questions were based on previous statements by Hayat.

Special Agent Gary Schaaf testified that, immediately before he interviewed Hayat on June 4, he had been in an adjacent room observing the questioning of Hayat by another agent. That prior interview, which was not recorded, gave him ideas on areas to pursue with Hayat, Schaaf said.

In addition, the agent testified, he was familiar with the contents of many hours of secretly recorded conversations in 2002 and 2003 between Hayat and Naseem Khan, a former fast-food and mini mart worker operating undercover for the FBI.

For example, when questioned by Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, Schaaf acknowledged that, while interviewing Hayat, he used the word "jihadi" before Hayat did.

But Assistant U. S. Attorney S. Robert Tice-Raskin developed during his examination of Schaaf that Hayat, in the earlier interview observed by Schaaf, told of a brief stay at a "jihadist camp" in Pakistan in 2000 and a longer stay at a similar Pakistani training facility in 2003.

Schaaf agreed with Mojaddidi that he mentioned Hayat's use of bus transportation to get to the camps before Hayat did.

On the other hand, Schaaf later agreed with Tice-Raskin that he was watching while Hayat told Special Agent Harry Sweeney that he used buses to get to both camps.

Schaaf acknowledged that he first said the camps were "teaching people how to kill American troops," and Hayat agreed. But, the agent testified, the subject initially came up in the interview conducted by Sweeney.

Schaaf said he was the first to name some radical Islamic groups in Pakistan while interviewing Hayat, but Hayat had discussed the groups in an admiring way in recorded conversations with Khan. Through his questioning of Schaaf, Tice-Raskin also made the point that Hayat did not adopt the premise of every question put to him by agents in the videotaped interview.

"He didn't simply say 'Yes, yes, yes' to everything you asked him, did he?" the prosecutor asked Schaaf.

"No," the agent replied.

The back and forth grilling of Schaaf came in the eighth week of dual trials of Hayat, 23, and his 48-year-old father, Umer Hayat. They are being tried on terrorism-related charges in the same courtroom before separate juries. Only the jury hearing the evidence in the Hamid Hayat case was in court Tuesday.

Hamid Hayat is charged with supporting terrorism by undergoing training in Pakistan and returning to Lodi in May to await orders to wage violent jihad against enemies of Islam in the United States.

He is also charged with initially lying to the FBI to conceal his training and intentions.

Umer Hayat is charged with initially lying to the FBI to cover for his son and to hide his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training in his native Pakistan.

The Hayats, both U. S. citizens, have pleaded not guilty.

Alleged Terror Camp Is A Military Training Center, Defense Witness Testifies (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025274

SACRAMENTO — The terror training camp a Lodi man allegedly attended is a Pakistani military training center, a humanitarian said today, as he testified about visiting the area in February.

James Lazor was called as a defense witness for the case of Lodi resident Hamid Hayat, who is charged with lying to the FBI and attending a terrorist training camp.

Later today, prosecutors revealed that an informant who had befriended Hayat while secretly recording their conversations has suddenly found another tape that was never given to investigators or attorneys. The informant, Naseem Khan, will return to the witness stand later this week.

Lazor was on an independent humanitarian mission to earthquake victims in Pakistan when Hayat's defense team asked him to visit the camp.

Lazor agreed and, while taking blankets and school children's letters to earthquake victims in northern Pakistan, he made a detour to follow geographical coordinates, he told a federal jury today.

When he arrived there Feb. 17, the Washington, D.C., man said today, he was turned away by a uniformed man who identified himself as a sergeant in the Pakistani military.

"He introduced himself and was really polite. He said it was a military camp that wasn't open to the public and that the whole ridge was controlled by the military," Lazor said outside a Sacramento courtroom where Hamid Hayat's federal trial is being held.

He'd just told jurors something similar, though prosecutors objected to him saying that the camp was run by Pakistan's military. Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. ordered that part of the testimony stricken from the record, but jurors had already heard it. More than once during his testimony, Lazor said it was a military training camp.

A powerful earthquake devastated parts of northern Pakistan last fall, leaving many people with no homes or belongings. Lazor is friends with a journalist whose publication had received letters from people wanting to donate money, so the friend asked Lazor if he could go to Pakistan and give victims 250 blankets.

Lazor, whose wife is a political appointee for the U.S. Department of Labor, had run an aviation business that deported illegal immigrants from America, and he agreed to make the trip. He took letters from school children in Illinois and San Diego — some of whom have already gotten responses — accepted $500 in pay from Hayat's defense, and then paid for all other expenses.

Lazor landed in Islamabad, then headed to Balakot, one of the places Hayat had told FBI agents was home to a terror training camp. Armed with a global positioning system, Lazor tracked down satellite coordinates of a camp prosecutors have identified in trial.

Whether the camp was under military control in 2003, when Hayat allegedly went there, has not been confirmed in court. An FBI agent earlier testified that there is no proof, other than Hayat's statements during hours of interviews, that he attended a training camp.

Hayat, 23, is on trial with his father, 48-year-old Umer Hayat, who is charged with lying to the FBI. The case is being heard by two juries. Only Hamid Hayat's jury was in court today.

Hamid Hayat's defense attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, has maintained that her client only told the FBI things he believed they wanted to hear. Today, she questioned agent Gary Schaaf, one of several agents who took turns interviewing the young man last June.

Mojaddidi read small portions of interview transcripts, pointing to what she said were countless leading questions. For instance, when Schaaf told Hamid Hayat that at a camp "there's clearly weapons training, there's clearly explosives training," the Lodi man replied: "Yeah."

The attorney continued: "And it was you who first mentioned killing Americans before Hamid Hayat ever did, correct?"

Schaaf said she was correct.

Then, on cross examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Tice-Raskin, Schaaf said most of the things he had mentioned to Hamid Hayat had already been discussed between the young man and another agent.

Tice-Raskin singled out lines in the transcript where Schaaf questioned Hamid Hayat, who then asked for clarifications or disagreed.

DOJ_NMG_0025275

Ultimately, the matter will be up to the jury, which has been hearing the case since mid-February.

After jurors left for the day today, attorneys discussed the new evidence that surfaced over the weekend, when informant Naseem Khan was going through items in his home and found the tape.

The taped telephone conversation is about 20 minutes long and was marked Oct. 13, 2002, about two months after Khan met Hamid Hayat.

Khan started working for the FBI in December 2001, but didn't befriend Hamid Hayat until the following summer.

Defense attorneys have questioned his credibility, especially since he first told the FBI that he'd seen Osama bin Laden's right-hand man in Lodi in 1998 and 1999, and the government has since said it has no proof of that claim.

Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III said in court that he wants to know why Khan didn't give the tape to the FBI more than three years ago, and Mojaddidi said outside court that it bolsters the defense claim.

"That just puts a lot of things into question," she said.

Hayat "Terror" Camp May Be Military Facility, Witness Says (KXTV-TV)

KXTV-TV, April 5, 2006

A man on a humanitarian mission in Pakistan says what the U.S. government thinks is a terrorist training camp may actually be a Pakistani military facility.

"I was at the right location. I'm 100 percent sure of that," said James Lazor, a witness for the defense in the terrorism trial against Lodi's Hamid Hayat. Last month, Lazor was in Balakot, Pakistan searching for the camp and says he encountered Pakistani soldiers when he got close. When he spoke to one of them, Lazor said, "He was a military guy, no doubt in my mind."

Hamid Hayat, 23, is accused of training at a terrorism camp. Prosecutors claim his description of the area and the camp matches satellite images showing a complex of buildings tucked in the mountains of Pakistan's northwest Frontier Province.

Defense lawyers say Lazor's testimony disputes that. "Their expert sat on the stand and stated that in looking at the images that it cannot be a military camp, and he is clearly wrong," said Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents Hamid Hayat. "The proof is in that the government is not able to, with all its resources, produce one person whoever went there. Us as the defense, we were able to find someone to go there, and he came back and reported what he saw."

Lazor testified that he went to Pakistan this past February, taking blankets to victims of the earthquakes as well as letters from California children to deliver to Pakistani children. He's a private citizen who went there on his own after speaking to friends about the needs of earthquake victims.

The defense would not reveal how they discovered Lazor was going there, but he agreed to try to find the terrorist camp armed with maps, a global positioning system device and the coordinates provided by defense attorneys.

Lazor said when he went up the trail and was about a mile and a half away, he was approached by a military-type vehicle. "I was stopped by a sergeant from the Pakistani military who said the area wasn't open to civilians and said it was a Pakistani military camp I would not be allowed access to," said Lazor. "He was polite and respectful. I mean if he was a terrorist it would've been a completely different scenario."

Lazor, who lead off Tuesday's defense witnesses, said he did very little research on the Hayat case before he went on his quest in Pakistan last month. "I went with an open mind," he said.

Also taking the stand was FBI agent Gary Schaaf, one of the agents who interrogated Hamid Hayat which was videotaped after Hayat claimed he attended training at the terrorist camp. Under defense questioning, he acknowledged that he often asked Hayat leading questions during the interview. Schaaf said he, not Hayat, was the one who first mentioned weapons and explosives training and the possibility someone would travel by bus to get there.

Besides the charge of training for terrorism, Hamid Hayat also faces three counts of lying to federal agents. The key evidence against him is his videotaped confession, along with secret tape recordings between him and a paid FBI informant, Naseem Khan.

On Wednesday, the trial for Hayat's father, Umer Hayat, resumes. The older Hayat, an ice cream truck driver from Lodi, is charged with lying to federal officials about his son's alleged involvement in terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0025276

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Responsibility For Defending Nuclear Plants Is Debated (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — A House subcommittee heard clashing testimony on Tuesday about who was responsible for defending nuclear power plants against terrorist attack, and whether the combination of private guard forces and police agencies was adequate.

A spokesman for the nuclear industry said that terrorist threats were greater than the commercial security forces at reactors could handle, and that the industry was therefore justified in lobbying against some security requirements that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission had considered.

But another witness said that there was no one else in position to respond to large threats.

After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission redefined its requirements for the attacks that reactor owners must be prepared to defeat, known as the design basis threat, but the commission backed off some of its early ideas after industry objections.

At the hearing on Tuesday, which examined the adequacy of reactor security, the subcommittee chairman, Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut, said, "There's an assumption that the design basis threat will protect the plant, and therefore the public." But he said he believed that the security requirements were eased "because we've made a decision that it's not practical to meet what may in fact be a very realistic threat."

The Government Accountability Office released a report at the hearing that said that the commission's process had created the appearance of a government agency submitting to industry pressure. But three members of the commission testified that that was not so.

Marvin Fertel, a vice president of the Nuclear Energy Institute, said the design basis threat was "not the full spectrum of threats," but merely what the regulatory commission believed that power companies "ought to be able to, with high assurance, win at."

Among the elements the commission decided not to put into the design basis threat were terrorists with .50-caliber sniper rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, according to testimony Tuesday. It also does not require the plants to defend against airplane attacks like those of Sept. 11; Mr. Fertel and Nuclear Regulatory Commission witnesses said the industry was in close touch with the nation's air defense command, and, if warned, could quickly take steps to lessen the impact of an attack.

He added that the nuclear industry was working with the Department of Homeland Security to improve reactor security and that, by law, companies with reactor licenses were not required to defend against "enemies of the United States."

A Nuclear Regulatory Commission witness said that provision had been written to allow the licensing of a reactor in southern Florida without obligating the utility to defend against Cuban fighter planes.

Another witness, Danielle Brian, the executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a nonprofit group in Washington that has issued reports about security lapses at government and civilian nuclear plants, said industry officials wanted the rocket-propelled grenades and sniper rifles removed from the official threat because they claimed it was too expensive to defend against them.

"The result of this process is a completely unrealistic design basis threat that reflects not what intelligence experts say is realistic, but what industry is willing to pay for," she said.

Ms. Brian said that assembling a SWAT team and getting it to a plant site would take at least 90 minutes while a terrorist assault would succeed or fail within eight minutes.

But another witness, Christopher M. Crane, the president and chief nuclear officer of the Exelon Generation Company, the nation's largest power plant operator, said money was not the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0025277

"We are not an industry overly driven by profits, and we have not pushed back very hard," he said. The industry has spent over $1.2 billion on security since the Sept. 11 attacks, Mr. Crane said. "Show one other sector that's put anywhere near that money into it," he said.

U.S. Security Czar Says Beijing, Washington Close To Pact On Repatriating Migrants (AP)

By Joe McDonald

AP, April 4, 2006

BEIJING (AP) -- Washington and Beijing are close to reaching an agreement that could lead to the repatriation of thousands of illegal Chinese immigrants in the United States, U.S. Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff said Tuesday.

Chertoff also said he would recommend implementing new X-ray technology to screen U.S.-bound cargos at foreign ports after seeing a successful pilot program in Hong Kong.

There are about 39,000 Chinese citizens in the United States who have been rejected for immigration but whom Beijing is refusing to accept, said Chertoff, whose agency oversees immigration. China has cited uncertainty about their identities.

After talks this week with Chinese officials, "I think we have reached a meeting of the minds and a common approach on the issue of repatriation of illegal migrants with China," he told reporters.

Chertoff said he was "sufficiently confident" the two sides have made progress that one of his deputies was staying in Beijing to work on details of a possible final agreement.

Chertoff met with Luo Gan, the member of China's nine-man ruling Standing Committee who is responsible for law and order, as well as ministers of public security, justice and civil aviation.

A Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman said Beijing wants to stop illegal migration but wants to confirm the identities of Chinese detained in the United States before accepting their repatriation.

"The Chinese government is resolutely opposed to ... illegal immigration," spokesman Liu Jianchao said. "First of all, we have to identify those illegal immigrants and based on that, China is willing to receive the repatriation of illegal immigrants."

Chertoff's Asia tour also took him to Japan and Singapore.

In Hong Kong, he toured a port where two companies are using new screening technology that takes high-definition X-rays of cargo and checks for radiation. The screening is designed to help intercept nuclear weapons and other possible terrorist threats.

"I'm going to suggest that we get to the stage of implementing some kind of proposal to put into effect a combination of this X-ray technology and this radiation technology at the ports of embarkation," Chertoff said.

The secretary said he and Chinese officials also discussed American visa restrictions imposed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks that Chinese students, businesspeople and others complain have blocked them from obtaining visas.

Some American companies say the increased difficulty in obtaining visas has hurt their business by blocking Chinese customers and employees from traveling to the United States.

"We are working on a program to streamline visas, expand the amount of time you can spend in the country on visas and try to make the entry process a little bit more efficient and a little more warm and cozy," Chertoff said.

Court Crafts Scheme To Break Deposition Impasse In Sept. 11 Suits (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, April 5, 2006

Frustrated by the government's approach to protecting sensitive security information, a federal judge has crafted a compromise so depositions can proceed in earnest in the litigation against airlines and airports over the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Southern District of New York Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein said he had to intervene "to avoid further and unnecessary delay in the progress of these cases and relieve counsel of the inherent conflicts and artificial roles" that the position of the Transportation Security Administration has created for plaintiffs lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0025278

The judge's ruling in In Re September 11 Litigation, 21 MC 97 and 21 MC 101, concerned the refusal of the Transportation Security Administration to attend depositions of the airline defendants in the litigation -- and require that defense lawyers be charged with safeguarding the security information.

The TSA intervened in the cases, which involve family members of Sept. 11 victims who opted to proceed to court instead of applying to the federal Sept. 11 Victim Compensation Fund.

The transportation administration intervened to protect what is called Sensitive Security Information -- information about security plans and procedures of the airports and airline industry.

Instead of attending the depositions, Hellerstein said, the TSA "seeks to impose on defendants' counsel the obligation to object and prevent answers that might disclose SSI," which the judge called a "strange and significant phenomena."

Counsel for the plaintiffs objected to the transportation administration's proposal, saying it would handicap their ability to aggressively pursue their cases. They also worried it might be hard to figure the applicability of sensitive information to conditions of airline security as they existed in 2001.

"Defense counsel also express concern about exposure to civil penalties if they and their witnesses fail to protect SSI," the judge said. "Plaintiffs press to proceed, citing lengthy delays, and pointing out that many of their counsel -- all those who would be taking depositions -- were cleared by TSA to obtain access to SSI pending TSA authorization of such disclosure."

The plaintiffs opposed a TSA plan that would allow them to put questions to witnesses, but not hear the answers to those questions until the administration determined that the answers could be given.

Initially, the airline and airport defendants turned documents over to the Transportation Security Administration in three groups beginning in late 2003. TSA reviewed the documents and then produced them to the defense counsel, albeit slowly, the judge said. The agency did not complete its review of the first and second waves of documents until late last year.

But two years after the agency began reviewing documents, the judge said, it "retreated" from its initial position and said it would not conditionally disclose sensitive security information material to precleared defense counsel.

He pressed for the sides to negotiate a protocol to break the impasse, but negotiations dragged on.

Hellerstein then directed the plaintiffs to serve defendants notices that they would be asking for testimony on four "critical" areas: "the warnings and information supplied to the U.S. carriers by the Federal Aviation Administration about the threat of hijackings, including terrorist hijackings, prior to Sept. 11," airport passenger screening procedures, "the so-called 'common strategy' in the event of a threatened hijacking," and, finally, the identity of documents submitted to the Transportation Security Administration to determine whether they contain sensitive security information.

But the agency's proposed final orders for the depositions had defense counsel concerned that they would be placed in conflict because government regulations might prohibit disclosure, and yet disclosure might be in the best interests of their clients.

'DIRECTLY RELEVANT' MATERIAL

In a letter last month to the court, defense counsel said "much of the what the TSA has identified as SSI is directly relevant to the exclusive standard of care governing their conduct on Sept. 11, 2001 and is at the heart of their defense."

For their part, plaintiffs wrote last month that "it would be an unconstitutional burden to impose upon counsel the responsibility to 'guess' what answers might involve disclosure of SSI at the risk of statutory and regulatory penalties."

If TSA declines to attend depositions, they argued, the agency should be deemed to have waived any objections to the answers provided by witnesses.

But the agency countered that regulations expressly charge those entrusted with security information to safeguard it from "unauthorized disclosure."

Hellerstein said the proposed alternatives by the Transportation Security Administration "fail to allow plaintiffs to engage in the back and forth so essential to establishing a claim in negligence." So he fashioned a plan whereby cleared plaintiffs' counsel may ask witnesses questions in the normal fashion and the witnesses will be defended by counsel "entitled to read and hear SSI," either under the regulations or by special clearance.

DOJ_NMG_0025279

Two transcripts will be made and the agency will have 30 days to determine whether the answers are SSI. Answers that are SSI will be redacted from the second copy of the transcript. The first copy, which will reflect the agency's determinations of security information, will be considered a "final determination" subject to appeal, and a copy will be filed under seal.

"By opting out of the Victim Compensation Fund, the litigants currently before me have necessarily assumed the risks inherent in litigation," Hellerstein said. "But they could not reasonably have foreseen that they might be barred by administrative fiat."

And while the task of the Transportation Security Administration might be "formidable," he said, "the severity of the task may not serve as an excuse for barring plaintiffs from asserting the claims allowed them by law."

Marc S. Moller of Kreindler & Kreindler is liaison counsel for the plaintiffs. Desmond T. Barry of Condon & Forsyth is liaison counsel for the defendants. Elizabeth Goldman represents the TSA.

Homeland Security Pay Plan Goes Forward, But Unions Are Wary (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security is moving ahead with its plan to change how it evaluates and pays employees, even as it tries to fend off unions in court.

The pay changes and the court case are separate issues, but the union litigation has altered the department's timetable and injected some uncertainty into how far Homeland Security can go in changing some key workplace rules.

Gregg Prillaman , chief human capital officer at the department, said the litigation "has essentially compressed" the schedule for converting employees from the traditional civil service system, the decades-old General Schedule, to a performance-based system. "Instead of moving people onto it quicker, it is going to be slightly slower," he said.

The litigation is scheduled to resume tomorrow, when the unions, led by the National Treasury Employees Union, and the government make oral arguments before a federal appeals court.

The NTEU, contending that the new rules would gut collective bargaining in the department, won the first round last August. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer ruled that the department's plan would put the unions on "quicksand" when trying to negotiate the terms of contracts, and she blocked new labor-management rules.

Although the unions have focused their legal efforts on stopping the department's new work rules, they also are wary of the new pay system, contending that the government has a poor track record in creating performance-based management systems that are viewed as fair and credible by workers.

The Bush administration, however, thinks the across-the-board raises provided through the General Schedule do not permit agencies to make distinctions among employees and thwart efforts to give higher raises to top performers.

In keeping with a 2002 law, Homeland Security is designing a pay system that will provide employees with raises more closely tied to their occupations and geographic location. The best workers will also receive higher raises that reflect their job performance. Employees who are deemed unsatisfactory will be at risk of not getting a raise.

The new pay system, when in place, will cover as many as 85,000 civil service employees, with a substantial number in jobs related to law enforcement. One goal of the new system is to more rigorously link annual pay raises to job performance ratings.

The initial rollout will involve 18,000 to 20,000 employees who are not covered by union contracts. Under the plan, managers, supervisors and nonunion employees will move to a new pay system, featuring broad salary scales based on occupations, next January.

In the second phase, 60,000 to 65,000 employees, including most employees covered by union contracts, will convert to the new pay system in January 2008.

Prillaman said that about 2,000 Homeland Security managers have received training on a new system for evaluating the job performance of employees and that up to 5,000 additional managers will be trained.

"The plan is not to go out and do massive harm to employees of this department. Quite the contrary," Prillaman said. "It is to give them a clearer picture of how they succeed and better recognition for that success. It is not a Machiavellian plot.

DOJ_NMG_0025280

"In the end, the department's goal is the same as the employees' goal," he said. "You want to be able to have high-quality people in the organization who succeed in their job and want to stay for the long run. That is what employees want, and that is what the department wants."

Take Back The Towers (NYT)

By Dennis Smith

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

THE effort to rebuild the World Trade Center site continues to go nowhere. The planned memorial lacks start-up money and faces public indifference. Those behind the proposed museum have not shown that they have any clear idea how to represent the memory of a day of murder, pain and loss. And most important, there is no real government-business-real estate coalition supporting the commercial plans of the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation and the developer Larry Silverstein, who holds the lease.

We've reached a stage where the state and local government, so often the causes of delay, are the only players with the ability to move things forward. It is time for them to invoke their trump card: the takings clause of the United States Constitution.

To understand why, consider how all facets of the project have reached the point of inertia. Those behind the memorial, centered on its two reflecting pools, have still not satisfied the public or the politicians on several aesthetic questions.

For example, the memorial must display the names of those who died at ground zero, the Pentagon and Shanksville, Pa., as well as those killed in the 1993 attack on the twin towers. But to the consternation of many (perhaps most) of the 9/11 families, the designers seem determined to place the names haphazardly, and without reference to time or place of death.

The debate over the names points to a larger problem: many in the artistic community seem unable to accept the influence that the families of the victims have among the public. Until the designers understand the role of the families and that they are building over a tomb — bodies of hundreds of the 2,749 who died there were never recovered — the project will languish. As for the museum, the most obvious setback was the disastrous decision to have it house the controversial International Freedom Center, which was eventually reversed by Gov. George Pataki. But since then, another series of seemingly intractable issues has arisen: the footprint space and exhibition areas have been reduced, there are problems with handicapped access, there have been warnings that crowd movement could be dangerous in an emergency and, most important, Alice Greenwald, the director, has yet to say what specifically the museum will contain.

Finally, of course, there is the problem of financing. It is too late to say that the money should have been raised before the design of the memorial and associated projects was accepted. But it seems clear that corporations and individual benefactors are reluctant to pony up the half-billion dollars needed for an effort with so many unanswered questions attached to it.

There is only one way to move forward: Mayor Michael Bloomberg and the City Council should send a home-rule message to Albany and demand the confiscation of the World Trade Center site under the eminent domain clause. At a time when counties and municipalities across America are seizing houses and small businesses to build shopping malls just to increase their tax bases, there are plenty of justifiable reasons — included lost tax revenues — to demand the return of ground zero.

Is taking the site legally practicable? "As long as the land were used for public purposes such as monuments, museums, or other public buildings, it can certainly be condemned under the U.S. Constitution," says Vicki Been, a professor of real-estate law at New York University Law School. "Even if some (or most) of the land were transferred to private parties to build commercial or residential space, the Supreme Court has held that such economic development is a public purpose."

The alternative — waiting for the current players to get their act together — makes no sense. Even if the project were to regain momentum, the plan is to build 10 million square feet of commercial space that is not only unneeded but will also mostly fail to rent. The Freedom Tower will be an eyesore as well as a terrorist target, and few will want to work there.

Mayor Bloomberg has recognized the financial folly of such large-scale building in an area that needs careful neighborhood development. With his business skills and political savvy, he is the natural choice to become chief engineer and contractor of a smaller, smarter, more appropriate ground zero.

Four decades ago, the 12 blocks that form the trade center site were taken through eminent domain from a group of electronics merchants and other small-business owners. That was David Rockefeller's idea, and his brother Gov. Nelson

DOJ_NMG_0025281

Rockefeller made it happen. Now it is up to Governor Pataki to give Mr. Bloomberg a similar opportunity. Ground zero does not belong to the Port Authority or the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation or Larry Silverstein. It is our property. We should get it back.

Senate Panel Adds Billions To Bush Plan For Storm Relief (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Spurred by an influential Mississippi Republican, the Senate moved yesterday toward adding billions of dollars to the Bush administration's $19 billion hurricane relief request, which was approved by the House last month.

The additional money, voted by the Senate Appropriations Committee, means that Louisiana will most likely retain all of the $4.2 billion that the House approved for home rebuilding. Texas and Mississippi had been expected to vie for a share of those funds, but the provisions adopted by the committee yesterday, adding about $8 billion in hurricane relief that would also help other programs and states, heads off such a battle.

The committee is led by Senator Thad Cochran of Mississippi, who added considerable aid for his state. The legislation includes $700 million to relocate a privately owned freight rail line in Mississippi, $1.2 billion for a pilot program favored by Mississippi's governor to replace trailers with cottages and $1 billion in block grants that are likely to go to Mississippi and Texas.

Quite apart from hurricane relief, the committee, at the request of Senator Byron L. Dorgan, Democrat of North Dakota, also added to the bill $4 billion to help farmers hurt by drought and high energy costs. Other provisions would provide more than $2 billion for fighting avian flu and $648 million for improving port security.

All this money is now part of a $106.5 billion supplemental spending bill, passed by the committee yesterday, the bulk of which — roughly $68 billion — is to pay for the war in Iraq. Like the House, the Senate committee included special funds for armored military vehicles.

The full Senate is likely to take up the bill after returning from a recess that begins at the end of the week. Eventually the additions, should they be approved on the floor, will have to be negotiated with the House. But some senators are pledging to fight the ballooning supplemental appropriation, which they say should be used for emergency spending only.

The chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire, said in a statement that he believed the bill should be cut back to the $92 billion requested by the administration and approved by the House. But Mr. Gregg also said he planned to try to amend the bill to increase spending on border security by more than $1 billion, and to pay for that increase by paring spending that is not related to hurricane relief or the war.

Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and other Louisiana officials, who had converged on the Capitol to lobby for recovery money, expressed satisfaction with the Senate bill.

But they continued to demand that the Bush administration come up with a formal plan to rebuild the levees around New Orleans, a project that administration officials said last week would cost $6 billion more than originally projected by the Army Corps of Engineers.

The Senate bill added more than $600 million to the $1.5 billion the House approved for levees and flood control projects on the Gulf Coast, and called on the administration to make a formal request to Congress for that money; without the request, Louisiana officials say, the complex rebuilding process will stall.

Senator David Vitter, a Louisiana Republican, asked the administration for action, saying his state "cannot afford additional months of stonewalling with a new hurricane season right around the corner."

Mary L. Landrieu, the state's Democratic senator, went further, threatening to hold up all of the administration's executive appointments until progress is made on finding enough money for the levees. In a letter to President Bush, she called the condition of the levees "a life-or-death situation" for Louisianians.

"The people of Louisiana have waited so long for accurate numbers, for construction of levees and for adequate funding for housing rebuilding," she said at a news conference at the Capitol. "We simply cannot wait much longer."

The new spending bill also includes increased financing to cover the costs of educating students displaced by Hurricane Katrina, a provision that would mostly benefit Texas, where the largest number of such students wound up. At the behest of

DOJ_NMG_0025282

Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Republican of Texas, $10 million for law enforcement in the state was added, as was money for universities and colleges damaged by last year's storms.

Landrieu Threatens Blanket Holds To Get Levee Funding (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) threatened yesterday to hold President Bush's executive-branch nominees hostage until the administration agrees to a series of demands that would increase funding for coastal Louisiana.

In a letter sent to Bush yesterday, the Louisiana Democrat threatened to place holds on the president's nominees, raising the prospect that the Senate could be tied in knots as Bush tries to fill a variety of vacancies, including the top jobs at the Interior Department and the Office of Management and Budget.

"Because this is literally a life-or-death situation for the people of my state, I am compelled to notify you that I will exercise my power as a member of the Senate to stop further consideration of all executive appointments until significant progress is made on such a request and commitment," Landrieu wrote.

She is looking for an additional $6 billion for levees, flood control and coastal restoration in Louisiana — and the president's commitment to use "the full weight of the office of the president" to pursue that money, a plan for coastal restoration and a federal revenue-sharing arrangement for receipts from Outer Continental Shelf drilling.

The price tag matches the new figure the administration has said would be needed to bolster Louisiana's levee system to the point that the area would be eligible for federal flood insurance. A $95 billion supplemental spending bill marked up by the Senate Appropriations Committee yesterday already contains about $2 billion for the Louisiana coast.

Senators have been able to block nominations — or legislation — indefinitely by using the informal "hold" procedure. Senate Republican leaders could circumvent holds on nominations by calling for cloture, but each nomination would require a separate cloture vote. That could add days to the timeline for each nomination.

But the likelihood of high Senate floor drama was not yet clear yesterday. "Historically, a blanket hold does not necessarily accomplish the goal [or goals] set out for it when deployed," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

"Mr. President the piecemeal approach that has marked your administration's response to providing adequate levee and flood protection for Louisiana has not worked," Landrieu wrote. "It needs to be replaced by a comprehensive approach that is both more effective and cost-efficient."

Louisiana lawmakers have run into strong resistance from conservative Republicans on recent requests for Gulf Coast funding. The conservatives argue that new money for the region should be offset by budget cuts.

With singular purpose, Landrieu has begged, bargained and beguiled in search of federal assistance for Louisiana since Hurricane Katrina devastated the Gulf Coast last summer. Yesterday, she promised to up the stakes for the administration.

"It's the leverage I have," Landrieu said.

She hinted that she has other arrows in her quiver but did not specify what other means she might have to put pressure on the president or the GOP-led Senate.

Landrieu did not rule out offering a floor amendment to the supplemental appropriations measure on the floor to accomplish her goal, but her aides said it would be difficult to get the money without backing from the White House.

Last month, Landrieu was the only Democrat to vote for the budget resolution, after she struck a deal with Frist and several senior Republicans that would provide $10 billion to Louisiana for similar purposes if a number of conditions are met.

But many lawmakers and aides have cast doubt on the prospects of final adoption of a conference report on the budget this year. The House is scheduled to vote on its version of the legislation this week.

"Money spent on levees and flood control today will save the federal government billions in the future by eliminating the need for costly post-storm recovery and rebuilding in areas that were not adequately protected," Landrieu wrote. "The people of my state cannot wait any longer. We can no longer rely on promises. We need action, and we need action now."

As for Landrieu's threat, Ueland said Frist will not prematurely "cross any bridge."

DOJ_NMG_0025283

For Gulf Towns, Anxious Wait On Flood Plain Status (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

BURAS, LA. - The Buras water tower is still on its side where hurricane Katrina pushed it over as though it were a LEGO toy. Schools are still closed. Water treatment is nonexistent.

Sure, a few determined survivors have returned to battered Plaquemines Parish, which looked like an inundated shrimper after sustaining four levee breaks.

But for most, the decision of whether to return is becoming more complex. Buras - and other towns in lower Plaquemines - may face a tougher road toward rebuilding if maps expected to be released this week determine that they are ineligible for federal flood insurance.

At issue: the original levees, though repaired, have proven unworthy against Katrina-size storms, and cost estimates for bolstering them have tripled, to $9 billion. That makes the maps a key to the recovery riddle, since they will guide rebuilding and factor in developers' calculations. The situation is testing the pride of Louisiana's original parish. And it's shedding light on how rebuilding will occur in the most stormwracked corners of the Gulf Coast, as communities compete for levee improvement funds.

"I need schools to send my kids to, I need a church to follow my faith, and Buras is getting none of that," says Lynda Banta, a parish councilor living in the largely unaffected Belle Chasse area. "Somebody's decided we're expendable."

This finger of gnat-infested lowland, where the levees flicker into view on both sides of the Belle Chasse highway around refineries and orange groves, is the home of oil-rig workers, refinery roughnecks, and oystermen. Some can trace their Italian, French, and Slavic heritages through the bayous for centuries. For towns like Triumph, Nairn, Venice and Port Sulphur, it's crunchtime for recovery.

The Army Corps of Engineers completed its first repairs on the Plaquemines levees on March 17, bringing them up to their original height and bolstering them with sturdier clays. But a harsh prospect overshadowed its restoration.

"Another Katrina would overtop this levee," said Army Corps of Engineers Col. Lewis Setliff during a press conference near the Empire Lock in Nairn, La.

Plaquemines, which comprises the mouth of the Mississippi, dates back to 1682, when the French explorer Rene-Robert Cavelier, Sieur de La Salle stuck a cross into the silty lowlands nearby. But since the levees and subsequent suburbs were built in the mid-20th century, the area has experienced a rough stretch in the past 40 years, as hurricanes Betsy, Camille and Katrina (the worst of all) threatened to return it to swampland.

Reinforcing the lower levees of Plaquemines would cost $3 billion for an area with less than 2 percent of the southern Louisiana population. In contrast, nearby Algiers contains 13 percent of the region's population, but the cost would be $129 million to storm-certify its levees.

Moreover, only 1,000 out of 14,000-odd people that lived in the lower part of Plaquemines Parish have returned. Statistics like that have given momentum to comments by some politicians that parts of the region should be returned to the swamps.

"It's easy for people from the outside to say that the decision seems simple: it's not a good place to live, so don't go back," says Jeanne Hurlbert, a sociologist at Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. "Plaquemines is a place like many in southern Louisiana where the communities are strong, multigenerational, and where you're asking people to give up a way of life in a place where they've always lived."

But by focusing simply on levee height, government engineers and politicians may be missing an opportunity for "broader thinking," says David Daniel, president of the University of Texas at Dallas and the chair of an external levee review committee organized by the American Society of Civil Engineers.

After all, one local high school, destroyed by hurricane Camille, was rebuilt on stilts. It survived Katrina intact. High-ground evacuation sites and "armored" levees that would not break even while overtopped may enable areas like lower Plaquemines to endure another major storm. Some of the stilts may have to be 35 feet high, however.

"You may design for the mother of all storms and you get the grandmother of all storms," says Dr. Daniel. The committee's much anticipated risk analysis for the region is expected June 1 - the kickoff date for the new hurricane season.

DOJ_NMG_0025284

FEMA Trailer Park Fails To Survive Storm From Residents (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 4 — A mayoral election is less than three weeks away, and the sympathy of elected officials for the irritations of voters in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina is boundless.

As a result, there will be no trailer park in Lakewood Estates, a collection of solid, spacious homes behind a high locked gate in the Algiers section.

Last weekend, angry residents of the neighborhood took to the street to protest a trailer park being built on their doorstep by the Federal Emergency Management Agency for 34 single women and their children who were left homeless by the hurricane. FEMA, their signs proclaimed, was "raping" their neighborhood.

Construction was already well along — some 20-odd trailers are already in place on the dusty lot — but fortunately for the residents of Lakewood Estates, campaign season is also well along.

Mayor C. Ray Nagin, habitually relaxed in his reactions, wasted not a moment this time. On Monday morning, with news of the residents' uprising in the local media, Mr. Nagin called a news conference.

"I'm very upset about it," he said. The contractor had "disrespected" citizens. FEMA had "bullied" city workers. Enough was enough. "This is unacceptable," the mayor said.

The disputed trailer park was now history, Mr. Nagin said. And so, for the moment, were all other trailer sites in the city, whose construction the mayor proclaimed "suspended."

The residents of Lakewood Estates had won. FEMA, though, said it was puzzled, especially since the Algiers trailer site had been approved by the mayor months ago, said Darryl Madden, an agency spokesman. All the necessary building permits had been obtained, Mr. Madden said.

A lawyer for the city declined to comment, citing a pending suit by the residents. City documents disputed the assertion that the building permits had been obtained, but a City Hall news release indeed confirmed "that this particular Algiers site was not removed from the original list."

Seven months after the hurricane, fights over where to house its displaced victims continue. Up and down Louisiana, but particularly around New Orleans, residents and local officials have taken action against the incursion of displaced city residents — overwhelmingly black — who are portrayed as bearers of crime and bad living habits, and as destroyers of property values.

Some of the most virulent opposition has occurred in the victims' own backyard. Last December Mr. Nagin backed away from a list of proposed city sites after expressions of outrage. Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco was forced to intervene here late last year, when officials could not agree on where to put the trailers.

And by the end of last year, 32 of Louisiana's 64 parishes had banned these trailer sites. Only eight had approved them unconditionally.

If these flare-ups are less frequent than before, FEMA says the need for temporary housing is nonetheless as great as ever. In New Orleans, where the agency has set up nearly 10,000 trailers, 109 sites await Mr. Nagin's approval, the agency says. He has already approved more than 100 such sites, some 17 of which are occupied. FEMA says about 12,000 requests for trailers are pending in the city, with new ones coming in all the time.

"I think it's appalling and I think it's yet another example of 'not in my backyard,' " said William P. Quigley, director of the Gillis Long Poverty Law Center at Loyola University and a litigant on behalf of hurricane victims, speaking of the Algiers site. "The people of New Orleans have been made more welcome across the U.S. than they have been in their own hometown."

The sudden loss of the Algiers site is a sharp blow, Mr. Madden said. "This was going to be a location where we were going to be able to place 34 displaced families, at a time when placing families is important," he said.

"The fact is, we have been working on this site since the mayor approved it," Mr. Madden said. "For this decision to be made at this juncture jeopardizes our effort to provide housing to displaced citizens in the aftermath of Katrina."

Security cameras watch the entrance of Lakewood Estates, and a sign proclaims "24-hour camera surveillance in progress." The collection of trailers sits on a two-acre plot on one side of a low wall, a humble contrast to the substantial, well-landscaped dwellings on the other side.

"If you look at this facility, it looks like Guantánamo," said the protest leader, Edward D. Markle. He was still furious at FEMA, though the site appears dead, for now. "It's bad," Mr. Markle said. "You've got a thousand locations that are better. I won't be able to take a bath without them seeing me."

He suggested that a much larger plot of land, across the road and away from the homes, would have made a far more suitable location.

"It's not an issue of we don't want them in our backyard," Mr. Markle said. "We invite them in our backyard. We just don't want them in our bathrooms and bedrooms."

No Hands On Deck (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

You can't get anyone to take over as captain of a ship that's already sinking. That's the message top candidates are sending the administration about the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

As Eric Lipton reported in Sunday's Times, many of the leading candidates for the post of FEMA director have taken themselves out of the running. Normally high-profile positions like that are sought after, even fought over. But no one seems to want to take over the rudderless agency after the mess that followed Hurricane Katrina.

The lack of interest in the job represents a significant vote of no confidence in FEMA's future by leading experts in the field. Clearly, the administration won't be able to plug just a few holes at the top and expect the agency to heal itself. President Bush needs to set a clear agenda for reform and make tangible commitments on the agency's future role.

To start, FEMA's personnel troubles go much deeper than one open position. Mr. Lipton reported that 11 of the 30 most senior jobs at the agency were filled on an acting basis — including the administrators for operations, disaster recovery and disaster response. This is hardly a recipe for providing the clarity, the sense of purpose and, most of all, the sense of stability this agency needs.

It would be a mistake to simply make the acting director, David Paulison, the permanent chief, as the administration is expected to do. That would create the impression that this crucial government function was being handed over to the only person willing to take it on. Administration officials need to tackle the real impediment to finding a new director: uncertainty over FEMA's role and future.

First they need to answer a central question. Is FEMA an agency of accountants or emergency responders? Is it there to provide financial reimbursement or boots on the ground during disasters? The answer should be: a little bit of both. Most of the time, FEMA helps local and state governments after a crisis has passed. But in the largest catastrophes, when local people are as overwhelmed as they were after Hurricane Katrina, the other role — managing the response to a major disaster — is called upon. Those are the areas officials are trying to improve after the botched response to Katrina.

FEMA has suffered upheaval in recent years, not least because it went from being an independent cabinet agency to being one piece of the huge homeland security bureaucracy. Katrina exposed major failings that the agency is trying to address. Trying is nice, but as the chairman of the House appropriations panel for homeland security, Harold Rogers, put it last week, "Another failure is not an option."

Hurricane Prediction: Busy, Again (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, April 5, 2006

This year's hurricane season is likely to be very active, though not as bad as last year's record-shattering barrage on the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. prediction team said Tuesday.

The latest 2006 forecast by the Tropical Meteorology Project at Colorado State University envisions a higher potential for intense hurricanes to strike the East Coast. The report's “landfall probability” outlook sees a 64% chance that a major hurricane — Category 3 or higher, meaning sustained winds of at least 111 mph — will hit that region this year. That's more than double the 31% average probability over the past century.

The central Gulf Coast — Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama — devastated last year by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita rates a 30% likelihood for a major hurricane. That, too, is twice the 15% average during the previous century.

DOJ_NMG_0025286

The new forecast arrives as New Orleans, southern Louisiana and the Mississippi coast struggle to rebuild and reinforce against more hurricanes. Katrina alone inflicted $80 billion in damage, caused more than 1,330 deaths and displaced hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents.

Forecast co-author William Gray, dean of the USA's hurricane scientists, said last year's onslaught was made more destructive by strong steering currents of Atlantic air that guided more major hurricanes to land. It is too early to predict how such air patterns may develop this year.

Co-author Phil Klotzbach said two more factors affect the outlook: still-warm water in the Atlantic, especially in the north, and the absence of an El Nio pattern in the Pacific. Wind currents caused by El Nio, a warming of equatorial waters of the Pacific, can disrupt or cut off Atlantic storms as they blow west.

Klotzbach and Gray foresee 17 named storms this season, which runs from June through November. That's nearly twice the average of 9.6 storms a year from 1950 to 2000 but well below last year's record 27 storms, 15 of them hurricanes (winds 74 mph or more). There were so many storms in 2005 that the National Hurricane Center's alphabetical list of names ran out in October, and the center had to use Greek letters to refer to later storms.

The forecast expects nine of the 17 storms to become hurricanes, five of them major. Long-term average is about six per year, two of them major.

Although the tropical Atlantic isn't as warm as last year, temperatures have stayed warm in the North Atlantic for several years, Klotzbach said. When that happens, he said, “you tend to see more landfalls on the East Coast.”

U.S. shores north of the Carolinas and Virginia haven't been hit by a major hurricane for decades. Last month, AccuWeather.com, a private service, predicted that one could strike in the Northeast, including New York City, perhaps even this year. “The Northeast is staring down the barrel of a gun,” AccuWeather forecaster Joe Bastardi warned.

Klotzbach and Gray say the Atlantic is in an extraordinarily active cycle that began in the mid-1990s and could last another two decades. “From 1995 to 2003, we had a lot of (tropical storms) but very few landfalls,” Klotzbach said. “There were 32 major hurricanes during that span, but only three made landfall as majors.”

That has changed dramatically since. In the past three years, seven of 13 major hurricanes have struck land. “We were very, very lucky for nine years,” Klotzbach said, “and we've been very, very unlucky for the last three.”

In A Year Of Catastrophic Loss, Insurers Saw Record Gains (LAT)

By Peter G. Gosselin

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

The companies that provide Americans with their homeowners and auto insurance made a record $44.8-billion profit last year even after accounting for the claims of policyholders wiped out by Hurricane Katrina and the other big storms of 2005, according to the firms' filings with state regulators.

Top executives described the profit — an 18.7% increase over the previous year — as a fluke, the product of gains in other lines of insurance besides homeowners and a very good year for their investments.

They said that even with the increase, insurers face deep problems that can be fixed only by substantial premium hikes, a scaling back of commitments by several firms to the most disaster-prone portions of the country and, according to some, a greatly expanded role for the state and federal governments in insuring individuals against the largest of catastrophes.

"Unless insurers can get relief, you're going to see a pullback by the private industry," warned Robert P. Hartwig, chief economist of the industry-funded Insurance Information Institute.

"We're not being good stewards of our investors' capital or our policyholders' surplus if we keep doing business where we can't make money."

In fact, the property casualty insurance industry, which provides homeowners and auto coverage, made a considerable sum despite paying tens of billions of dollars to policyholders as a result of Katrina, which is widely described as the largest insured disaster in U.S. history, and a string of other storms.

DOJ_NMG_0025287

Besides boosting profits, the industry raised its surplus by more than 7% to nearly $427 billion, according to an analysis of company filings by the National Assn. of Insurance Commissioners, which represents regulators from the 50 states. The surplus is intended to provide a financial cushion in times of high claims.

The industry covered virtually all of its claims and expenses with premiums earned during the year rather than with surplus funds, according to the organization's analysis. The ratio of claims and expenses to premiums was among the lowest in three decades.

The question is: How, in a year that produced an estimated $56.8 billion in disaster losses, nearly twice the previous record and more than twice what insurers paid after the Sept. 11 attacks, is this possible?

The answer, in part, is that U.S. insurers purchased disaster insurance of their own before the 2005 storms, much of it from overseas firms. Executives said that half — and by some estimates, nearly two-thirds — of the insured losses from last year's hurricanes ultimately will be borne by so-called reinsurers, many based in Bermuda and Europe.

In part, it's because of what Hartwig called the "anomaly" of so much of the 2005 storm damage being caused by flooding, which private insurers don't cover and instead rely on Washington handles through the national flood insurance program.

But the industry's remarkable performance also reflects a dozen-year effort by insurers to insulate themselves from the most extreme financial consequences of catastrophe by, among other things, shifting risks previously borne by companies to policyholders and the public.

The effort started after the last big batch of natural disasters in the early 1990s, among them Hurricane Andrew in Florida in 1992, and the Oakland Hills firestorm in 1991 and Northridge earthquake in 1994 in California.

The effort has included industry adoption of increasingly sophisticated techniques for analyzing catastrophic risk, as well as self-imposed limits on how much firms will cover and where. It also has included successful campaigns to get states or state-created entities to shoulder such dangers as earthquakes in California and wind in Florida, Texas, Hawaii and elsewhere. And it has involved tightening policy language — by, for example, narrowing the definition of "replacement cost" for homes — in ways that leave individuals bearing more of the burden of putting their material lives back together after trouble strikes.

While premiums for homeowners insurance have increased by more than half since the early 1990s, coverage, especially in disasters, has shrunk. Historically, insurers covered a little more than 60% of total losses in disasters, according to Hartwig, the industry economist. During the 2004 hurricanes in Florida, they covered less than 50%, according to Hartwig's numbers. During Katrina, he said, they covered about 30%, due in part to the high flood damage.

In making these changes, the insurance industry has been part of a trend that has picked up steam as the U.S. economy has grown more competitive in recent decades — a shift of financial risks from business and often government to individual households.

"If last year's hurricane season had occurred 10 years ago, it would have been devastating for the company," said Allstate Vice President Fred F. Cripe in an interview. "Last year, it was merely disappointing."

Despite evidence of industry success in reducing its financial exposure in disasters, major insurers — most prominently Allstate — have announced a new round of risk-limiting steps, including approving no new homeowners policies along substantial stretches of the nation's East and Gulf coasts. Several have called for creation of state and federal funds to serve as financial backstops for the industry in the biggest disasters.

The new proposals have drawn fire from a wide variety of quarters.

George K. Bernstein, appointed by President Nixon as the first administrator to oversee the government's flood, riot and crime insurance programs, said that private insurers had already pulled out of other risky lines of business.

"There's not going to be much left that they do insure by the time it's all over," he warned.

California Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said: "The insurance industry is running away from risk, and leaving policyholders holding the bag."

Among those policyholders are Robert and Denise Sebastian, whose two-story brick house at 326 Bellaire Drive in the sedate Country Club Gardens section of New Orleans flooded after the walls of one of the city's major canals gave way during Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0025288

Sebastian, a 52-year-old official with the federal Minerals Management Service, has filled three loose-leaf binders with correspondence and phone notes from his efforts to collect more than $450,000 he believes his family is owed by St. Paul Travelers and Encompass Insurance, an Allstate subsidiary.

He has managed to get about half of that amount, but only after repeated clashes with the companies and returning several small checks proffered as full payment. Despite what he says is evidence of roof damage and leaking, Encompass recently denied his claim for $100,000, saying damage was due to flood or settlement and therefore was not covered by his policy.

"My wife and I are both lawyers," said Sebastian. "We've put every bit of our wherewithal into pursing these claims, and we're still not settled after seven months.

"I wonder what happens to the grandmother in Gentilly."

To be sure, Katrina and last year's other big storms dealt body blows to some insurance companies. Mississippi's No. 2 insurer, Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance, went broke after paying $450 million in claims, and is being dissolved, according to state officials. PXRE Reinsurance Co., a subsidiary of Bermuda-based PXRE Group Ltd., has been forced to explore "strategic alternatives," according to a recent statement, after storm-related claims and expenses outstripped premiums by nearly 1,000%.

In addition, the final chapter has not been written for several insurers, including State Farm Fire and Casualty Co., USAA and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., because of lawsuits filed on behalf of Mississippi policyholders by prominent lawyer Richard Scruggs and the state's attorney general, Jim Hood.

Both charge the firms with wrongly denying claims for Katrina-related wind and water damage. In Hood's case, he argues that the standard provisions of homeowners policies excluding flood coverage are ambiguous. But company lawyers say the policies are clear. Industry analysts think that the plaintiffs stand little chance of succeeding, and that even if they do, the results will not fundamentally alter the companies' finances.

Among insurers, the consensus is that the industry is in the best shape it has been in years. Some argue against tampering with success.

"We've been through some of the worst natural disasters and man-made catastrophes in our history, and had some of the best earnings in the last 20 or 30 years," said Frank W. Nutter, president of the Reinsurance Assn. of America, a Washington trade group.

Nutter accused companies that are calling for major changes in coverage and creation of public backstop programs of engaging in "a risk-shift strategy of moving risks off their books onto government and policyholders." Members of Nutter's group stand to make big profits from major insurers stocking up on reinsurance to guard against fresh catastrophes. Reinsurers are said to have raised premiums by 100% or more since last year's storms.

Other industry executives insist they are simply trying to protect their companies and the public.

Hartwig, the industry economist, and Cripe, the Allstate vice president, said that insurers' greatest concern is that the number and intensity of big storms hitting the U.S. coast have risen and are likely to stay high for years to come. They said that although the industry easily handled the costs of the last two years of hurricanes, a similar pummeling during the next few years would deplete its finances.

As evidence of the change, the pair noted that seven of the 10 most costly hurricanes in U.S. history occurred during the last two years. And they cited the recent announcement by a leading disaster modeling firm, Risk Management Solutions Inc. of Newark, Calif., that chances of devastating storms making landfall are dramatically higher than it previously predicted.

RMS executive vice president Paul VanderMarck said in an interview that the firm's decision to switch from using 100-year averages to looking at just the past five years in forecasting storms, and the resulting jump in its prediction of big storm losses along the East and Gulf coasts, was based solely on new scientific knowledge, for example on rising ocean temperatures, and the views of an expert panel.

But critics said that the change was the product of pressure from insurers seeking to justify rate hikes and that, in any case, it represented an unfair changing of the rules by the industry.

"The companies came in after the early 1990s disasters and told us, 'We're going to start using these long-term models that are going to have periods of intense activity and periods of no activity," said J. Robert Hunter, who was Texas insurance commissioner at the time and is now insurance director at the Consumer Federation of America. "They wanted us set the rates so that it would even things out across the highs and lows, and we agreed," Hunter said.

DOJ_NMG_0025289

"Now they're coming back," he continued, "and saying 'Oops! We got it wrong; we're going to change the model.' That reneges on the deal."

The state's current commissioner, Mike Geeslin, had similar sentiments: "You have companies that say they have a plan to stay put year in and year out, and gather a large share of the market. Then they decide they have more risk than they can stomach."

The result, Geeslin said, is that the state must either "prop them up" with rate hikes and other concessions, or step in and take their place.

Industry executives offer a second argument for drastic change that goes well beyond altered weather patterns and focuses especially on the need for federal and state backup for insurers. They suggest that the combination of rapid real estate development and rising home prices so raise the risk of gargantuan loss in a hurricane that much of coastal America has become virtually uninsurable by private industry.

In a recent speech, Allstate chief executive Edward M. Liddy painted a vivid picture of how a tightly packed set of storms could erase first the profits, then potentially the financial stability, of an insurer in a quick blast.

"When Hurricane Andrew hit the coast of Florida in 1992," Liddy told a Washington audience in January, "it wiped out all of the profits Allstate ever made in the state from all lines of insurance over the course of our history.... And when four hurricanes hit in 2004, they wiped out all the profits from 1992 to 2004.

"That's not a viable economic proposition for a company," he told his audience. "It's not a viable economic proposition for an industry."

Without government backup, he seemed to be saying, Allstate and other companies would have little business reason to continue offering insurance of any sort.

But a quick check of Allstate's regulatory filings from the mid-1990s through 2004 showed that the insurer earned $6 billion more in premiums in Florida than it incurred in losses. Add to that the premium earnings for last year, and the total rises to more than $6.6 billion.

Asked about what happened to that sum, Allstate spokesman Mike Trevino responded: "What Mr. Liddy meant to say is that ... the four hurricanes wiped out all the profits Allstate earned from our homeowners line of business," not all lines.

Overall, the company made money.

Foreign Experts Critique U.S. Red Cross On Katrina (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The American Red Cross's response to Hurricane Katrina was poorly planned, relied too heavily on inexperienced managers and often failed to meet the needs of victims, say reports by international Red Cross officials who were dispatched to assist their American counterparts.

The unusually harsh reports, prepared in late summer and the fall, detailed mismatches between the needs of victims and the supplies the Red Cross had arranged, the absence of a plan to guide the distribution of supplies and a lack of record-keeping, which allowed inventory to go astray.

"What is clear is that the basic needs of the beneficiaries are not being met," Mike Goodhand, head of the international logistics division of the British Red Cross, wrote on Sept. 15.

The reports, which were provided to The New York Times by a former American Red Cross official who insisted on anonymity, closely echo concerns raised by volunteers in the disaster area.

Those concerns are now the subject of a wide-ranging investigation by the American Red Cross that has already produced evidence of possible criminal misconduct by volunteer managers. The F.B.I. and the Louisiana attorney general are also conducting inquiries, seeking to determine whether relief supplies were stolen.

DOJ_NMG_0025290

The Red Cross, which had 235,000 volunteers in the field after Hurricane Katrina, received roughly 60 percent of the $3.6 billion that Americans donated for hurricane relief.

Mr. Goodhand's report described a case in which victims in Mississippi, where his team had been sent, were requesting prepared meals and the only food that Red Cross volunteers could offer was bananas. Volunteers driving out into neighborhoods were asked for water and juice, but had only bleach on hand, he wrote.

"All efforts to address the situation were rebuffed," Mr. Goodhand wrote. He said that when his team offered its expertise on distributing supplies, it was instead assigned to hand out the supplies, work that could have been done by less experienced volunteers.

On Sept. 12, two weeks after the hurricane, his team did what he described as "a nonscientific but representative and valid" assessment of what victims were saying they needed. The most requested items were juice; Gatorade; feminine hygiene, general hygiene and household cleaning products; and insect repellent. The team found none of those in the warehouse.

"The demand for these items is entirely predictable," he wrote.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Senate Finance Committee and has been pushing for an overhaul of the American Red Cross, called Mr. Goodhand's report, which he obtained independently, "very sobering reading."

"The report and similar findings from whistle-blowers make it clear that there is a significant need for deep, substantial reform at the American Red Cross," he wrote in an e-mail message to a reporter.

Mr. Goodhand's assessment, and a similar one by Thomas Riess, a German logistics expert with the International Committee of the Red Cross, were filed in September with the authors' home agencies, the American Red Cross and, in Mr. Goodhand's case, a number of other Red Cross agencies. While they did not allege criminal wrongdoing, they warned of the potential for it.

"The insufficient control on deliveries allows, without any effort, to unlawfully appropriate" supplies, Mr. Riess wrote on Sept. 12.

Mr. Riess's report also incorporated the observations of logistics experts from Red Cross organizations in Colombia, Ethiopia, Jordan and Russia, while Mr. Goodhand's included those of officials from the Red Cross agencies in Finland, the Netherlands and Spain. Current and former Red Cross officials said the language was far more pointed than is common in such reports, which are routinely filed when foreign Red Cross organizations participate in a disaster relief effort.

Armond T. Mascelli, vice president for response operations at the American Red Cross, said the organization was already working to address the concerns raised by the foreign experts.

For the coming hurricane season, Mr. Mascelli said, the Red Cross is striving to better its positioning of supplies and to find ways to improve delivery of necessities like food and water. For the longer term, he said, the agency is seeking the expertise of its corporate supporters to transform its rather simple distribution operation into a comprehensive system of supply chain management.

"Our plan is to do what we can that is reasonable for this hurricane season," he said, "but also look at what we put in place in the future to take care of catastrophic events."

Sir Nicholas Young, the chief executive of the British Red Cross, who coincidentally was at American Red Cross headquarters in Washington yesterday, said Mr. Goodhand's report provided a snapshot of what had happened in a small part of the disaster area and was not a commentary on the American Red Cross's overall response.

"What Mike's report in fact reflects is that he was working in Biloxi with one chapter with paid staff and with volunteers who didn't necessarily have the logistics skills they needed," Sir Nicholas said.

Both reports strongly praised the Red Cross volunteers. Mr. Riess wrote that he was "impressed by the motivation of volunteers and by the deep generosity of the American people." Mr. Goodhand called the volunteer corps "one of the best, if not the best, any of us have experienced."

But both also criticized the American Red Cross for assigning volunteers to tasks for which, the reports said, they were unprepared. For example, Mr. Goodhand said a volunteer in charge of managing a fleet of more than 100 vehicles did not know where cars and trucks were, why they had been dispatched or who had them.

DOJ_NMG_0025291

Mr. Riess warned that a lack of accountability, resulting from a weak system of tracking inventory, threatened to damage relations with victims and donors alike.

"Critics may rise," he wrote, "and attract the unwelcome interest of journalists."

Counterparts Excoriate Red Cross Katrina Effort (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Two international Red Cross organizations issued scathing criticisms of the American Red Cross's chaotic response to Hurricane Katrina, accusing the charity of approaching the relief effort with a "dangerous combination of ignorance and arrogance."

The reports -- by the British Red Cross and the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross, which sent experts to the Gulf Coast shortly after Katrina struck -- say their American counterpart was ill-prepared for the disaster, relied on inexperienced volunteers in key positions and had an ineffective system for moving supplies to where they were needed.

The reports continue the drumbeat of criticism of the charity, which has escalated in the months since hundreds of thousands of Gulf Coast residents flocked to Red Cross shelters and relief trucks after Katrina struck.

The nonprofit group, which collected more than $2 billion in donations for the disaster, has been criticized for responding too slowly, neglecting some areas and treating minorities with insensitivity.

Official scrutiny of the charity's Katrina response escalated last week when federal law-enforcement authorities and the Louisiana attorney general launched criminal investigations.

The reports by the British Red Cross and the ICRC were prepared in September after teams of logistics experts from both organizations worked with the American Red Cross in Biloxi, Miss., and Montgomery, Ala.

But the American Red Cross didn't release them until yesterday, after The Washington Post asked the British Red Cross for a copy.

Yesterday, British Red Cross chief executive Sir Nicholas Young sought to play down the reports' harsh tones.

"When you've got a disaster of this magnitude . . . I can well understand that it's not possible to be absolutely on the top line in some areas," he said. "It's just too big."

But his organization's report, written by logistics chief Michael Goodhand, dismissed American Red Cross officials' protestations that they were overwhelmed by Katrina's size.

"The scale of impact of Katrina may have exceeded expectations," said Goodhand's report, "but the week's notice of her arrival gives ample time for contingency plans to be in place."

In vivid detail, the reports lay out problems that plagued the relief effort. They said the Red Cross did not track donated goods it took into its warehouses and had few effective systems for figuring out which goods were needed where.

As an example, the ICRC report by logistics coordinator Thomas Riess cited a truckload of donated pastries that went moldy because they were not refrigerated and a large quantity of donated radios without batteries that was dumped in an Alabama warehouse.

The British report warned that as long as the Red Cross relies on volunteer labor, its disaster response will "remain amateurish and their services to those affected sub-optimal."

Yesterday, American Red Cross officials said they took the reports seriously and, as part of an overhaul of disaster operations, are redesigning their supply-chain system with the help of corporations.

WAR NEWS:

Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP-Y2)

By Liz Sidoti

AP2, April 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025292

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq.

"The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that," Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel.

"I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to," the chief U.S. diplomat added.

However, Rice did not say when all U.S. forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman (news, bio, voting record), D-N.J., when he asked, "Will the bases be permanent or not?"

"I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days. We are, in fact, in the process of removing base structure from a lot of places," Rice replied.

"I can't foresee the future of whether or not there will be some need for American forces for some period of time," she added. "But I can tell you that our discussions with the Iraqis are about getting them capable to defend, not just against their internal insurgency and internal enemies, but also to be able to be a responsible and defensible state within the region."

Earlier Tuesday, President Bush urged Iraq to move quickly to form a unity government, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job." He said the formation of a new government would give Iraqis confidence in their future.

Bush's statement, during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House, came on the heels of a similar admonition by Rice during a visit to Iraq. She had spoken of a "sense of drift" nearly four months after Iraqis held parliamentary elections.

Bush said insurgents were using violence to prevent democracy from taking hold. "One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.'"

On Captiol Hill, Rice testified before the House panel just hours after returning to the United States from a weeklong trip to Europe that included a surprise detour to Iraq. She and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions for two days of diplomatic talks.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers increasingly are questioning just how long U.S. troops will remain in Iraq, especially given what appear to be construction projects at military bases Iraq and polls that show Iraqis believe the United States plans to keep permanent bases in their country.

Iraq's interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, has said he opposes permanent foreign bases. American public opinion is against them as well.

Last month, Bush said that American forces will remain in Iraq for years and it will be up to a future president to decide when to bring them all home.

Appearing before the House subcommittee, Rice defended U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq's essential services, such as electricity, even though progress has been hampered by security problems. She said the United States has made important investments in rebuilding the structures to provide such services.

"We believe that they will pay off," she said.

However, Rice acknowledged problems with security as well as "some corruption problems in some of the ministries." She said the United States is urging Iraqi officials to correct the issues so that reconstruction can proceed unhampered.

Rice also:

_Defended the United States' efforts to help Afghanistan eradicate poppy crops and the Bush administration's public plan to invest $75 million into U.S. democracy programs aimed at strengthening ties with the Iranian people.

"On this one I don't think speaking softly about the democracy problem in Iran is really the appropriate course. I think we do have to be very public about it," Rice said.

_Said it would be helpful for the African Union to "put its full weight" behind putting together a U.N. peacekeeping force in the war-ravaged Darfur region.

"There are sometimes mixed signals from the African Union about how they view this. There are sometimes mixed signals out of the Arab League about how they view this," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0025293

Democracy In Iraq Not A Priority In U.S. Budget (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

While President Bush vows to transform Iraq into a beacon of democracy in the Middle East, his administration has been scaling back funding for the main organizations trying to carry out his vision by building democratic institutions such as political parties and civil society groups.

The administration has included limited new money for traditional democracy promotion in budget requests to Congress. Some organizations face funding cutoffs this month, while others struggle to stretch resources through the summer. The shortfall threatens projects that teach Iraqis how to create and sustain political parties, think tanks, human rights groups, independent media outlets, trade unions and other elements of democratic society.

The shift in funding priorities comes as security costs are eating up an enormous share of U.S. funds for Iraq and the administration has already ratcheted back ambitions for reconstructing the country's battered infrastructure. While acknowledging that they are investing less in party-building and other such activities, administration officials argue that bringing more order and helping Iraqis run effective ministries contribute to democracy as well.

Jennifer Windsor, executive director of Freedom House, an advocacy group that hosted a Bush speech last week, called the situation "a travesty" and said she is "appalled" that more is not being done. "This is the time to show that democracy promotion is more than holding an election. If the U.S. can't see fit to fund follow-up democracy promotion at this time," then it is making a mistake, she said.

"The commitment to what the president of the United States will say every single day of the week is his number one priority in Iraq, when it's translated into action, looks very tiny," said Les Campbell, who runs programs in the Middle East for the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, known as NDI.

NDI and its sister, the International Republican Institute (IRI), will see their grants from the U.S. Agency for International Development dry up at the end of this month, according to a government document, leaving them only special funds earmarked by Congress last year. Similarly, the U.S. Institute of Peace has had its funding for Iraq democracy promotion cut by 60 percent. And the National Endowment for Democracy expects to run out of money for Iraqi programs by September.

"Money keeps getting transferred away to security training. Democracy's one of the things that's been transferred," said Thomas Carothers of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace's project on democracy and the rule of law. "Without that, all the other stuff looks like just background work."

Among the projects facing closure is the Iraq Civil Society and Media Program, funded by USAID and run by America's Development Foundation and the International Research and Exchanges Board. The program has established four civil society resource centers around the country, conducted hundreds of workshops and forums, and trained thousands of government officials in transparency and accountability. It also helped Iraqis set up the National Iraqi News Agency, the first independent news agency in the Arab world.

The program was supposed to run at least through June 2007 but without $15 million more, it will have to close this summer.

Officials at the White House, the State Department, the Office of Management and Budget and USAID were contacted for comment in recent days, but none would speak on the record. In response to a request for comment, USAID sent promotional documents hailing past accomplishments in Iraq, such as sponsoring town hall meetings, training election monitors, and distributing pamphlets, posters and publications explaining voting and the new constitution.

The president's supplemental Iraq spending request includes just $10 million for democracy promotion, and his proposed budget for fiscal 2007 asks for $63 million, a fraction of the tens of billions of dollars spent each year on Iraq. But officials argue that other funds in effect further the same goal. For instance, the administration targeted $254 million for enhancing the rule of law by creating a fair judiciary and a humane prison system.

For Bush, developing democracy in Iraq has become perhaps the signature of his presidency, and he takes special pride in the three elections held since sovereignty was transferred by U.S. authorities. Veterans of past democracy-building efforts, however, have complained that having elections is not enough -- an argument the president has embraced lately, both in his speeches and in his newly released National Security Strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0025294

"Elections start the process. They're not the end of the process," Bush told Freedom House last week. "And one of the reasons I respect the Freedom House is because you understand that you follow elections with institution-building and the creation of civil society."

Money flowed to such programs in the beginning of the Iraq enterprise. The National Endowment for Democracy, which supported projects in the Kurdish north of Iraq even before the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, found itself soon after Baghdad fell with $25 million to expand elsewhere in the country and eventually received a total of $71 million. It distributed some to the IRI and the NDI and some to groups such as the Iraqi National Association for Human Rights in Babylon and the Organization for a Model Iraqi Society.

Last month the endowment received the final $3 million owed on past allocations, with no further funding identified. "It does feel like everybody's getting squeezed in this area," said Barbara E. Haig, the endowment's vice president. "There probably is a commitment to these programs in principle. I don't know how much commitment there is in specificity."

The IRI and the NDI, which are affiliated with the two U.S. political parties, will lose USAID financing April 30. The two party institutes led a coalition to educate Iraqis before last year's elections. An evaluation commissioned by USAID in December called it "essential" that the program "be continued for at least another 24 months."

The party institutes will be able to continue some programs for now only because of a special earmark inserted into legislation last year with $56 million for the two groups. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) sponsored the earmark with support from Sens. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) after it appeared that NDI and IRI would run out of money last year.

"The solution to Iraq lies in the political process, and it's reckless for the White House to cut funds to strengthen democracy in Iraq at this time," Kennedy said yesterday.

At current spending rates, the earmark will run out this year. After that, the Bush administration has included just $15 million for the two party institutes as part of the $63 million for Iraqi democracy in next year's budget, which would require most programs to be cut.

The U.S. Institute of Peace faces similar cutbacks to its program. "It's just vital," said Daniel P. Serwer, an institute vice president. All the democracy programs in Iraq combined, he noted, cost less than one day of the U.S. military mission. "Am I absolutely sure that we will shorten the deployment time of American troops enough to justify the cost of the program? Yes," he said.

In Iraq, US Still Carries Big Stick (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Much of the money for rebuilding Iraq has already been spent, and Iraqi soldiers are gradually taking over for their American counterparts. So what can the United States still use as leverage? It may be that the strongest influence is the simple fear of what would happen if the US up and left.

"Most of Iraq's leaders recognize that if the US were to pull out precipitously, things could get much worse," says Phebe Marr, an Iraq expert at the US Institute of Peace who has spent considerable time with Iraq's principal political factions. "All the talk about the US getting out, an exit strategy and so forth, has them worried. It's having an impact."

Yet even as the US shows signs of growing increasingly impatient with Iraqi leaders over their inability to name a new government, that doesn't mean the US wants to look as if it is determining Iraq's future. The result is a delicate balancing act: It's applying pressure for political action even while encouraging a sovereign Iraq that appears to stand on its own two feet.

For weeks, the US has left its behind-closed-doors arm-twisting to its ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, with the aim of seeing a national unity government named that is acceptable to the major political factions and population groups. But with alarm growing that what the US calls a "power vacuum" is feeding sectarian violence, the pressure has become more public - and from higher up.

DOJ_NMG_0025295

On Tuesday, President Bush said, "It's time for the elected leaders to stand up and do their job." The remark came one day after Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice concluded a visit to Baghdad accompanied by British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw.

The two diplomats gave no public indications of their preference for prime minister, the keystone in the construction of Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein. But the US has made little effort to squelch speculation that it wishes to see Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari give up his battle to retain his post.

Ms. Rice and Mr. Straw met once with Mr. Jaafari in a tense photo session, but pointedly met for meetings and a breakfast with two other prominent Shiite leaders, Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who heads one of Iraq's major Shiite parties. Mr. Mahdi lost his bid to be nominated prime minister by only one vote in secret balloting of the Shiite bloc.

Those meetings may have only served to spotlight the deepening fissures within Iraq's Shiite majority - a latent situation that could lead to a new front of violence. That is especially true, some analysts say, because Jaafari has the backing of the volatile young cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Mr. Sadr has recently toned down his anti- occupation rhetoric as he has amassed power in the new National Assembly, some observers note, but might reignite resistance if he decided it might enhance his kingmaker role.

In addition to the two diplomats, members of the US Congress have also visited Baghdad and key political leaders recently. Some have told Iraqi counterparts that the US commitment to Iraq is under pressure and could be scaled back if they do not end their political infighting.

Yet the US is also operating with the knowledge that too much pressure could have the negative result of prolonging the leadership stalemate among politicians who are sensitive about foreign influences in Iraq. "There are misgivings and growing mistrust towards those [leaders] with too-close ties to outsiders, particularly the US and Iran," says Ellen Laipson, a former CIA official with foreign-policy and national-security expertise.

By its investment and presence in the country, the US has a right to exercise pressure, and there are things it can do "without going over the line," says Ms. Laipson, now president of the Stimson Center, a Washington defense and security think tank. "We are operating within a boundary that says it's not up to us to pick the names" of who will govern, but that says the US provides "broad guidelines on what will help the security situation and get them on the right track."

So the US is in "the unusual situation of saying we'd like someone other than Jaafari" for prime minister, she says. But the US is also emphasizing that the ministers of defense and interior should be someone with no ties to the country's powerful and ethnically based militias.

Still, with US clout waning, other means of pressuring Iraq's leadership are under discussion. One idea is an international conference that would be held outside Iraq - something similar to the Bonn conference that provided guideposts to Afghanistan's post-Taliban government.

Ambassador Khalilzad, an Afghan-American who was previously ambassador to his native country, has floated that idea. Yet while "internationalizing" Iraq could help, some experts say, they also doubt that many countries wish to step in to help Iraq. Add to that the deep suspicions that Iraqis harbor toward the neighboring countries that might have some influence.

In any case, many experts caution that naming a government is not going to magically transform Iraq, any more than earlier milestones - such as elections - have done the trick.

"It's a little misplaced to say that [forming a government] somehow solves the sectarian problem or any of the other really difficult challenges on the ground," Ms. Marr says. "It will probably help some to have a new government, but we shouldn't be under any illusions that the day after, the insurgency will put down its guns, or the sectarian violence is going to stop."

Let The Iraqis Bargain (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Americans are getting impatient about the formation of a new Iraqi government. That's what Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told political leaders in Baghdad this week, and she was putting it mildly. But it would be folly if American impatience torpedoed the slow but real progress Iraqi leaders are making toward a government that could step back from the brink of civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0025296

"We need to be patient to get it right," Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, told me in a telephone interview yesterday. "Their concept of time is not the same as ours. While we press them to hurry up, the American people also need to be patient."

Khalilzad recounted the items that the Iraqi political factions have agreed on in private negotiations over the past month. On Sunday, the leaders signed off on the last of these planks of a government of national unity. The Iraqis have saved the hardest issue for last -- the names of the politicians who will hold the top jobs. That bitter fight will play out over the next several weeks.

An example of what's in these unity documents is a passage that calls for "a timetable so the Iraqi forces assume the security tasks completely and end the mission of the multinational force in Iraq." That timetable language is vague, but it would allow the new government to say it is committed to ending the American occupation. Interestingly, U.S. officials said yesterday that this passage on troop withdrawal is consistent with Bush administration policy.

The political agreements are fragile, and they will be blown away if the factions can't form a government soon to put them in practice. Meanwhile, beyond the Green Zone, Iraqis are still being slaughtered every day in the streets. But given where Iraq was six months ago -- when Sunni and Shiite leaders were barely talking -- their agreement on the framework for a unity government is important. These negotiations may not succeed, but they are not a fairy-tale fantasy, as some critics argue.

"All the elements of the deal are there, up in the air, and they could come down and click into place," Kurdish leader Barham Salih told me by telephone from Iraq. "We have come to the real crunch."

Here's the framework for the unity government, as outlined by Khalilzad, who has attended nearly all of the meetings. First, the broad strokes: The Sunni leaders have accepted that the new government will operate under the Iraqi constitution and that it will be based on the results of last December's election, both of which reflect the reality that the Shiites are Iraq's largest religious group. The Shiites, in turn, have agreed that the new government will be guided by consensus among all the factions. And they have agreed to checks that will, in theory, prevent the key security ministries from being hijacked by Shiite militia groups.

To implement this consensual approach, the Iraqi factions agreed on two bodies that weren't mentioned in the constitution. They endorsed a 19-member consultative national security council, which represents all the political factions. And they agreed on a ministerial security council, which will have the Sunni deputy prime minister as its deputy chairman. Shiite leaders have tentatively agreed that the defense minister will be a Sunni. And for the key job of interior minister, the dominant Shiite faction, known as the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, appears ready to accept the replacement of one of its members by an independent Shiite, perhaps Qasim Dawood, a man acceptable to most Sunni leaders.

The real brawl lies ahead over who should be prime minister. Ibrahim al-Jafari, the interim prime minister, is fighting to hold on to his job. Kurdish and Sunni groups have opposed him, as has the Bush administration, arguing that he is too weak and too sectarian. This anti-Jafari coalition added a crucial new member Monday when the Supreme Council's top leaders formally told Jafari they will vote against him if the choice is thrown to the new parliament. That broke the unity of the Shiite alliance, cutting 50 to 70 votes from the 130 that Jafari had counted on, and it may doom his candidacy.

The day-to-day bargaining is taking place in Baghdad. But the X-factor in this delicate game is U.S. political support. Khalilzad could fail in his effort to midwife a unity government, and Iraq could spiral into full-blown civil war. But it would be crazy for an impatient America to talk itself into defeat and pull the plug prematurely. As Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador to Washington, remarked this week: "America came to Iraq uninvited. You should not leave uninvited."

Key Iraq Leader Calls For PM To Step Aside (AP-Y2)

By Robert H. Reid

AP2, April 5, 2006

An Iraqi vice president called Tuesday for the embattled Shiite prime minister to step aside so a new government can be formed, becoming the most senior Shiite official publicly to endorse demands for a leadership change to halt the slide toward civil war.

Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi told the British Broadcasting Corp. that he met with Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari on Monday and urged him to give up the nomination for a second term because he had lost the confidence of the Sunnis and Kurds.

DOJ_NMG_0025297

But Abdul-Mahdi said al-Jaafari refused, insisting he wanted to take his case to parliament, which must approve the new prime minister and his Cabinet by a majority vote.

Asked whether al-Jaafari should withdraw his nomination, Abdul-Mahdi said: "Yes, after such a time of naming him, not getting approval from others now in UIA (the dominant Shiite political bloc), there is some rejection so I think he should step aside."

Abdul-Mahdi lost the prime minister nomination to al-Jaafari in February by a single vote at a caucus of the Shiite bloc, which won the most seats in parliamentary elections last December. Al-Jaafari squeaked through largely because he had the support of the powerful anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Abdul-Mahdi's comment followed the visit of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, who warned the Iraqis that their key allies were losing patience with the political stalemate.

U.S. officials have been urging the Iraqis to form a new national unity government of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds as a first step toward restoring public confidence and halting the country's slide toward anarchy. The talks have stalled over the demands that al-Jaafari be replaced.

President Bush urged the Iraqis on Tuesday to speed up the talks, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job."

"One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, `I'm willing to lead,'" Bush said.

Critics blame al-Jaafari for failing to restore order and for the rise in sectarian tensions. His main critics have been Sunnis and Kurds, but last weekend two other prominent Shiite politicians also called for him to step aside as the nominee.

However, Shiite officials fear that replacing him might splinter their alliance, and a Kurdish politician who opposes al-Jaafari said he feared that international pressure to remove him might trigger a backlash among Iraqis angry over foreign influence.

On Tuesday, about 2,500 people marched in support of al-Jaafari in Baghdad's Sadr City district, carrying banners saying "Down with the Conspiracy" against their candidate.

Shiite officials have been meeting for several days with Sunni and Kurdish leaders urging them to soften their opposition to al-Jaafari.

"I think tomorrow, or the day after things will ease up," said Shiite politician Khudayer al-Khuzai, who backs the prime minister. "They were understanding the grave repercussions of changing. If al-Jaafari is changed, then the (Shiite) alliance will split. We cannot abandon him because he was democratically elected."

Meanwhile, a car bomb exploded Tuesday in a mostly Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, killing at least 10 people.

The bomb went off in the poor, mostly Shiite area of Habibiyah and damaged several cars and nearby sandwich stands, police said. Chaos ensued as militants from radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia fired weapons in the air to clear the crowds.

At least a dozen other Iraqis were killed Tuesday in war-related violence in Baghdad and central Iraq, police said.

They included a mother and two of her sons, 9 and 12, who died when a bomb exploded in front of their home in the capital. A third son, age 13, was wounded, along with two brothers from a different family living in the same home, police said.

Elsewhere in Baghdad, a receptionist at the United Arab Emirates Embassy and his friend — both Iraqis — were slain as they left the building, police said. Insurgents have often targeted diplomats and employees of Arab and Muslim embassies to undermine support for the U.S.-backed government.

Gunmen also killed a judge, an ice cream vendor and his companion and a policeman in separate slayings in the capital, police said.

In Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near a convoy carrying the son of a city council member, killing a security guard and a driver, police said. The council member's son escaped injury.

In southern Iraq, gunmen killed one policeman and wounded another as the two were driving in the city of Basra, police said. Two mortar rounds exploded near the British consulate in Basra during a reception, causing no injuries but forcing the party to end early, an Associated Press reporter at the event said.

DOJ_NMG_0025298

Police in Baghdad also found the bodies of four men, apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. It was unclear when they were slain.

The body of a U.S. Marine missing after a weekend vehicle accident was also recovered Tuesday, the U.S. said. Six U.S. troops were killed and two remain missing after the Sunday accident in western Iraq.

Rice Dismisses Talk Of U.S. Bases In Iraq (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday brushed aside suggestions that the United States wants an indefinite troop presence and permanent military bases in Iraq.

"The presence in Iraq is for a very clear purpose, and that's to enable Iraqis to be able to govern themselves and to create security forces that can help them do that," Rice told the House Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel.

"I don't think that anybody believes that we really want to be there longer than we have to," the chief U.S. diplomat added.

However, Rice did not say when all U.S. forces would return home and did not directly answer Rep. Steven Rothman (news, bio, voting record), D-N.J., when he asked, "Will the bases be permanent or not?"

"I would think that people would tell you, we're not seeking permanent bases really pretty much anywhere in the world these days. We are, in fact, in the process of removing base structure from a lot of places," Rice replied.

"I can't foresee the future of whether or not there will be some need for American forces for some period of time," she added. "But I can tell you that our discussions with the Iraqis are about getting them capable to defend, not just against their internal insurgency and internal enemies, but also to be able to be a responsible and defensible state within the region."

Earlier Tuesday, President Bush urged Iraq to move quickly to form a unity government, calling on elected leaders "to stand up and do their job." He said the formation of a new government would give Iraqis confidence in their future.

Bush's statement, during a brief question-and-answer session with reporters at the White House, came on the heels of a similar admonition by Rice during a visit to Iraq. She had spoken of a "sense of drift" nearly four months after Iraqis held parliamentary elections.

Bush said insurgents were using violence to prevent democracy from taking hold. "One way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people that those few will not be able to determine the future of that country is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.'"

On Captiol Hill, Rice testified before the House panel just hours after returning to the United States from a weeklong trip to Europe that included a surprise detour to Iraq. She and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions for two days of diplomatic talks.

Republican and Democratic lawmakers increasingly are questioning just how long U.S. troops will remain in Iraq, especially given what appear to be construction projects at military bases in Iraq and polls indicating that Iraqis believe the United States plans to keep permanent bases in their country.

Iraq's interim prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, has said he opposes permanent foreign bases. American public opinion is against them as well.

Last month, Bush said that American forces will remain in Iraq for years and it will be up to a future president to decide when to bring them all home.

Appearing before the House subcommittee, Rice defended U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq's essential services, such as electricity, even though progress has been hampered by security problems. She said the United States has made important investments in rebuilding the structures to provide such services.

"We believe that they will pay off," she said.

However, Rice acknowledged problems with security as well as "some corruption problems in some of the ministries." She said the United States is urging Iraqi officials to correct the issues so that reconstruction can proceed unhampered.

Rice also:

DOJ_NMG_0025299

• Defended the United States' efforts to help Afghanistan eradicate poppy crops and the Bush administration's public plan to invest $75 million in U.S. democracy programs aimed at strengthening ties with the Iranian people.

"On this one I don't think speaking softly about the democracy problem in Iran is really the appropriate course. I think we do have to be very public about it," Rice said.

• Said it would be helpful for the African Union to "put its full weight" behind putting together a U.N. peacekeeping force in the war-ravaged Darfur region.

"There are sometimes mixed signals from the African Union about how they view this. There are sometimes mixed signals out of the Arab League about how they view this," Rice said.

Condi's Iraq Stumble (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Iraq can use all the gestures of solidarity it can get. And President Bush could boost both American and Iraqi morale by putting his own two boots on the ground there sometime soon. But try as we might, we can't see what good purpose was served by Condoleezza Rice and Jack Straw's lobbying in Baghdad earlier this week. If the American Secretary of State and British Foreign Secretary were aiming to be diplomatic, they failed.

That's because with both words and gestures the two publicly took sides in a contentious dispute over forming Iraq's government -- and in favor of a man, former Finance Minister Adel Abdul Mahdi, who is not even a declared candidate for Prime Minister. Meanwhile, they snubbed Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who beat out Mr. Mahdi to become the Shiite coalition's candidate for the post, and who is also the current holder of the office.

The effect was to suggest to many Shiites -- even those who don't love Mr. Jaafari -- that the U.S. and Britain are not respecting their victory in December's election. As senior Kurdish politician Mahmoud Othman, a usual ally of the U.S., put it, "I think that their interference is bad, and it further complicates issues because this is an Iraqi matter."

It's hard to see any reason for a strong U.S. preference here. Granted that Mr. Jaafari has not proven to be a strong and decisive leader. But he is by everyone's account a good and honest person, and he has more genuine support on the Iraqi street than most other leaders -- though admittedly that's not saying much given the general unpopularity of Iraqi pols. He's also less beholden to Iran than many possible alternatives.

As for Mr. Mahdi, he's clearly the smoother politician of the two. He speaks better English and he seems to have a more modern (free-market) economic philosophy, among other assets. But he also represents a party called the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. SCIRI has very strong ties to Iran, and it has been in charge during the interim government of the problematic Interior Ministry, whose police forces are not well trusted and have been credibly accused of abuses against Sunnis.

Mr. Mahdi's name has remained in play in part because President Jalal Talabani and the Kurds appear to have struck a deal with SCIRI to acquiesce in a Kurdish takeover of the oil-rich city of Kirkuk in exchange for the Kurds allowing the emergence of a more religious Shiite southern Iraq. Some kind of federalist power sharing is necessary, but too much will also risk a too-weak national government in Baghdad.

Our point isn't to pick one man, or faction, over the other. It is that we can't see a strong rationale for the U.S. taking sides -- certainly not enough to justify Ms. Rice's suggestion that the expenditure of U.S. "treasure" in Iraq justified her barely coded calls for Mr. Jaafari to step aside. A particular danger is that Ms. Rice may be playing into the hands of troublesome cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who dislikes Mr. Mahdi, and who may well be looking for any excuse to foment anti-American sentiment.

Mr. Jaafari may yet fail to form a new government. But it's much better to let him be seen to fail on his own if that's what happens, rather than be pushed aside by the Americans. Iraq has a parliamentary system that allows for no-confidence votes and changes of office if the government isn't working out.

More broadly, the Bush Administration can't afford to forget the most fundamental strategic fact about Iraq: To wit, our project there is entirely dependent on continued Shiite support. The U.S. and its Shiite allies can fight a low-intensity conflict with Sunni Saddamist remnants for a decade or more if need be. What would make the U.S. mission in Iraq untenable would be for Shiites to turn against us in significant numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0025300

And Shiite mistrust of the U.S. has been growing. One festering issue remains former U.S. regent Paul Bremer's decision to reverse himself on the de-Baathification policy he declared shortly after the U.S. invasion. De-Baathification gave Shiites the expectation of a process to punish those associated with the former regime and undoubtedly saved a lot of Sunni lives early on. But our about-face emboldened the Baathist insurgents, and Shiite-on-Sunni revenge killings are on the rise now because Shiites believe we can't -- or worse, won't -- protect them.

One especially worrying signal about the Shiite mood has been the reaction to a U.S.-Iraqi raid on elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army about 10 days ago. Many Shiites believe instead that U.S. forces massacred worshippers in cold blood inside a mosque. Ms. Rice's visit is now being cited as evidence of a U.S. "conspiracy" to deprive Shiites of their election victory.

The Secretary of State is surely right that the U.S. sacrifice for Iraqi freedom has earned us the right to speak up. But except where U.S. interests are clearly threatened, pressure is best applied behind closed doors by the seasoned U.S. Ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, not the unsubtle endorsement of candidates by overnighting officials.

Wisconsin Residents Vote On Whether To Keep Troops In Iraq (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Voters in 32 Wisconsin communities went to the polls Tuesday to decide referendums calling for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. By late Tuesday night, ballots had been counted in 25 towns and cities. The measures passed in 19 of them, including Madison, and were defeated in six.

Organizers hope the outcome in Wisconsin will encourage people in other states to put similar referendums on November ballots and prompt members of Congress to put pressure on the Bush administration to bring troops home.

“It's not going to stop here,” said Rachel Friedman, a member of Wisconsin's Bring Our Troops Home Coalition. “This can be done anywhere.”

Most of the anti-war referendums sought an immediate “orderly and rapid withdrawal” of troops. They were sponsored by the Wisconsin Green Party and the Wisconsin Network for Peace and Justice. Activists in each town gathered signatures to qualify them for the ballot.

People in Evansville, population 4,000, voted for that resolution and against a separate measure expressing support for President Bush's policies in Iraq and recommending that U.S. troops stay “until unquestioned victory is clearly won.”

The vote was close on both Evansville referendums. “Evansville is more evenly divided than I thought it was,” said Fred Juergens, a retired chemistry professor who organized the anti-war petition drive.

Tony Ryerson, a public works employee who helped get the measure supporting the war on Evansville's ballot, said debate over the dueling referendums was healthy. “We got our voice heard and got people talking,” he said.

Madison, the traditionally liberal state capital, was the largest city voting on the proposal to bring troops home. Other towns participating are in Republican-leaning rural areas. Anti-war resolutions have been adopted by more than 50 local governments across the USA and at more than 40 town meetings in Vermont.

The referendums have no legal weight, but Georgia Duerst-Lahti, a political science professor at Beloit College in Beloit, Wis., called them “the ultimate poll” on public attitudes about the war.

Passage of a majority of the anti-war measures, she said, might have national ramifications. “It confirms in a direct political fashion that people have grave concerns about what's going on” in Iraq, she said.

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month found that 54% of Americans want U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq now or within a year, and 60% said it wasn't worth it to go to war in Iraq.

Mayoral races, contests for school and county boards and funding referendums for schools also were on Tuesday's ballot in Wisconsin communities.

In the Kansas City area, voters were deciding whether to raise sales taxes to upgrade stadiums where the Royals play baseball and the Chiefs play football. Caruthersville, Mo., postponed its voting after the homes of 21 election judges were destroyed by a tornado Sunday.

Majority Of 32 Wisconsin Towns Vote For Iraq Pullout (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0025301

By Kari Kydersen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

SHOREWOOD, Wis., April 4 -- Voters in the majority of 32 Wisconsin towns with local referendums on the Iraq war voted Tuesday to bring the troops home.

A call to withdraw from Iraq by the end of the year passed overwhelmingly in the liberal Milwaukee suburb of Shorewood, while in conservative Watertown, where the City Council had opposed having the referendum, it was voted down by 75 percent.

Although the referendums are nonbinding, organizers with the Green Party and other antiwar groups said they hope they send a message to Washington.

"This sort of reminds me of Vietnam," said Nicole Bartelme, 22, a student at the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee who voted in Shorewood. "I have some friends in Iraq, and I think we should bring them home. I don't know realistically if this will have any effect, but hopefully someone's listening."

Under a 1911 state law granting municipalities the right to "direct legislation," Wisconsin residents can place a referendum on a local ballot by collecting signatures equal to 15 percent of the number that voted for governor in the last election. Most of the referendums called for a withdrawal of troops immediately. In Evansville, there also was a referendum supporting President Bush.

The City Council in Watertown, a town of 23,000 that went strongly for Bush in the past two elections, tried to block the referendum from the ballot but was overruled by a judge after the Watertown Peace and Democracy Coalition filed a lawsuit.

The referendum passed in La Crosse, near the Minnesota border, where the City Council had been split over the issue. Council President Joe Ledvina said he was surprised by the vote.

"The council felt overwhelmingly that it wasn't our jurisdiction, that we don't want to send a message that we aren't behind our president and the troops," Ledvina said.

In Shorewood, retired government worker Rick Westphal said he opposed the war "like everyone else" but didn't know whether it was appropriate for a local ballot measure.

"Is this really the arena for this?" he asked. "People are just coming here to vote for the school board. I'd rather see this on the national ballot."

Shorewood resident Keith Schmitz, a 55-year-old public relations consultant, spent the weekend going door to door with literature about the town's referendum, which calls for a pullout by year's end.

"This is truly a grass-roots effort," he said. "None of us are James Carvilles; it's just do-it-yourself politics. We're just doing our best and seeing what happens."

Ruth Weill, co-chair of the Wisconsin Green Party, which coordinated the statewide referendum drive, said she saw the movement as a victory regardless of the outcome.

"This is a true democratic exercise," Weill said. "I'm sure before this a lot of people didn't even know what a referendum was."

Two Deadlines And An Exit (NYT)

By John F. Kerry

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Washington

WE are now in the third war in Iraq in as many years. The first was against Saddam Hussein and his supposed weapons of mass destruction. The second was against terrorists whom, the administration said, it was better to fight over there than here. Now we find our troops in the middle of an escalating civil war.

Half of the service members listed on the Vietnam Memorial Wall died after America's leaders knew our strategy would not work. It was immoral then and it would be immoral now to engage in the same delusion. We want democracy in Iraq, but Iraqis must want it as much as we do. Our valiant soldiers can't bring democracy to Iraq if Iraq's leaders are unwilling themselves to make the compromises that democracy requires.

As our generals have said, the war cannot be won militarily. It must be won politically. No American soldier should be sacrificed because Iraqi politicians refuse to resolve their ethnic and political differences.

DOJ_NMG_0025302

So far, Iraqi leaders have responded only to deadlines — a deadline to transfer authority to a provisional government, and a deadline to hold three elections.

Now we must set another deadline to extricate our troops and get Iraq up on its own two feet.

Iraqi politicians should be told that they have until May 15 to put together an effective unity government or we will immediately withdraw our military. If Iraqis aren't willing to build a unity government in the five months since the election, they're probably not willing to build one at all. The civil war will only get worse, and we will have no choice anyway but to leave.

If Iraq's leaders succeed in putting together a government, then we must agree on another deadline: a schedule for withdrawing American combat forces by year's end. Doing so will empower the new Iraqi leadership, put Iraqis in the position of running their own country and undermine support for the insurgency, which is fueled in large measure by the majority of Iraqis who want us to leave their country. Only troops essential to finishing the job of training Iraqi forces should remain.

For this transition to work, we must finally begin to engage in genuine diplomacy. We must immediately bring the leaders of the Iraqi factions together at a Dayton Accords-like summit meeting. In a neutral setting, Iraqis, working with our allies, the Arab League and the United Nations, would be compelled to reach a political agreement that includes security guarantees, the dismantling of the militias and shared goals for reconstruction.

To increase the pressure on Iraq's leaders, we must redeploy American forces to garrisoned status. Troops should be used for security backup, training and emergency response; we should leave routine patrols to Iraqi forces. Special operations against Al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists in Iraq should be initiated only on hard intelligence leads.

We will defeat Al Qaeda faster when we stop serving as its best recruitment tool. Iraqis ultimately will not tolerate foreign jihadists on their soil, and the United States will be able to maintain an over-the-horizon troop presence with rapid response capacity. An exit from Iraq will also strengthen our hand in dealing with the Iranian nuclear threat and allow us to repair the damage of repeated deployments, which flag officers believe has strained military readiness and morale.

For three years now, the administration has told us that terrible things will happen if we get tough with the Iraqis. In fact, terrible things are happening now because we haven't gotten tough enough. With two deadlines, we can change all that. We can put the American leadership on the side of our soldiers and push the Iraqi leadership to do what only it can do: build a democracy.

Hussein Charged With Genocide In 50,000 Deaths (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, April 4 — The Iraqi court trying Saddam Hussein announced Tuesday that it had charged him with genocide, saying he sought to annihilate the Kurdish people in 1988, when the military killed at least 50,000 Kurdish civilians and destroyed 2,000 villages.

The case is the first against Mr. Hussein to address the large-scale human rights violations committed during his decades in power, the same acts the Bush administration has publicized in explaining the American invasion of Iraq. Six other defendants also face charges. Mr. Hussein is already being tried for the torture and killings of 148 men and boys in the Shiite village of Dujail.

Since the United Nations adopted the genocide convention in 1948, very few courts have charged defendants with genocide, the attempt to annihilate an ethnic, religious, national or political group in whole or in part.

Convictions have been handed down in the tribunals for Rwanda and Yugoslavia. This is the first time that a Middle Eastern ruler has been charged with it.

"It was during this campaign that thousands of women, children and men were buried in mass graves in many locations," Raid Juhi, the chief judge of the Iraqi High Tribunal's investigative court, said at a news conference.

Judge Juhi said it would be up to other judges to decide when the genocide trial against Mr. Hussein would start, and whether it would overlap with the Dujail case. Defense lawyers must be given 45 days to review the case files.

The court defines the bloody Anfal campaign, whose name means "the spoils" from a favorite Koranic verse of Mr. Hussein's, as eight military operations in 1988 in the mountainous Kurdish homeland of northern Iraq. Families who escaped death squads or were allowed to live were forced to relocate into the hinterlands or in neighboring countries.

DOJ_NMG_0025303

The Kurds, who make up a fifth of Iraq's people, tried to fight back, but Mr. Hussein used chemical weapons, including mustard gas and nerve agents.

Judge Juhi said the court had gathered enough evidence, like documents and mass graves, to prosecute the defendants in the deaths of at least 50,000 civilians. Kurdish officials and human rights advocates said the death toll had been much higher. They also said the Anfal campaign began years earlier, with other massacres and forced migrations.

The parties agree that at the very least, hundreds of thousands were arrested, tortured, relocated or killed.

All seven defendants are charged with crimes against humanity and war crimes related to an internal armed conflict. Mr. Hussein and one other defendant, Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as Chemical Ali, also have been charged with genocide, which legal experts say is difficult to prove. Mr. Majid was one of Mr. Hussein's most feared aides and oversaw the north during the Anfal campaign.

The other defendants include military commanders and senior intelligence officials.

"These charges should not be addressed to President Saddam," Khalil al-Dulaimi, Mr. Hussein's chief lawyer, said in a telephone interview. "They should be addressed to the American and British forces, because they are killing the Iraqi people and using weapons of mass destruction against the Iraqi people."

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd who for years led militiamen in northern Iraq, praised the court's decision to bring the Anfal charges, and promised that he and other government officials would not try to influence the trial.

It has taken years to assemble the evidence for the Anfal case. American officials say the Dujail crimes were selected as the first ones to try Mr. Hussein on because that case was not nearly as complicated as some others. It is also easier in the Dujail case to establish a clear chain of command between Mr. Hussein and those who carried out the executions, the officials say.

But they say that the Anfal massacres and the suppression of the Shiite uprising of 1991, which resulted in up to 150,000 deaths, are the two cases that go much more directly to the heart of Mr. Hussein's murderous rule, and could prove more cathartic for a vast majority of Iraqis.

The Dujail trial, expected to resume Wednesday with a cross-examination of Mr. Hussein, is entering its final phase, in which the court will review formal charges and hear arguments from the defense lawyers.

If a death sentence is handed down to Mr. Hussein, it is unclear whether the court would carry out the execution before other cases begin or are concluded. Any death sentence is automatically appealed.

There is no deadline for a decision, but if the appeal is denied, then the statutes of the tribunal mandate that the defendant must be executed within 30 days. Even the president's office, which is supposed to approve all death sentences, would be able to do little to delay that, said American legal experts advising the tribunal.

Many Iraqis who despise Mr. Hussein, especially Shiites and Kurds, have denounced the tribunal and called for Mr. Hussein's immediate execution, while some officials, like President Talabani, have said they want Mr. Hussein to stay alive long enough to face trial on all possible charges.

There are about a dozen investigations under way, all of which may result in individual sets of charges. The operations of the tribunal and its oversight of the Dujail case have been tumultuous, plagued by the assassinations of a judge and lawyers, political pressure from the Iraqi government and power struggles among the judges.

Questions have been raised about why the tribunal was never set up in an international venue, where security would not be as great a concern. American and Iraqi officials have struggled to endow the trial with legitimacy, but many foreign governments and human rights advocates have continued to view it as a show court.

The bringing of charges in Anfal brings a new set of problems, they say. If the trial were to proceed concurrent with the trial on the Dujail killings, then Mr. Hussein's defense team could be placed at an unfair disadvantage, unless Mr. Hussein hired more lawyers. The prosecutors and judges do not have that problem; a separate prosecutor and five-judge panel will oversee Anfal.

With Mr. Hussein needing to focus on final arguments in Dujail, a concern is "how he could do all that and then simultaneously prepare for a larger and more complex litigation — it goes to issues of fairness," said Marieke Wierda, a senior associate at the International Center for Transitional Justice, a New York-based advocacy group.

The other seven defendants in the Dujail trial are all different than those in the Anfal case.

DOJ_NMG_0025304

Kurdish officials often say that 180,000 people were killed in the Anfal campaign, but the actual number is closer to 80,000, according to Joost Hiltermann, the Middle East director of the International Crisis Group, an advocacy group.

The scope of the trial is generally limited to the eight military operations from February to August 1988, but the court will also examine evidence starting from March 1987, when Mr. Hussein chose Mr. Majid as the top official in northern Iraq.

In the years preceding Anfal, Kurds in Iraqi villages near Iran were forced to abandon their homes. Those areas were labeled "prohibited," and anyone living there was deemed to be an Iranian agent or saboteur. The Anfal campaign was undertaken to deal with those who had moved back or had not moved.

The other defendants in the Anfal case are Sultan Hashem Ahmed, the military commander of the campaign and the defense minister starting in 2001; Sabir Abdul-Aziz al-Duri, the director of military intelligence; Hussein Rashid al-Tikriti, the deputy of operations for the Iraqi forces; Tahir Tawfiq al-Ani, a governor of Mosul; and Farhan Mutlak al-Jubouri, the head of military intelligence in the north.

Iraq Tribunal May Charge Hussein With Genocide Of Kurds (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's tribunal announced today that it has completed an investigation into deposed leader Saddam Hussein's involvement in a series of 1988 military operations that killed more than 100,000 Kurds and could file formal charges as early as Wednesday.

Six aides, including Hussein's cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, also known as "Chemical Ali, would also stand trial for the Anfal campaign, which included mustard gas and nerve agent attacks against civilian populations.

The former leader's ongoing Dujayl case, involving a separate massacre of at least 148 Shiites, is scheduled to resume Wednesday with further testimony from Hussein.

It was unclear today when the Anfal trial might begin, when the Dujayl trial would end, and whether the two cases could be tried contemporaneously.

Iraqi officials said they had reviewed an array of documents from Hussein's Baathist Party and thousands of witness statements in preparation for the Anfal trial. Investigators also exhumed mass graves and tested corpses for traces of banned chemical agents.

The Anfal campaign involved military operations where 5,000 people died. Civilians comprised the bulk of the campaign's casualties, leading some legal experts to push for genocide prosecutions against former Baathist regime leaders.

News of the impending trial overshadowed Iraqi leaders' struggle to form a government, nearly two months after final election results were posted.

Negotiators recessed from formal discussions today, though leaders of Iraq's leading Shiite alliance met behind closed doors to discuss whether to replace Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari.

Kurds, Sunni Arabs and Shiite parties within Jafari's own coalition claim he has been too partisan and ineffective to be granted another term, but Jafari's supporters showed no sign today that he would willingly relinquish his post.

Western and Iraqi officials have repeatedly warned that the delay has caused a dangerous leadership vacuum that has allowed violence to spread.

Today, a parked car exploded near a used car lot in western Baghdad, killing 10 people and injuring 28.

In another Baghdad incident, two Iraqi employees at the United Arab Emirates Embassy were killed in a drive-by shooting.

In Basra, gunmen shot to death Sheik Nawaf Ahmed Aqrab, a local leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab political organization, as he left his house. He is the second prominent Sunni Arab leader to be killed in the last three days.

Saddam Charged With Kurdish Genocide (WT/AP)

By Sameer N. Yacoub, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025305

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi authorities charged Saddam Hussein with genocide yesterday, accusing him of trying to exterminate the Kurds in a 1980s campaign that killed an estimated 100,000 -- the first move to prosecute him for the human rights violations that the U.S. cited to justify its invasion.

The former Iraqi president returns to court today in his current six-month-old trial, facing the death sentence if convicted in the killings of more than 140 Shi'ites.

But that case involves a relatively small number of victims, and the scope of the accusation pales in comparison to the crackdown against the Kurds or the suppression of the Shi'ite uprising in southern Iraq in 1991.

Investigative judge Raid Juhi told reporters that he submitted the new case against Saddam and six co-defendants to the Iraqi High Tribunal -- a legal step that is the equivalent of an indictment under Iraqi law.

His move paves the way for a second trial, which could begin any time after 45 days. Mr. Juhi said charges also include crimes against humanity.

Legal analysts said the decision to accuse Saddam of genocide has been questioned because the charge is difficult to prove. An international convention after the Nazi Holocaust during World War II defined genocide as an effort "to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group."

The latest charges involve Saddam's reported role in Operation Anfal, the 1988 military campaign launched in the final months of the war with Iran to crush independence-minded Kurdish militias and clear Kurds from the sensitive Iranian border area of northern Iraq.

Saddam had accused Kurdish militias of ties to Iran. Thousands of Kurdish villages were razed, and their inhabitants either killed or displaced.

A memo released by the tribunal said the Anfal campaign included "savage military attacks on civilians," including "the use of mustard gas and nerve agents ... to kill and maim rural villagers and to drive them out of their homes."

The operations against the Kurds included the March 1988 gas attack on the village of Halabja in which 5,000 people, including women and children, died. However, Mr. Juhi said that the Halabja attack would be prosecuted separately and was not considered part of the charges filed yesterday.

Others accused in the Anfal case include Saddam's cousin, Ali Hassan al-Majid, or "Chemical Ali"; former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim Ahmad; former intelligence chief Sabir Abdul Aziz Al-Douri; former Republican Guard commander Hussein al-Tikriti; former Nineveh provincial Gov. Taher Tafwiq al-Ani; and former top military commander Farhan Mutlaq al-Jubouri.

Saddam and seven others have been on trial since Oct. 19 on charges in the deaths of Shi'ite Muslimsafter a 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

The Dujail trial was the first of what Iraqi authorities say could be up to a dozen proceedings. Saddam could face death by hanging if convicted in the Dujail case. But President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, said he doubted any sentence would be carried out until all trials were complete -- a process likely to take years.

Court Moves To Try Hussein In Massacre Of Kurds (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 4 -- A special criminal court has finished gathering evidence on the massacre of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, a judge said Tuesday, clearing the way for a second trial for former president Saddam Hussein.

Investigative judge Raeed Juhi said he had referred the case against Hussein and six co-defendants to the Iraqi High Tribunal, the rough equivalent of submitting formal charges.

All of the defendants will be charged with crimes against humanity. In addition, Hussein and Ali Hassan al-Majeed, a former general and Baath Party official nicknamed "Chemical Ali" for ordering the use of mustard gas and nerve agents against the Kurds, will be prosecuted for genocide.

DOJ_NMG_0025306

International human rights groups have estimated that more than 100,000 people were killed in 1987 and 1988 as part of an Iraqi government operation known as the Anfal campaign. Kurdish villages were systematically razed and survivors shipped off to squalid internment camps.

"Thousands of women, children and men were buried in mass graves," Juhi said. "We have testimony from more than 1,000 witnesses."

After the new charges were announced, Kurdish demonstrators took to the streets of the northern city of Kirkuk, ululating, waving Kurdish flags and chanting slogans against Hussein and Majeed.

"I was a child at the time when they took the men who we discovered were later executed," said Shwan Mahmoud Fattah, who said he lived near the Kurdish capital of Irbil during the Anfal campaign. "The day we waited for -- to see the killers of our families stand before justice -- has come."

Baheeja Abbas Barazanchi, 55, said, his son was killed after being accused of fighting with the pesh merga , a Kurdish militia that fought Hussein's forces. "This is God's justice," he said.

Hussein's current trial -- stemming from the massacre of nearly 150 residents of Dujail, north of Baghdad -- has entered what Juhi called the "final stage" and is set to resume Wednesday with the former leader's cross-examination. Hussein and seven co-defendants are charged in that case.

It is unclear when any new trial would begin. The case file has not yet been presented to the defense team, a U.S. official close to the court said Tuesday. Under Iraqi law, defense attorneys are allowed at least 45 days to review the results of the investigation before a trial can begin.

Hussein faces the death penalty in both the Dujail and Anfal cases. Several other cases against him are also still in the investigative phase, including that of the brutal suppression of a 1991 Shiite uprising in southern Iraq.

Some Iraqi politicians have expressed concern that Hussein could be convicted and hanged for the Dujail crimes before the other cases against him are heard. Justice Minister Abdul Hussein Shandal Issa said in an interview that the court might delay handing down any sentences until all trials are completed. Once a sentence is issued and a final appeal is finished, the punishment must be carried out within 30 days.

The new charges came as Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi became the highest-ranking Shiite leader to call on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to withdraw as the bloc's nominee for the job in the new government. Abdul Mahdi's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq has said Jafari, leader of the Dawa party, can no longer count on its support. Abdul Mahdi, who made his comments in a BBC television interview, lost to Jafari by one vote in the nomination battle a month ago and is considered the most likely replacement.

Jafari has thus far said he will not step aside. He is also opposed by Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties, whose participation is needed for Iraq to form a fully representative government.

In Washington, President Bush said that "one way to help bring confidence to the Iraqi people . . . is for there to be unity government that steps up and says, 'I'm willing to lead.' "

Bush said he dispatched Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Baghdad earlier this week with the message "that the people of Iraq have voted and now it's time for the elected leaders to stand up and do their job."

In Baghdad on Tuesday, at least 10 people were killed in a series of bombings and small-arms attacks, including five policemen who died in a car bombing near the northeastern neighborhood of Sadr City.

The U.S. military reported that a Marine listed as missing in a vehicle crash during a flash flood Sunday in western Iraq had drowned in the accident, which claimed five other lives. Two more service members are still unaccounted for.

And booksellers became the latest victims of insurgent violence, as a 30-year-old shop in the western part of the capital was either bombed or set ablaze late Monday night after several local shops were warned to stop selling newspapers.

"I think they will start targeting the bookshops now after they targeted the barbers and the CD shops before," said Thair Abdul Qadir, a regular customer at Khalid bookshop in the Rabi Street neighborhood.

Saddam Genocide Charge Hard To Prove (AP)

By Anthony Deutsch

DOJ_NMG_0025307

AP, April 4, 2006

Saddam Hussein on Tuesday joined a growing number of former leaders accused of the worst crime known to man: genocide. Defined as the intent to destroy an ethnic group in part or in whole, experts say it is the toughest war crime to prove.

An Iraqi indictment accused the ousted president of trying to exterminate the Kurds in northern Iraq in a 1980s campaign known as Operation Anfal that killed an estimated 100,000.

Michael Scharf, director of the Frederick K. Cox International Law Center at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, said the genocide case against Saddam won't be easy to prove "despite the large number of Kurdish victims (reportedly more than 100,000)."

Scharf said a number of issues could undermine the case including the sparing of Kurdish villagers, the killing of non-Kurds and potentially legitimate military goals and economic aims.

The Anfal case is the second indictment against Saddam, who has been on trial with seven co-defendants since Oct. 19 for the massacre of more than 140 Shiites following a 1982 assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail.

U.N. tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, applying the international convention against genocide adopted after the Holocaust, have filed genocide charges against at least 49 individuals. Slightly under half of those were convicted, while a few are still awaiting trial.

Most recently, Serbian leader Slobodan Milosevic died March 11 while on trial for the massacre of at least 8,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica in July 1995 — an attack that constituted genocide under the strict definition in international law.

The most difficult aspect to set out in a courtroom is intent and a premeditated plan and proving genocide in Bosnia has been a daunting task. Seven of the 23 people indicted have been acquitted and just one man — Gen. Radislav Krstic — was convicted by the Yugoslav tribunal and is serving a 35-year sentence for the worst violence on European soil in 50 years.

The Rwanda tribunal, which prosecutes those accused in the 1994 genocide of at least 500,000 Tutsis and moderate Hutus, has convicted 23 people and acquitted just three. Former Prime Minister Jean Kambanda pleaded guilty and is serving a life sentence with several of his government ministers.

That tribunal set a number of important legal precedents, including the first conviction based on the 1948 Genocide Convention. It also defined the crime of rape and found that rape and sexual violence may constitute genocide if the crimes are committed "with the intent to destroy a particular group targeted as such."

The latest charges involve Saddam's alleged role in Operation Anfal, which was launched in the final months of the 1980-1988 war with Iran to crush independence-minded Kurdish militias and clear Kurds from the sensitive Iranian border area.

The three-phase military campaign included the March 16, 1988, gas attack on the village of Halabja that killed 5,000. But Investigative judge Raid Juhi said Saddam will be tried separately for that attack.

The Iraqi tribunal will have the support of evidence from an earlier genocide trial that implicated Saddam.

In December, a Dutch court sentenced chemicals merchant Frans van Anraat to 15 years in prison for selling Saddam's regime the chemicals used against the Kurds. The ruling, the first ever dealing with Halabja and chemical attacks on seven other villages, concluded that the killing constituted genocide.

It had no jurisdiction to try Saddam, but prosecutors named Saddam and his cousin, Ali Hassan Majid, or "Chemical Ali," as co-conspirators.

Dutch prosecutors said the Iraqi military left an estimated 182,000 Kurds dead and hundreds of thousands more in detention camps.

Moscow Eyes Lost Oil Contract In Iraq (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Russia's largest oil company, Lukoil, is looking to the formation of a new Iraqi government as an opportunity to deal itself back into that country's huge West Qurna oil field, regaining a lucrative contract it lost in December 2002 as coalition forces were building up for the 2003 invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0025308

Iraq's foreign ministry, seeking Moscow's help with some troublesome neighbors, has noted that Russian companies such as Lukoil understand Iraq's oil industry and environment because of their long history in the country.

"We hope the formation of a new government in Iraq will allow us in 2006 to start negotiations on recovering West Qurna," Andrei Kuzyaev, president of Lukoil Overseas, said at a conference in London in February.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari asked for Russian help in November to end interference in its internal affairs from Syria and Iran, and has said that Lukoil offers Iraq needed technological and financial capabilities.

Lukoil and Saddam Hussein's government in 1997 signed the $3.7 billion development and production contract for the giant West Qurna field, one of Iraq's largest with an estimated 11 billion to 15 billion barrels located in North Rumaila, west of Basra.

The Iraqis abruptly canceled the contract in December 2002, charging, not without merit, that Lukoil had failed to honor a provision requiring that it spend at least $200 million on the field within the first three years of the contract.

However, the energy newsletter Middle East Economic Survey reported at the time that the Iraqis were angry because Lukoil executives were hedging their bets on the expected U.S. invasion, even as Moscow was working at the United Nations to head off the attack.

Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz was quoted in Canada's National Post on Dec. 17, 2002, saying, "Lukoil went to Washington to get assurances that their contract will be implemented after the removal of the Iraqi regime. ... Such conduct cannot be accepted."

Despite losing the contract, Lukoil worked at maintaining good relations with Iraqi administrations that succeeded Saddam.

During the summer of 2004, it gave Iraq millions of dollars in humanitarian aid and provided training for Iraqi oil specialists at its facilities in Western Siberia and Volgograd, according to the Energy Information Administration, a department of the U.S. Department of Energy.

Lukoil also pledged to train 150 Iraqi specialists annually over five years at its Russian facilities.

Such aid is a "starting point for Russian companies to begin implementation of oil projects in Iraq," Lukoil President Vagit Alekperov said in September.

Now, with a permanent government to be established in Baghdad, Lukoil has reason to hope for the best.

The Iraqi oil ministry announced in June that an inter-ministerial committee would be set up to review oil contracts signed under the Saddam regime, and that it would renegotiate existing oil-development contracts with France's Total as well as Russian and Chinese energy firms.

The newly elected parliament, meanwhile, is expected to create a petroleum-investment law in line with the new constitution once a government is in place.

"The process of negotiation is a joint process between the government and the provinces, but the ownership of the oil is for the Iraqi people," Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi, who has served as oil minister since December, told Platts, an industry publication.

Lukoil may think its prospects are improved by the participation of U.S.-based ConocoPhillips, which now holds a 17 percent stake in the Russian company and has announced plans to increase its stake to 20 percent. However, U.S. officials say the decision will be made by the Iraqis, not the Americans.

"We're not involved in this decision-making," a State Department official said. "Oil policy and decision-making regarding Iraqi oil assets are firmly under the control of the Iraqi government."

Jamal Qureshi, lead analyst at the Washington-based energy consulting firm PFC Energy, noted that the United States does have advisers at the oil ministry who assist Iraq in its decision making.

"Who will have authority to negotiate these contracts will largely depend on how centralized the government will be," he said. "But with Iraq on the verge of civil war, the prospects are not good. There is a need for a more secure environment."

Insurgents have attacked pipelines and other oil installations nearly 300 times since 2003. Of those, 95 took place last year.

A Marine's Mother (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0025309

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Last August, Danielette James, 58, a federal custodian who cleans congressional offices five nights a week, unsuccessfully pleaded with her bosses for time off to welcome home her son, a Marine who was returning to Camp Lejeune, N.C., after seven months in Iraq.

In the end, James, unable to draw on the 172 hours of vacation time she had amassed, had to wait until a weekend for a two-day visit to North Carolina. (Her bosses at the Architect of the Capitol's office told The Washington Post at the time they had tried to meet her request.)

Over the weekend, the mother of six learned that her son, Eric McIntire, 27, had been killed by a roadside bomb near Baghdad.

McIntire, a sergeant who served nearly 10 years in the Marines, had returned to Iraq in early March. He was traveling in a Humvee with other members of his platoon on Sunday when a bomb exploded, killing him and several other men, James said.

A military chaplain broke the news Sunday afternoon to McIntire's wife of five years, Cynthia McIntire, who called James. Someone in uniform also visited James at her Woodbridge home that day.

"I was so crazy. I was crying so much. I went outside screaming, and my neighbor came running," James said.

McIntire was generous and quiet, his mother said, the sort of person who always gave money to friends in need and would talk to homeless people on the street. Before he lost his life in a war zone, the military had saved it.

"When he was young, he was into drinking and smoking," James said. "And then he said, 'Oh, no, I'm trying to mess my life up. Let me stop this.' And he stopped. And he finished high school, and then he joined the Marines. Since he joined the Marines, he has been straight. He has been so good. He is nice to his wife, he takes good care of her."

James last saw her son at Christmas. She last talked to him a few days before he returned to Iraq in early March. Before, he had wanted to go to Iraq because all of his friends were there, James said. This time he was reluctant, she said.

James stayed home from work yesterday and Monday to grieve; she says she has been asked to bring in a copy of her son's obituary. Burial will be at Arlington National Cemetery on Tuesday.

Walter Reed's World Of Hurt, Hope (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Solomon Montgomery wakes up early on workdays. Hours before dawn, the first thing he does is pray.

He prays for the soldiers he will try to help that day, whose bodies were ravaged during attacks in Iraq. He prays that their families find comfort and courage. And with no end to the bloodshed in sight, he asks God for support. "Lord," he says, "give me the strength to do my job."

At 7 a.m., he reports for duty at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. The war remains ubiquitous in the operating rooms, some of which are set aside for the returning wounded, and on the wards, where amputees begin coming to terms with their new realities. Montgomery, a physical therapy assistant with the bulk of a former defensive end, works in a ball- and mat-filled space where, hour after hour, he challenges and cheers on brain-injured soldiers not much older than his own teenager.

So many have arrived in the past three years -- so many continue to arrive -- that they have transformed the hospital's routine. The staff has been redeployed, programs created, a special military company activated just for the injured. "This has become our normal," a nurse explains. But the cumulative effect of nearly 4,900 patients, including 1,458 battle casualties, has done more than change the institution. It has deeply affected the hundreds of doctors, nurses and therapists who work there -- who have been inspired by the resiliency and motivation of the individuals in their care, yet shaken and exhausted by the magnitude of loss.

Since the first soldier was admitted March 28, 2003, nine days after the invasion of Iraq, Walter Reed has confronted damage of daunting proportion: limbs blown off, guts blown open, brains devastated by piercing shrapnel or by concussive explosions, or maybe all that and more. The youth of the wounded elicits sadness, even tears. The veteran staff members look at these patients and see their sons and daughters. Their younger counterparts see siblings, friends.

DOJ_NMG_0025310

"That's always my worst nightmare, that I'm going to take care of someone I know," says Capt. Matthew Hueman, a 31-year-old surgical resident whose West Point class has suffered casualties in the war.

Six thousand miles from the actual mortar fire, grenades and roadside bombs, it amounts to a different kind of combat fatigue.

At the start, they expected that the transports of casualties would taper off quickly. But three times a week, the white buses from Andrews Air Force Base still turn off Georgia Avenue NW through the hospital's main gate. They pull slowly up the looping drive to where a double line of gurneys and a small company of gown-clad escorts wait, and then each bus's back door swings open, revealing the litters of patients. Some soldiers are only 48 hours off the battlefield. The most critically injured are unloaded with so much medical equipment they are scarcely visible beneath it.

A pause to lower a litter, convey charts and untangle tubes, and then the new arrival is whisked inside, under the Walter Reed banner proclaiming "We provide warrior care" and on to a triage room.

That pause is all Michael Wagner needs to say, "Welcome home."

Over the past 2 1/2 years, the chief of the hospital's Medical Family Assistance Center estimates that he has greeted hundreds of patients, as well as thousands of family members. His first weeks, he struggled to find the right words. "This guy's missing a leg. What do I say to him?" he wondered. Until he understood: "They're not legs, they're not arms. They're human beings."

These days, the psychologist talks to spouses and parents with a gentle bluntness.

"How you doing?" he asks.

"Fine," they invariably say.

"How you doing?" he asks a second time.

"Fine," they repeat.

"Baloney," he says.

At which point family members usually cry. "You have to permit them to feel their hurt," he says.

Wagner, 56, is a retired Army colonel who joined up during the Vietnam War. After the 2001 terrorist attacks, he tried to volunteer anew, ultimately connecting with the command at Walter Reed and moving from Arizona to run interference for soldiers' families. At the assistance center -- established in response to the casualties' protracted presence -- he has been asked to secure everything from a massage to mortgage money. When all guest accommodations on post are filled, he persuades local hotels to provide rooms at no charge. "I need you to be a good American here," he tells hotel managers.

Still, 12-hour days consumed with strangers' needs are draining. Last fall, he finally realized how tired he was, "tired of seeing the wounded come in, young men and women in the prime of their lives, coming back ripped apart. . . . It was overload, burnout, whatever you want to call it."

The stress, he says, "wears on everybody in this hospital."

Wagner has learned how to take time off, how to get on his Harley and ride out of the city, into rural stretches of Maryland. He's reached a different place, not necessarily numb to the pain around him but able to put it in a broader context. "This is our normal," he says. "Our mission."

When he leaves the hospital grounds, which will receive soldiers until Walter Reed moves to Bethesda in several years, he finds himself looking for people with missing limbs. Their absence seems strange.

Her parents back in Washington state worry, but they don't press her for details. "How's life on the ward?" her mother will say, vaguely enough.

"We've got some complicated guys on the floor right now," Clarisa Nichols answers. She does not elaborate.

She is 24, and the hospital is her first duty station out of nursing school. She is assigned to Ward 57, the busy orthopedics unit once populated by older men and women recuperating from knee surgeries or hip replacements. In more than two years, 1st Lt. Nichols has seen virtually no such patients.

What she has seen are soldiers around her age, with massive pin-and-bolt armatures securing fractured bones or thick dressings covering raw stumps. They may be brought onto the floor with desert sand in their hair or spilling from their gear, and suddenly Iraq seems even closer. Nichols could be sent with scant notice to a combat support hospital there. Overseas duty is a matter of when, not if.

DOJ_NMG_0025311

She will be ready. Her responsibilities at Walter Reed have made sure of that. At first, she questioned whether she would be able to handle them -- not so much emotionally as technically. Would she have the skills to do the job? She found herself tested on both fronts, staggered initially by the influx of casualties and challenged by their worst injuries.

"Sometimes," she says, "I'll go back to our break room and take a couple deep breaths. I'll think, 'Is there anything else I can possibly do?' "

Sometimes there is not. No more medicine she can offer, no relief other than a repositioned pillow or appendage. A patient Nichols will never forget, a soldier from the foreign forces assisting the United States in the fighting, writhed for hours one night. He spoke no English and would look at her uncomprehendingly. "There was no way I could reassure him," she says. "It was just one of those times; I sat down and held his hand. I felt helpless."

She balances that memory with the moments when patients took their beginning steps on a new prosthesis or returned with a smile and big hug after discharge. The nurses keep a bound book listing all the patients on the unit from December 2003, and on a slower shift, they'll get nostalgic looking through the pages. All told, the hospital has treated 323 amputees from Iraq and Afghanistan.

It also has seen the deaths of 11 service members.

"I can't believe how long it's been happening," Nichols reflects one afternoon. She has a younger brother in the Navy and a younger sister in the Army. "It's still hard to see an 18-year-old come in. Every so often, you wonder when it's going to end."

The number of battle casualties at Walter Reed fell to 408 during the third year of Operation Iraqi Freedom, compared with the more than 520 in each of the previous years. The trauma that sent them there -- frequently so extensive that the military coined the term "polytrauma" -- did not diminish.

Few wounds now hold the same shock factor for the hospital's surgeons. Col. Craig Shriver, who heads the general surgery department, remembers the teams of residents who came to him in late 2003 after their overnight rotations in the OR. "Three months is enough," they told him.

Recent teams have reacted far differently, though their chief doubts they are any tougher. More likely, after hearing and reading accounts of the injuries, they simply have been better fortified. "Maybe they've come to expect it," he says. As they are deployed, these new doctors will take their training directly to the troops.

Shriver himself has more than two decades in the Army and two tours as a combat surgeon. At 47, he could retire tomorrow. The reason he stays: As long as the conflict drags on, and the buses from Andrews return with their damaged cargo, he feels an obligation "to finish the job."

The last several years at Walter Reed have been the most demanding of his career. They've also been among the most humbling and rewarding. He marvels at the soldiers' attitude, their gratitude, their perseverance.

"What this has taught me is, our youngest generation is magnificent," he says.

It has renewed his faith in America.

By 10:40 in the morning, Solomon Montgomery is halfway through a set of balance exercises with 20-year-old Pfc. Daniel Perry of Somers, Conn.

"Move the top of your body," he says. "Give it a good stretch."

Bluish traces of shrapnel dot the left half of the soldier's pale face, betraying the blast that left him unconscious in an Iraqi bunker 27 days earlier. Perry met Montgomery when he was barely able to stand, unable to walk, incapable of following all but the simplest commands and angry and confused. He tried to kick the big guy, more than twice his size and age.

"Looks like this boy is going to be fun to work with," Montgomery responded cheerfully.

His PT unit focuses on those with traumatic brain injury. Before the war, it didn't exist. No need for it.

"I didn't realize what I was getting into," concedes Montgomery, a civilian employee who came to Walter Reed in 2000. During their time together, he has watched Perry make steady progress. Other patients have not. Two years ago, he was assigned a brain-injured soldier in his early twenties, a father of three whose youngest child had just been born. The man could neither hold nor see his baby: He had lost both arms and his eyesight.

DOJ_NMG_0025312

Montgomery drove home that afternoon and went to bed. He stayed home the next day. He couldn't go to work; he couldn't even get out of bed. The tragedy seemed too overwhelming.

He has since found deeper reservoirs of strength -- his church in Brandywine, his Bible study group, his high school daughter, who senses when to ask, "Daddy, is the war bothering you again?" The war has brought them closer. The war, in fact, "has helped me grow to be a better man."

He pauses. There is more.

"It's made me realize how precious life is," he says, "and the price you pay for freedom."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Witness Calls Cuts 'Redeployments' (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 5, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-A former Enron Corp. human resources supervisor testified Tuesday that people who moved from its struggling broadband venture were given opportunities to shift assignments, disputing earlier testimony that they were laid off.

Sarah Davis, testifying for a second day at the fraud and conspiracy trial of former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling and founder Kenneth Lay, said the March 2001 cuts at Enron Broadband Services were "redeployments" and not layoffs.

Kenneth Rice, who ran Enron's money-losing broadband venture, testified in February that Skilling told him to characterize layoffs at the unit in early 2001 as redeployment so some 250 employees would believe they would keep their jobs and Wall Street analysts who influenced the company's stock would remain bullish on the weakening venture.

Asked by Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher if Rice or anyone else at Enron told her the cutbacks were "a ruse to lay people off" or "some sort of disguised layoffs," Davis replied: "No. It was redeployment."

But under cross-examination, she said it wasn't part of her duties to keep up with the business reasons for any redeployments or layoffs.

At the time of the broadband cuts, Skilling told analysts the unit had "strong growth." Rice testified that in addition to the layoffs, the unit burned through $100 million per quarter and efforts to stream video content on a fledgling network or trade Internet bandwidth were faltering.

On Monday, Davis testified Enron's hiring statistics from January through October of 2001 illustrated the company was "working robustly to bring in new talent," according to Lay attorney Chip Lewis.

As a sign of its continuing growth, Davis said she processed more than 100 new hires each month through an orientation program.

Davis was preceded on the witness stand by a former trader who was offered a promotion to shift from the profitable wholesale operation at Enron to the struggling retail division it was absorbing in 2001.

Prosecutors have presented witnesses who testified the assimilation of the risk and trading portion of its retail energy division, Enron Energy Services, was made to improperly cover up millions of dollars in losses.

Rogers Herndon, one of five witnesses testifying Monday as Lay and Skilling began their defense, said that wasn't the message he received when asked to head up risk assessment at the retail unit.

"No one ever said to you the move was to avoid losses in EES?" Skilling attorney Randall Oppenheimer asked.

"That's correct," replied Herndon, who reached the level of vice president at Enron before it imploded into bankruptcy in December 2001.

"We were not to be a profit center," he said, recalling his conversation in April 2001 with former EES Chief Executive David Delainey.

Delainey, who pleaded guilty in 2003 to insider trading and testified earlier for the prosecution, told jurors that in March 2001 he reluctantly agreed to a Skilling-approved plan to move part of the failing retail unit into the wholesale division to hide $200 million in losses.

DOJ_NMG_0025313

Skilling and Lay insisted in public statements the move was made to increase efficiency and combine like trading functions. Both aim to testify.

Skilling's lead attorney Daniel Petrocelli told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake late Monday he expected the former Enron chief executive would take the stand as early as Wednesday. Lay also has said he is eager to tell his story to jurors.

The first defense witness was Joannie Williamson, who served as an assistant at various times to Skilling, Lay and former investor relations chief Mark Koenig, a key prosecution witness who pleaded guilty in August 2004 to aiding and abetting securities fraud.

Besides acknowledging his own guilt, Koenig in February also implicated Lay and Skilling in a string of falsehoods.

Asked by prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler if she thought he had lied on the stand, Williamson said, "I think he was doing what he needed to do.

"I feel like Mark was under quite a lot of pressure," she said.

"Did he tell you he was pressured?" Ruemmler asked.

"No, he did not," Williamson replied.

Also on the stand Monday were Scott Stoness and Diann Huddleson, both former EES analysts. Stoness said Enron didn't know until May whether EES would have high losses, which was intended to challenge Delainey's recollection of moving its trading function into the larger division two months earlier to hide losses.

Huddleson said EES wasn't in disarray as Delainey and other government witnesses have said.

Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy. Last week, Lake approved prosecutors' request to drop three counts against Skilling and one count against Lay to streamline their case.

AP Business Writer Kristen Hays contributed to this story.

Enron Defense Witness Testifies Skilling Didn't Favor Partnership (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON -- A former Enron Corp. executive testified that former President Jeffrey Skilling insisted that a controversial partnership run by the company's chief financial officer be treated the same as other bidders during the sale of an Enron subsidiary.

The defense witness's testimony is intended to show that the relationship between Enron and the partnership, known as LJM, was proper and at arm's length, as opposed to the conflict-laden relationship that prosecutors allege was used to manipulate the company's finances.

J. Mark Metts, who negotiated asset sales and acquisitions while at Enron, testified that Mr. Skilling never sought any favors for the LJM partnership amid the partnership's efforts to involve itself in a prospective asset sale that Mr. Metts was handling. LJM, a partnership set up and run by Andrew Fastow, Enron's former finance chief, is at the core of the government's conspiracy case. Prosecutors contend LJM was used improperly to hide losses from investors and to boost profits.

Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay are on trial in U.S. District Court here for alleged criminal conspiracy and fraud in connection with the collapse of the onetime energy titan. The defense began its case this week, and Mr. Skilling's eagerly awaited testimony could begin tomorrow.

Meanwhile, the lead defense attorney for Mr. Lay is hospitalized and could undergo surgery in the next few days to remove a blockage in his carotid artery. Houston attorney Michael Ramsey is undergoing tests at a local hospital. Yesterday, Mr. Lay's daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, an attorney on the defense team, said that Mr. Ramsey will be absent for an undetermined period, but is expected to return to court before the end of the trial.

Surgeons installed a coronary stent two weeks ago in the 66-year-old Mr. Ramsey. However, the contemplated artery surgery is unrelated to the installation of the stent, Ms. Vittor said. Yesterday, a spokeswoman said there were apparent problems with the stent that had sent him back to the hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0025314

Mr. Metts, who was head of corporate development at Enron, said that after he canceled a meeting between LJM and an Enron subsidiary that he was trying to sell, Mr. Fastow complained to Mr. Skilling in April 2001. In a meeting several days later, Mr. Skilling never asked him to favor LJM and was "frustrated" by Mr. Fastow's behavior, Mr. Metts testified. "He agreed with me the only way LJM participates in the process was for LJM to play by the same rules as everybody else," Mr. Metts said.

Under questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Metts acknowledged he was demoted and assigned to a position under Mr. Fastow just a month after the dispute with Mr. Fastow arose. He also said Enron agreed to pay LJM as much as $600,000 to serve as a backup bidder on the deal he was negotiating. The business wasn't sold to the original bidder or LJM, he said. The prosecution has focused on LJM-Enron deals that didn't involve other bidders.

Mr. Metts was one of several former Enron employees who challenged statements by prosecution witnesses who had testified there were efforts to hide bad news from investors and pump up profits by manipulating accounting rules. Among other things, the former employees said they believed efforts to reduce staff at Enron Broadband Services, a telecommunications unit, and to reduce Enron's financial stake in the troubled Dabhol Indian power project were legitimate and proper.

The prosecution contends that Mr. Skilling told investors that firings at the unit were a "redeployment" to conceal the unit's troubles, and that Messrs. Lay and Skilling knew Dabhol should have been written down in mid-and-late 2001, but improperly refused to reduce the carrying value to avoid a downgrade of Enron's credit rating.

At The Enron Trial, Skilling Then Vs. Skilling Now (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald And Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

As Jeffrey K. Skilling, Enron's former chief executive, moves from the defense table to the witness stand as soon as today, he will have to be prepared to confront his own past testimony.

At his trial in Houston, Mr. Skilling will be bound by the very words he spoke under oath in secret testimony given more than four years ago, at a time when the Enron criminal investigation had not yet begun.

The testimony, taken in December 2001 as part of an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission into the Enron debacle, serves as a road map to the defense Mr. Skilling will offer on the stand. It also points up some potential pitfalls he faces. A transcript of the testimony, which has not been made public, was obtained by The New York Times.

The transcript lays out not only what is sure to be the foundation of Mr. Skilling's own explanation for what went wrong at Enron, but also the words that could be used against him in cross-examination.

At the heart of Mr. Skilling's statements in his previous testimony was a simple refrain: Enron took every precaution; everything was legal; nothing was hidden; nothing was improper. But Mr. Skilling also advanced the argument that if anything illegal had occurred, he could not possibly have been on top of every transaction at Enron, simply because the company was too sprawling for any one person to control.

"Obviously, I couldn't see the whole company," Mr. Skilling testified when discussing his familiarity with the company's financial disclosures. "I mean, this was a gigantic company."

Some of Mr. Skilling's S.E.C. testimony appears to be in direct contradiction to statements made by prosecution witnesses in the nine weeks of the criminal trial so far. For example, at one point in the testimony, Mr. Skilling was asked by a government investigator whether Enron ever used reserves to help the company meet Wall Street's earnings expectations. Mr. Skilling flatly denied that, and went on to deny that any reserves existed for such a purpose.

Likewise, in Mr. Skilling's S.E.C. testimony, he denied that there were ever any last-minute dashes within Enron to meet quarterly earnings expectations from 1997, when he took on a top job at the company, to his departure in the summer of 2001.

"I don't think there was any time during that time period," he testified, "that by the end of the quarter we were concerned about the numbers."

But in the criminal trial, several witnesses, including Wesley H. Colwell, a former Enron accountant, testified that Enron used accounting reserves to lift the company's earnings in particular quarters for the purpose of meeting the projections of Wall Street analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0025315

Mr. Colwell and other witnesses portrayed last-minute efforts to meet — and in one instance, to beat — those projections, requiring what they described as manipulations involving a penny or two of earnings per share.

Mr. Colwell testified that in July 2000, for example, Enron improperly dipped into reserves to increase earnings by $14 million, or from 32 cents a share to 34 cents a share, a change driven simply by management's desire "to make 34 cents per share" that period.

During the trial, government witnesses also portrayed a particular credit reserve, called Schedule C, as something of a "cookie jar" of earnings that could be used to help improve the company's reported performance. The earnings used in Schedule C were the product of the California energy crisis in 2000, which brought huge profits to Enron and other energy trading firms.

In his earlier testimony, Mr. Skilling said that Schedule C was a proper accounting reserve, which had been put together by Enron not to bolster earnings, but because of concerns the company had that California utilities that owed the money would never be able to pay because of their own financial troubles.

"The loss from PG&E alone was, I think, $560 million," Mr. Skilling testified. "These were significant numbers and so we started to reserve for those just to make sure that we could cover them if something did happen."

In the course of his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling also addressed the company's use of special-purpose entities that resulted in the company's shifting debt off the books — one of the central issues in the Enron scandal.

Such entities are commonly used throughout corporate America for that purpose, but to meet the accounting standards, investors independent of the company must provide a set percentage of the capital.

The accounting for several such entities proved to be improper, and several former Enron officials have pleaded guilty to criminal charges related to them. The restatement of the company's financial statements after those problems were discovered played a significant role in its ultimate collapse into bankruptcy in late 2001.

In his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling said that he had no knowledge of any problems with the accounting for transactions involving the entities.

"I had absolutely no reason, given the process and the signoffs, to have any expectation that the accounting did not properly reflect what the transactions — the way the transactions were structured," Mr. Skilling told the investigators in 2001. Mr. Skilling also discussed two entities affiliated with Enron that have been the subject of frequent testimony during the government case. One is LJM2, an investment fund operated by Andrew S. Fastow, who was Enron's chief financial officer; the fund was used for transactions with Enron.

Another is the Raptors, four partnerships used to provide hedges for company investments. A hedge, traditionally, is used to offset potential losses, with the value of the hedge going up as the value of the investment goes down.

The Raptors involved special purpose entities, requiring an outside investor. Mr. Fastow provided that outside capital through LJM2, which he led as general partner, handling investments from financial institutions and wealthy individuals.

But the Enron transactions, according to prosecution witnesses, were highly improper because they relied on secret side deals protecting Mr. Fastow and LJM2 from losses and similar problems undermining the Raptors.

In his S.E.C. testimony, Mr. Skilling was not asked if LJM2 received widespread guarantees against loss from Enron, which would be illegal. But he denied the existence of any secret side agreement that would have protected the investment fund from making good on its financial commitments.

As for the Raptors themselves, Mr. Skilling professed to have little knowledge of their workings, but said he knew that the company's accountants and Arthur Andersen, its auditing firm, had signed off on the deals.

"I cannot describe Project Raptor to you," Mr. Skilling testified. "Arthur Andersen was totally on board. They'd look at the structure and the governance and all the rest of the stuff. They thought it was fine, and it looked like it was a good way to hedge some of these high-technology investments that we had made. So it was approved by the board. But I don't recall the mechanics of how it worked."

But Ben F. Glisan Jr., the former treasurer, testified in the trial that he listed "accounting scrutiny" as his chief concern when he presented a Raptor hedging transaction to the board's finance committee in May 2000. Mr. Skilling, according to Mr. Glisan, told the directors at the meeting that day that Raptor was not a deal he would recommend "except for the fact that it allowed him to circumvent the accounting rules."

DOJ_NMG_0025316

Mr. Skilling also portrayed himself in his S.E.C. testimony as something of a casual reader of Enron's financial statements, saying that he had placed his confidence in the company's financial controls to satisfy himself that the reporting was proper.

"I can't tell you I read them, you know, cover to cover," Mr. Skilling testified about the financial statements. "I felt by the time that process was completed that it was a fair and accurate presentation of what was going on in the company."

Key Defense Lawyer In Enron Trial Awaits More Surgery (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

2 Texas Attorneys Take Reins as Lay's Lead Counsel Is Hospitalized for Heart Blockage

HOUSTON, April 4 -- The lead lawyer for former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay has been hospitalized for more tests while he awaits surgery, a move that could put him out of commission for a significant portion of his client's defense against fraud charges.

Doctors at Houston's Methodist Hospital are evaluating Michael W. Ramsey, 66, for a new blockage in his carotid artery that doctors uncovered in tests Tuesday.

Last month, during a short break in the trial, Ramsey had a stent successfully implanted in a different artery to help correct shortness of breath and other symptoms he had since at least the third week of Lay and protege Jeffrey K. Skilling's trial.

Erin Fairchild, a spokeswoman for the hospital, said in an e-mail Tuesday that "blockage in the carotid artery is dangerous if left untreated because it can lead to stroke."

Elizabeth Vittor, Lay's daughter and a member of his legal defense team, called the carotid procedure doctors are contemplating "pretty significant surgery" and said it was unclear how long Ramsey's recovery would take. She added that the defense hoped Ramsey would be able to return quickly. In his absence, Dallas securities lawyer Bruce Collins and Houston appellate specialist George "Mac" Secrest take the reins for Lay.

Vittor said the defense did not anticipate requesting a delay in the trial "at this time."

Under current estimates, the case could go to the jury as early as the end of April.

Skilling is likely to appear on the witness stand Thursday, defense lawyers said. Lay, who was to be questioned by Ramsey, will testify sometime after Skilling is finished. Lay joked Tuesday that he expected Ramsey to return "in time to take full credit for the victory."

Also Tuesday, the second day of the defense case, several former Enron workers testified about a redeployment in the company's high-speed Internet unit, a power plant in Dabhol, India, and efforts to unload international assets.

Defense lawyers for Skilling and Lay attempted to show that government witnesses overstated troubles in each of those divisions. The defendants face multiple charges for making what prosecutors call overly optimistic statements to investors and employees about those topics in 2001.

Mark Metts, a lawyer who negotiated deals for Enron, testified Tuesday that experts inside and outside the company vetted important transactions. He also painted a negative portrait of former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, who he said screamed at him after he told Fastow that "he had to play by the same rules as anybody else."

The government contends that Skilling gave favors to secretive partnerships controlled by Fastow. But Metts told the jury that Skilling was "extremely supportive" when Metts contacted him to express concern about a "power play" by Fastow in 2001. Shortly thereafter, another Enron official sent out a memo explicitly stating that Fastow's partnerships would not be favored over other bidders, defense lawyer Mark Holscher argued.

On cross-examination, Assistant U.S. Attorney Sean M. Berkowitz pointed out that weeks after the incident, Metts was demoted and that Skilling made the decision that Metts would report to Fastow.

D.C. Was Cheated, SEC Says (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Firm Owes Funds For Charter Schools

DOJ_NMG_0025317

Federal securities regulators yesterday accused a Maryland firm of defrauding the District of millions in federal and local funds earmarked for D.C. charter schools, saying the firm used the cash to try to prop up two failing subsidiaries.

In a complaint filed in federal court, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission alleges that Geneva Capital Partners LLC and its owner, Eric M. Westbury of Silver Spring, obtained investments of more than $21 million from the District without telling D.C. officials that two of the city's advisers had a financial stake in Westbury's firms.

Westbury then used some of the cash to cover losses at his other companies, which together owe about $33 million to more than 2,000 small investors nationwide, the complaint says.

In addition, Geneva owes the District about $11 million. In a court hearing yesterday, SEC lawyers argued that the family of firms has insufficient assets to repay that and other debts.

"It's our view . . . that there's just not enough money for everyone to get their money back here," said Amy J. Greer, the SEC trial counsel handling the case. "We have a lot of companies all showing substantial losses. And I think it's unlikely that all of the investors, both the District and the [small investors], will be fully compensated."

Westbury did not return a call to his Bethesda office. His attorney, John M. Fedders, denied that Westbury is "a fraudster."

Westbury "has not engaged in fraud," Fedders said. "He is a man of high moral integrity, and high business ethics. I think there's an enormous misunderstanding here about some of the things that have gone on, and we dispute paragraph after paragraph of these SEC allegations."

U.S. District Judge Deborah K. Chasanow gave Fedders until April 26 to file his objections, and she set a hearing date for May 12. In the meantime, Chasanow barred Westbury from making payments to investors and ordered him to alert the court if any of them demands their money.

The order effectively prohibits Westbury from complying with the District's March 15 demand to return its remaining cash. However, the order also bars Westbury from giving the District's money to anyone else, said Daniel M. Hawke, associate district administrator for enforcement in the SEC's Philadelphia office.

District officials declined to discuss the case yesterday. But Deborah A. Gist, director of the D.C. State Education Office, which administers the charter school funds, issued a written statement saying her office "is aware that the SEC has concerns with Geneva Capital." The District "continues to deal with this issue seriously," she wrote, noting that the D.C. inspector general is also investigating.

So far, District officials have been unable to explain why they selected Geneva in 2003 to manage the charter school money, a combination of local and federal funds intended to help charter schools obtain bank loans to purchase, build and maintain facilities. Hawke and D.C. officials said mismanagement of the funds has not affected operations at any school.

The SEC complaint may shed some light on the selection process. Under the heading, "Additional Undisclosed Conflicts of Interest," the complaint accuses Westbury of failing to disclose to District officials that the financial manager of the charter school fund "had received a substantial loan" from one of Geneva's subsidiaries, SBM Certificate Co., "in connection with an unrelated commercial real estate project of his own."

In addition, the complaint says Westbury failed to tell D.C. officials that the general counsel for the charter school fund "was also an SBM board member.

"These two individuals were the very people on whom the District relied for advice and counsel relating to matters like its investments," the complaint says.

In court documents, the financial manager was identified as Timothy Webb and the general counsel as Marialice B. Williams. They were described as independent contractors hired by the city to help manage the charter school funds. Webb, in particular, was responsible for identifying financial institutions to handle the investments, documents show.

Webb and Williams have been partners in several business ventures, according to the businesses' Web sites.

Webb could not be located late yesterday. Williams, reached at her District home, called the allegations "100 percent incorrect with respect to me."

"No one's called me at all," she said. "From the SEC or anywhere else." She referred a reporter to her attorney, who declined to comment.

Staff writer Valerie Strauss and researcher Bobbye Pratt contributed to this report.

Why Sweat The Small Stuff? (WSJ)

By Richard C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission recently announced a roundtable to discuss Section 404 of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, which requires an annual assessment by public companies of their internal controls over financial reporting. Critics question whether its benefits outweigh its costs, which have been much higher than originally estimated; because of these concerns, an SEC advisory committee recently proposed total or partial exemptions from Section 404 for small companies (with market capitalizations less than $787 million). However, some commentators have strongly opposed such exemptions, since these small companies constitute 80% of all publicly listed firms and are the ones most susceptible to financial frauds.

I take a middle ground: The current rules on assessing internal controls for all public companies should be revised, greatly reducing the costs of these assessments while preserving most of their benefits. Specifically, the management of every public company would be required to publish an annual assessment of the company's internal controls, attested to by the company's auditors. But such assessments would be focused on the company's internal controls over material information contained in the company's financial reports to the SEC.

* * *

The SEC has adopted two different requirements for internal controls. First, it has defined "internal control structure and procedures . . . for financial reporting" under Section 404 to include more items of information with more details than those ordinarily included in the financial reports of public companies. In the commission's view, internal controls must provide reasonable assurance not only that material information in the company's financial statements is accurate, but also "that receipts and expenditures of the company are being made only in accordance with authorization of management and directors of the company." By unlinking "internal controls" from "financial reporting" in Section 404, the SEC encourages management and auditors to scrutinize detailed procedures for controlling ordinary expenditures -- e.g., reimbursing travel expenses and handling petty cash -- even in cases where they are clearly immaterial to the company's financial reports.

Second, the SEC requires management to assess a public company's "disclosure controls" -- defined as "controls and other procedures . . . designed to ensure that information required to be disclosed by the issuer in the reports it files" with the commission "is recorded, processed, summarized and reported" in a timely manner. This rule on "disclosure controls" is very confusing since it overlaps with the rule on "internal controls." The SEC should end this confusion by combining both into one rule on "internal controls" over "financial reporting," which would cover the accuracy and timeliness of "material" information submitted by public companies in their financial reports to the commission.

The concept of "materiality" is traditionally judged by whether information is significant to a company's overall financial situation. However, a much broader concept of "materiality" is applied to Section 404 by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB), which oversees all auditors of public companies. According to its Auditing Standard No. 2, an auditor must apply materiality "in an audit of internal controls over financial reporting at both the financial-statement level and at the individual-balance level" (emphasis added). This extension of materiality to individual balances tends to lead management and auditors to incur tremendous expense by examining controls over balances that are not financially significant for the company as a whole -- for example, reserve balances in a minor subsidiary, or inventory balances in a small factory.

The PCAOB's unduly expansive definition of materiality is exacerbated by its unduly expansive standard for assessing the likelihood of a problem occurring. According to Auditing Standard No. 2, "reasonable assurance" that internal controls are effective means that there is only a "remote likelihood that material misstatements will not be prevented or detected on a timely basis." This standard of "a remote likelihood" can easily lead to auditor concerns about internal controls based on hypothetical situations that have not occurred and are not very likely to occur. A more appropriate standard for determining that internal controls are effective would be that a problem is "unlikely to actually happen."

Suppose one employee signature is required for customer refunds under $100 and two signatures above that amount. The auditors may maintain that mishandling of small customer refunds is not "remote" because the one employee signing could, in theory, conspire with the customer to defraud the company. Yet the mishandling of small customer refunds is "unlikely to actually happen" because the one employee knows that his or her signature can easily be traced if any problem becomes evident on customer refunds.

DOJ_NMG_0025319

Furthermore, Auditing Standard No. 2 states categorically: "There is no difference in the level of work performed" by the auditors when attesting to management's assessment of the company's internal controls, versus when the auditors express an opinion directly on the effectiveness of the company's internal controls. This approach leads to a high degree of redundant work: Management must test all of the company's internal controls; and the auditors can rely in part on management's testing, but only for less important areas of internal controls. A more efficient approach would be for the auditors to evaluate the design of the control systems, review the testing plan of management, and test a reasonable sample of internal controls.

In formulating their current rules, the PCAOB and the SEC were heavily influenced by an internal controls framework established in 1992 by COSO (a committee of sponsoring audit organizations). While its framework is excellent for many purposes, even the regulators recognize that, because it covers compliance with all laws and effectiveness of corporate operations, it is too broad for Section 404. COSO is now developing for small companies a control framework limited to financial reporting -- which should be extended to all public companies.

In short, instead of exempting small companies from Section 404, the SEC and the PCAOB should apply to all public companies narrower rules on internal controls. Management's assessment of internal controls should focus on the material information contained in the company's reports to the SEC, and the auditors should attest to management's assessment by reviewing its processes and sample testing. Both should apply the traditional concept of materiality -- financial significance relative to the whole company. In this manner, Section 404 will be very helpful in preventing material misstatements in a company's reports to the SEC, but at a much lower cost.

Mr. Pozen is chairman of MFS Investment Management.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Child Porn Victim Tells House Panel The Justice Department Is Moving Too Slowly On Pedophiles (AP)

By LAURIE KELLMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told a House panel Tuesday that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year.

"I believed that the government would protect the children being abused. I believed they would act quickly," Berry, now 19, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee. "I was wrong."

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra disputed that, citing a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases nationally over the past decade. The unit investigating Berry's case, which Sierra could not discuss, has seen its workload increase 450 percent in the last four years.

"One of law enforcement's highest priorities is the protection of innocent children from sexual predators who lurk on the Internet," Sierra said.

The same committee will hear from the Justice Department, among other federal agencies, on Thursday.

Berry's story of a lonely teenager who sought friends on the Internet but instead grew rich attracting pedophiles was reported in December by the New York Times after a six-month investigation. Its author, Kurt Eichenwald, told the Energy and Commerce Committee on Tuesday that Berry is the first such teenage witness known to turn over such a vast cache of evidence to the government.

But even Berry's catalog of his clients' names, credit card numbers and other details has resulted in only one arrest, he and Eichenwald said.

DOJ_NMG_0025320

"From the time that the government was notified of Justin's information to the point where the children in direct danger were saved, more than 50 days passed," Eichenwald told the panel. "Some people identified as perpetrators literally could not get themselves arrested if they tried."

Berry embarked on his sordid journey into the world of pedophelia and drugs when at 13, living in Bakersfield, Calif., he acquired a Web camera as part of a deal with an Internet service provider. A lonely kid of a divorced family without many friends, Berry hoped to use the device to make friends his own age.

Instead, a pedophile sent him an instant message within minutes of Berry's image landing on a Web site called Spotlife.com. More followed; then men worked to earn his trust.

"At 13, I believed these people were my friends," Berry told the panel. "They were kind. They complimented me. They wanted to know about my day."

A few weeks later, he said, "everything changed" when one man proposed to pay Berry $50 to take off his shirt for a few minutes in front of the Web cam. The man helped Berry set up an account with Paypal, an online money payment system.

Last June, Eichenwald approached Berry for a story he was doing on Internet pornography. Berry agreed to help with the story and tell law enforcement what he knew about other children being exploited.

But the Justice Department and other massive federal agencies were slow to respond, Berry and Eichenwald told the panel. Berry said he has feared for his life.

DHS Spokesman Is Accused Of Soliciting Teen Online (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security was arrested last night on charges that he used the Internet to seduce an undercover Florida sheriff's detective who he thought was a 14-year-old girl, the Polk County Sheriff's Office said.

Brian J. Doyle, 55, was arrested at his Silver Spring home at 7:45 p.m. and charged with seven counts of using a computer to seduce a child and 16 counts of transmitting harmful materials to a minor, according to a sheriff's office statement.

Agents with the department's Inspector General's Office, the U.S. Secret Service, the Montgomery County police and the Polk County Sheriff's Office served a search warrant and seized his home computer and other materials, the statement said.

Doyle was online at the time awaiting what he thought was a nude image of a girl who had lymphoma, Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd said in an interview with Fox News' "On the Record With Greta Van Susteren." "We wanted to make sure he was using that computer and talking to detectives at the time of the arrest," Judd said.

In his initial communication last month, Doyle told an undercover computer-crimes detective who he was and that he worked for the Department of Homeland Security, later disclosing numbers for his office phone and government-issued cellphone and using those lines, the sheriff's office said.

"If he would provide that kind of information to include a photograph of himself with his identification tags, who else may he be talking to around the world who he thinks to be a 14-year-old girl?" Judd said on CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360."

Attempts to reach Doyle, who was booked into the Montgomery County jail on the Polk County charges, on his office and cellphone numbers and by his official e-mail were unsuccessful.

He was a TSA spokesman before becoming deputy press secretary last year to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Chertoff press secretary Russ Knocke declined to comment on the case beyond releasing a written statement, saying, "We take these allegations very seriously and we will cooperate fully with this ongoing investigation."

Judd said Doyle confessed and waived extradition to Polk County.

According to the sheriff's office, Doyle initiated a sexually explicit conversation with the detective on March 12 in response to an Internet profile of a 14-year-old girl.

DOJ_NMG_0025321

Doyle allegedly sent pornographic movie clips, non-pornographic photos of himself and instant messages from his AOL account, the police statement said. The sheriff's office alleged that Doyle "on many occasions" instructed the undercover detective to perform a sexual act while thinking of him and described explicit acts he wished to perform.

Another Homeland Security official -- Frank Figueroa, special agent in charge of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Tampa -- faces trial this week on charges of exposing himself to a teenage girl last year at a mall. Figueroa, who has been suspended, pleaded not guilty.

Official Accused Of Soliciting Girl (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

A Homeland Security deputy press secretary was arrested last night at his Silver Spring home on charges he used the Internet to solicit sex from a 14-year-old girl.

Brian J. Doyle, 55, of Silver Spring, was arrested on charges out of Polk County, Fla., shortly before 8 p.m. yesterday. Officials say he used a computer to seduce a child and shared materials harmful to a minor through explicit conversations and pornographic movie clips.

The girl, however, was an undercover Polk County Sheriff's computer crimes detective.

"We take these allegations very seriously, and we will cooperate fully with the ongoing investigation," said William Knocke, spokesman for the Homeland Security Department.

Mr. Doyle revealed his identity to the undercover officer as well as his government and cell-phone numbers. Reports say that Mr. Doyle asked the undercover officer to perform sexual acts and that he described explicit sexual activities he wanted to engage in with her.

Mr. Doyle will be placed on administrative leave today pending an investigation and may be extradited to Florida to face charges.

Mr. Knocke declined to comment further on the charges or say how long Mr. Doyle has been under investigation by the sheriff's office, by the Florida State Attorney's Office and the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general.

He faces 23 charges of using a computer to "seduce a child," according to a statement by the Polk County Sheriff's Department.

"In addition to their online chatting, Doyle used the Internet to send hard-core pornographic movie clips to the 'girl' and used the AOL Instant Messenger chat service to have explicit sexual conversations with her," the police report said.

Law-enforcement officials also served a search warrant at his residence, during which they seized his home computer and other materials relative to this case.

"We will go after child predators, no matter where they live, to protect our innocent children," says Polk County Sheriff Grady Judd.

Minor's Bond Revoked; Attorney Taken To Jail (BSH)

By Anita Lee

Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald, April 5, 2006

JACKSON - U.S. District Court judge Henry T. Wingate revoked attorney Paul Minor's bond in the judicial bribery case Tuesday because Minor violated the terms of his release by getting drunk.

The order to revoke bond was handed down in a hearing Tuesday morning in Jackson.

Wingate said he would have considered a treatment plan had the defense presented one. Instead, defense attorney Dennis Sweet of Jackson argued that Minor wasn't drunk March 6 at the Marriott Hotel in Jackson.

Minor was taken into custody by the U.S. Marshals Service and will be transferred to the Madison County jail, where he is scheduled to remain until trial. However, Minor attorney Brad Pigott of Jackson said the defense plans to present an alternative treatment plan for alcohol abuse as soon as possible.

Wingate indicated he would be willing to consider such a plan as an alternative to incarceration.

A morning's testimony about his condition that night conflicted, but Wingate found Drug Enforcement Administration agents who witnessed Minor's intoxication more convincing than testimony from two Marriott employees who got to know Minor over the course of his first judicial bribery trial last summer.

Closing Arguments For N.Y. Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

NEW YORK -- A former detective accused of leading a double life as a hitman for the mob was a dedicated lawman and aspiring screenplay writer who was fingered by corrupt government cooperators, his lawyer said during a blustery closing argument at the racketeering trial.

Louis Eppolito, after retiring to Las Vegas in the early 1990s, "was creating stories, writing stories," the attorney, Bruce Cutler told the jury on Tuesday. "There's nothing illegal about writing scripts."

Authorities say Eppolito, 57, and his ex-partner, Stephen Caracappa, 64, were involved in eight killings between 1986 and 1990 while on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. The so-called "Mafia cops" allegedly accepted $4,000 a month to help Casso silence informants and rub out rivals.

The federal jury in Brooklyn was to begin deliberations Wednesday. If convicted, the defendants would face possible sentences of life in prison.

In a sometimes booming voice, Cutler attacked the credibility of two key government witnesses _ confessed drug dealer Burton Kaplan, who claimed he was the middleman between Casso and the detectives for the hits, and admitted embezzler Steven Corso, who wore a wire while offering the defendants drug money to finance a film project at a 2004 meeting in Las Vegas.

Kaplan "led a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life," Cutler said.

The lawyer described Corso as a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief." He labeled a third witness _ a sixth-grade dropout who testified he was forced to dig the grave of one victim while Eppolito stood guard _ a "subhuman gnome."

The witnesses "have no heart, they have no soul, like these television screens," Cutler said, gesturing to courtroom monitors. "There'll be no redemption in this temple of justice."

During a rebuttal, prosecutor Robert Henoch argued that the defense never explained why Kaplan knew personal details about the lives of "Brooklyn's finest." He also asked jurors to focus on Corso's testimony about asking the ex-officers to help him score drugs for some potential film backers from Hollywood who were visiting Las Vegas in 2005.

The partners "could have walked away," Henoch said. Instead, he said, "Those men went right into a drug deal."

The defense has argued the drug charges were cooked up and tacked onto the case solely to overcome the five-year statute of limitations on the killings. The government contends all the crimes were part of a two-decade conspiracy.

Prosecutors can bring charges "within five years of the end of the conspiracy," Henoch said. "This one never ended. You know that from the drug deal."

Henoch closed by urging jurors, "Make this a temple of justice _ hold them accountable."

Defense Closes With Style In Trial Of 2 Ex-Detectives (NYT)

By ALAN FEUER

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Bruce Cutler stood up yesterday and buttoned his suit coat. It was a dark blue suit coat, and he gave its shoulders a quick athletic roll, then went to work.

He raised his voice. He raised his fist. He raised the issue of whether ducks can stand a chance against coyotes and then, amid digressions into David Lean's movie "The Bridge on the River Kwai" and the life of Crazy Horse, the Oglala Sioux warrior chief, he drew upon his 2,072-page fourth edition of the American Heritage Dictionary and raised a last argument in defense of his client, Louis J. Eppolito, a defendant in the so-called Mafia Cops case.

DOJ_NMG_0025323

Though Mr. Eppolito stands at the center of the federal trial — accused, with his former partner, Stephen Caracappa, of killing for the mob — Mr. Cutler, 57, has stood as the trial's resident semiotician. His summation was less a legal argument than a free-associative ode, a lawyerly tone poem on the themes of hope, justice and the spoken word.

"I've tried as best I can to use the English language in a precise way," he told the jury. "I've tried to use words in a precise way. It was drilled into me as a boy."

Thus it was that he turned to the dictionary — "Because that's where the words are," he explained — and read aloud the definition of "justice" ("the quality of being just, fairness"), which led him, somehow, to the definition of "spring" ("the season of the year between winter and summer during which the weather becomes warmer and plants revive"), which led him to the definition of "hope" ("to wish for something with an expectation of its fulfillment"), which led him to his own hopes, which were, as he put it, that in the future, people like the government's witnesses — men he has attacked as "desiccated miserable lowlifes" — "will not be permitted in a court of law, a temple of justice."

From the start, the Brooklyn racketeering trial has had its share of literary moments (including mentions of Mr. Eppolito's memoir, "Mafia Cop"), but Mr. Cutler's presentation was a masterpiece of rambling allusion, including references to Émile Zola, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Brooklyn Bridge, the Acela train and the soullessness of television — all delivered in what could be called the Belle Apocalyptic style.

It may be best — at least in terms of his summation — to think of Mr. Cutler less as a lawyer than a poet, a bebopping, stream-of-consciousness type who progresses more by rhythm than by logic. At times he swerved between the third and second person, addressing unseen government witnesses; at others, he donned someone else's first person, assuming the identities of the witnesses themselves.

He proved himself a master not only of the metaphor (saying that Mr. Eppolito had carried "the backpack of his lineage" so long that "his legs grew strong"), but also of the pejorative.

A short list of the insults he has hurled includes: "cretin," "reprobate," "bum," "degenerate," "thieving scurvy lowlife" and "sophisticated unctuous polished lowlife thief." But yesterday he outdid even himself when he referred to a 5-foot-4, illiterate government witness as a "gnome" — defined, from the dictionary again, as "one of a race of dwarflike creatures who live underground and guard treasure hoards."

In between these slights, Mr. Cutler derided the reporters covering the trial as "scribes" and the prosecutors as men "with light shows and erudition" whose "machines are bereft and denuded of life."

"There is no hope in those machines," he said.

He even found time to discuss his client, a man who, unlike the "intelligent, educated, sophisticated, professional" prosecutors, was "a cop," "a working man," "a man who has to be someplace, to do something, who contributes somehow." It was a leitmotif of his summation: the distinction between the working class and the federal elite.

The embodiment of that elite was, in some sense, Robert Henoch, the chief prosecutor, an earnest, Jimmy Stewart-like man, who has said that his father has attended every one of his trials. Mr. Henoch closed the government's case yesterday with a rebuttal summary; today the jury is expected to get the case.

Mr. Henoch is a colonel in the Army Reserve and seemed affronted by Mr. Cutler's slurs.

"You can't just say it and it becomes true," he said in his rebuttal. "You need evidence in a temple of justice — not just words from the dictionary."

Closing Arguments For Detectives Accused Of Killing For Mob (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

The jury in the "Mafia Cops" trial is set to begin deliberations Wednesday morning in a case that is labeled by prosecutors as the most bloody betrayal of honor and public trust ever perpetrated by police officers.

After Brooklyn federal Judge Jack B. Weinstein goes over an 11-page verdict sheet with them, the jurors will retire to deliberate on whether retired NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa are guilty of being hit men for the mob.

Tuesday, after hours of being cajoled, roused and emotionally tugged at by the closing arguments of prosecution and defense attorneys, the jury went home for the day after Weinstein took about two hours to read a complex legal charge. The panel is set to return to court at 9:30 Wednesday morning.

Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, are charged with acting as double agents for the Luchese crime family during the late 1980s and early 1990s. For cash bribes believed to have totaled $375,000, prosecutors contend that the defendants took part in eight gangland murders and leaked confidential police information to former Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

In a booming voice and with arm gestures that made him look like an orchestra conductor or aerobics instructor, attorney Bruce Cutler, who is representing Eppolito, said in his summation yesterday that the government witnesses were a combination of cunning thieves and lowlifes.

Cutler described Burton Kaplan, the admitted middle man between Casso and the cops, as a man who led "a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life." He said another witness, accountant Stephen Corso, was a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, lowlife thief." Peter Franzone, a parking lot operator who admitted digging a grave for one murder victim, was a "subhuman gnome," Cutler said.

Eppolito, Cutler said, retired to Las Vegas in the early 1990s to break into Hollywood and was "creating stories, writing stories. ... There's nothing illegal about writing scripts."

However, in a rebuttal, assistant U.S. attorney Robert Henoch said that Cutler and Edward Hayes, who is representing Caracappa, never addressed the facts.

"When you make a speech but don't go into the details, then something is wrong," Henoch said. He said that Cutler's presentation was "big voice, big words, big vocabulary."

Henoch stressed that the defense couldn't damage the testimony of witnesses like Kaplin and Corso.

"They didn't make a dent, not a scratch," Henoch said.

Henoch also turned a trial reference by the defense to Psalm 23 into a emotional tug for murder victim Israel Greenwald, whose body was unearthed last year after being missing for two decades.

"Twenty years later Leah Greenwald got to recite Psalm 23" at her husband's grave, he said.

"How dare they bring that into this courtroom?" he said, refering to the defense.

Outside the courtroom Leah Greenwald embraced Henoch. "You were amazing, you were so beautiful," she said.

This story was supplemented with an Associated Press report.

Time Of Essence In 'Mafia Cops' Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

March 9, 2000.

The Brooklyn federal court jury mulling the fate of ex-officers Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will have to focus on that date to determine if both men escape from possible life in prison in the "Mafia Cops" trial.

For three weeks Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, have been on trial for racketeering conspiracy, drug dealing and money laundering charges. More than 40 witnesses have testified and numerous exhibits have been introduced as evidence that prosecutors contend are strong enough to convict both men of being double agents for the mob, with involvement in eight killings.

But the 500-pound legal gorilla in the case involves the statute of limitation for racketeering conspiracy, something that concerns Judge Jack Weinstein. For someone to be convicted, the conspiracy must have continued to exist within five years of the date of the indictment. In the case of Eppolito and Caracappa, both of whom were arrested on March 9, 2005, the conspiracy must have continued to exist as of March 9, 2000.

If the jury finds that the conspiracy and Eppolito's and Caracappa's involvement in it ended before March 9, 2000, then the two defendants would be acquitted of the racketeering charges, including the murders. However, drug and money laundering charges would remain regardless.

DOJ_NMG_0025325

There have been examples of defendants found guilty of the underlying racketeering offenses but able to escape responsibility because of a statute of limitation problem. One such instance was in 1987, when former Bonanno crime family members Salvatore Vitale and Joseph Massino beat a racketeering case involving hijackings.

The verdict sheet the jury will submit first lists the various murders charged in the conspiracy and then deals with the statute of limitation.

One former federal prosecutor thinks that order favors the government.

"They [the jurors] will be more inclined to find a conspiracy continued subsequent to the key date," said Steven K. Frankel, now a criminal defense attorney in Manhattan.

The guilty findings on the murders could convince jurors that the defendants shouldn't escape on a technicality, Frankel said.

Mob Cops' Dramatic Finish (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, April 5, 2006

One government witness was belittled as a gnome. Another was dismissed as a cretin.

To be blunt, defense lawyer Bruce Cutler wasn't holding back in his closing arguments in the so-called Mafia Cops trial, which goes to the jury in Brooklyn Federal Court today.

Jurors will tackle a 12-page verdict form that is constructed in such a way that they must first decide whether Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa murdered for the mob.

After that is decided, jurors will find a question on page 10 that could throw out the racketeering case - even if the jury believes the ex-cops were killers.

The defense contends that their clients must be declared not guilty unless the prosecutors have proven that the ex-cops continued to commit crimes beyond the statute of limitations date of March 2000 - five years before the indictment was filed. To prove that the ex-cops are guilty of racketeering, prosecutors must show that the pair continued their lives of crime well after the last alleged murder.

If found guilty, the two face life in prison.

Cutler, Eppolito's lawyer, didn't focus on parsing legal technicalities - that's not his style. Instead, Cutler directed his theatrical skills full-bore at the government's key witnesses, ripping them as "cretins, subhumans and gnomes," among other choice terms.

"I hope the day will come when the sweetheart pacts given to cretins and devils will be proscribed by Congress. I hope I live to see that day," Cutler roared.

In keeping with the previous four weeks, Cutler offered no alternative theory or alibi to clear his client or suggest reasonable doubt. But there was plenty of name-calling.

The barrel-chested barrister said he'd thumbed through a dictionary to describe witness Peter Franzone and came up with "gnome" for the 5-foot-4 former parking lot operator, who admitted burying the corpse of murder victim Israel Greenwald.

"Real detectives would have preferred murder charges against him," Cutler said without offering any evidence that Franzone, who places Eppolito and Caracappa at the scene, was the killer.

Of star witness Burton Kaplan, who was the alleged intermediary between the Mafia cops and Luchese crime underboss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, he "lived a double life, a triple life or even a quadruple life."

Cutler likened corrupt accountant Steven Corso, who recorded Eppolito and Caracappa last year allegedly planning to launder drug money, to Hal the coyote - who was eating innocent ducks in Central Park until his untimely death while in captivity.

That money-laundering allegation is crucial for the prosecution because it shows the conspiracy didn't end when Eppolito and Caracappa retired from the NYPD, but continued until the time of their arrest last year. "Lou never knowingly laundered money. He wouldn't know how to. More importantly he wouldn't want to," Cutler said.

Prosecutor Robert Henoch got the last turn to rebut the defense arguments, damning Cutler and Caracappa's lawyer Edward Hayes with faint praise.

DOJ_NMG_0025326

"These are two heavyweight champions and they didn't land a punch, not a scratch, not a bloody nose," he said. "Lou Eppolito and Steve Caracappa knew Burt Kaplan, there cannot be a single doubt about that, and Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler did not say a single word about that. The silence is deafening."

WILY 'MOB COP' DEFENSE (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, April 5, 2006

A "Mafia cop" defense lawyer yesterday took his final swipes at the prosecution's star turncoat witnesses - likening one admitted embezzler to Hal the Central Park coyote - before the sensational case went to the jury.

"The coyote was eating the ducks - the ducks didn't have a chance," lawyer Bruce Cutler bellowed about witness Stephen Corso, comparing him to Hal, who recently died after being caught roaming through Central Park.

Then, referring to his client, ex-Detective Louis Eppolito, Cutler added, "Lou was no match for this man."

Cutler ripped Corso, a wire-wearing former accountant who was nabbed stealing millions of dollars from clients, as a "sophisticated, unctuous, polished, low-life thief."

Corso allegedly caught Eppolito and fellow alleged rogue cop Stephen Caracappa facilitating a drug deal in Las Vegas, charges that are coupled with eight murders that the pair reputedly helped carry out for Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso. All the while, the pair proudly wore their gold NYPD detective shields as they pocketed $375,000 in Mafia money, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch.

But Cutler accused another key witness in the feds' case, convicted drug dealer Burton Kaplan, as leading "a double life, a triple life, even a quadruple life."

Referring to the prosecution witnesses, Cutler sniffed, "They have no heart, they have no soul. They're empty like these [courtroom] television screens."

Cutler even slammed diminutive witness Peter Franzone, a garage worker who testified that he was forced to dig a grave for murdered diamond dealer Israel Greenwald, as a "subhuman gnome."

But Henoch said the cops' relationship to Kaplan "has no innocent explanation."

"If you're a cop, you can't associate with known criminals," Henoch said.

"The truth is not always pretty, but the truth is always perfect," he said before imploring the jury to "make this a temple of justice - hold them accountable."

The jury will begin deliberating this morning.

Phony Sheik Selling Fake Rembrandt Is Sentenced (SLPD)

By Peter Shinkle, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

ST. LOUIS -- A man who admitted posing as a Saudi sheik as part of a scheme to sell a fake Rembrandt painting for $2.8 million, was sentenced Tuesday to 10 months in confinement.

Majed A. Ihmoud, 53, of St. Charles, pleaded guilty in October of conspiring to commit mail fraud for his role in the scam.

Ihmoud took the fake of Rembrandt's "Man with the Golden Helmet" to the Adam's Mark Hotel in downtown St. Louis on Aug. 12, 2004, expecting to sell it to a buyer for $2.8 million, the FBI said.

Ihmoud, who dressed as a sheik before the meeting, had launched the scam earlier by spreading the word around St. Louis that he was a member of the Saudi royal family and had a Rembrandt for sale, said Robert Wittman, senior investigator on the FBI's art crime team.

"He said he had a Rembrandt for sale that had come out of the Middle East," said Wittman, who is based in the FBI's Philadelphia office.

The buyer, who provided a check for $2.8 million at the meeting in the Adam's Mark, was an undercover FBI agent, Wittman said. Ihmoud was later informed he had been the target of a sting, and was unable to cash the check.

DOJ_NMG_0025327

Ihmoud also admitted that in another scam he sold a pair of brass doors for $130,000 under the bogus claim that they once belonged to boxer Muhammad Ali. The doors, which in fact had not belonged to Ali, were worth only about $10,000, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Drake, the prosecutor on the case.

Ihmoud also arranged for an artist to examine paintings by Van Gogh at the St. Louis Art Museum as part of a plan to have the artist paint forgeries, prosecutors said.

On Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Richard Webber sentenced Ihmoud to five months of prison and five months of home confinement. The judge also ordered him to repay the government $1,500, the amount an undercover agent gave him as a down payment for the doors.

A Wisconsin art dealer, Marilyn Karos, pleaded guilty March 8 to conspiracy and mail fraud for her role in the schemes to sell the bogus Rembrandt and the brass doors. Karos, who is already serving a prison term for possessing stolen art, is scheduled to be sentenced May 31.

Links Between Pellicano, Director Come Into Focus (LAT)

By Claudia Eller, Greg Krikorian And Kim Christensen, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

About noon on Feb. 24, two FBI agents visited veteran producer Charles Roven in his Sunset Boulevard office after calling to tell him that he was allegedly a victim of Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano.

The agents brought a tape recording that would startle Roven, according to sources close to the investigation. Director John McTiernan, whom Roven worked with on the 2002 box office flop "Rollerball," was allegedly on the tape with Pellicano, discussing the details of Roven's wiretapped conversations.

Pellicano allegedly briefed McTiernan on Roven's conversations regarding "Rollerball," the sources said, as well as Roven's personal calls.

Authorities charged McTiernan on Monday with lying about having hired Pellicano. A day later, the full extent of McTiernan's reliance on the indicted detective was beginning to come into focus.

McTiernan's association with Pellicano began years ago, long before the alleged Roven wiretap, when the director allegedly hired the private eye in 1998 as part of his highly publicized divorce. But it did not end there. Pellicano also allegedly intimidated a witness in a manslaughter case involving the son of McTiernan's ex-wife, Donna Dubrow.

In an interview Tuesday, Dubrow said she has seen financial records indicating that her ex-husband paid Pellicano in the neighborhood of $100,000 during their protracted divorce. The payments began at least as far back as June 1998, she said, adding that she did not know what services they were for.

"I do know that he hired Pellicano … in our divorce," Dubrow said. "I do not know if he wiretapped me."

McTiernan could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Based on Dubrow's account, McTiernan had a well-established relationship with Pellicano when he began his collaboration with Roven on "Rollerball" in 2000. That collaboration began when the Los Angeles-based Mosaic Media Group, a multimedia, talent management and production company in which Roven is a partner, signed a deal with MGM to co-finance a slate of movies, including "Rollerball."

McTiernan directed and produced the film, on which Roven was also a credited producer.

People involved in "Rollerball" confirmed that McTiernan and Roven, both known for being strong-willed, had numerous creative disagreements over the film. But, they added, they could not recall any blowups between the two, and characterized the friction as typical for a Hollywood production.

When McTiernan learned that Roven was being brought aboard the project, according to one person familiar with the matter, he gained assurances that he would retain virtually all of the creative control as a way to limit Roven's role as a hands-on producer.

As a result, people who worked on the movie were mystified why McTiernan would have allegedly resorted to hiring Pellicano to wiretap Roven.

DOJ_NMG_0025328

At the time, coincidentally, Roven's Sunset Boulevard office was across the street from Pellicano's. In early 2002, Roven moved into the same building where Pellicano was based.

Roven's productions include "Batman Begins, "Three Kings," "Twelve Monkeys" and "Scooby-Doo." He was married to the late Dawn Steel, former head of Columbia Pictures, who died of a brain tumor in 1997. Through his representatives, Roven declined to comment.

Three years before Roven's collaboration with McTiernan began on "Rollerball," McTiernan employed Pellicano as part of his divorce case. Court records in the case assert that he hired Pellicano to "harass and intimidate witnesses" in a closed criminal case involving Dubrow's son, Ethan Dubrow.

Ethan Dubrow was 26 in 1993 when a shotgun he was showing to friends at his Los Angeles home discharged, fatally wounding one of his dinner guests, Adam Scott.

After initially telling police that he thought the gun was not loaded, Dubrow later pleaded guilty to involuntary manslaughter in the death of Scott, 27, the son of Jack Scott, then president of Pasadena City College and now a Democratic state senator from Altadena.

In May 1998, several years after Dubrow's guilty plea, one of the witnesses in the shooting said Pellicano called her and implied that she had been involved in obstructing justice in the case. He accused Ethan Dubrow and his attorney of hustling her out of the country before she could testify.

The witness, Suzonne Stirling, said in a sworn declaration that she at first put Pellicano off, but called him back a few hours later to deny Pellicano's allegation that she might have obstructed justice and to ask why he was raising questions about Scott's death.

Stirling said Pellicano initially refused to identify his client but relented, saying "he had been hired by John McTiernan, who was getting a divorce from Ethan's mother."

When she asked him what that had to do with Adam Scott's death, Stirling said, Pellicano told her the case had not been thoroughly investigated and it was unheard of that Ethan Dubrow had served no time in jail after his conviction.

"Mr. Pellicano told me that Ethan was not working, that Ethan's mother was supporting him, that the money for Ethan's support was coming out of John's pocket, and that John wanted to know the truth," Stirling said in her declaration.

Stirling also said that Pellicano apparently had investigated her as well.

"Mr. Pellicano made several comments to me which made it clear to me that he knew several personal facts about me, including where my grandmother lived," Stirling said.

The contact by Pellicano came in the midst of a nasty divorce, which began when McTiernan allegedly served Dubrow with divorce papers disguised as a gift-wrapped package he had delivered to her.

In addition to squabbling over money that Dubrow may have used to support her son, the couple fought over millions of dollars worth of property, including a Wyoming ranch and a private plane.

In the meantime, federal prosecutors Tuesday underscored the complexity of their still-unfolding investigation in court papers that aim to block efforts by Pellicano's lawyer to derail the case.

Last month, attorney Steven Gruel challenged the legality of the federal government's search of Pellicano's offices and raised questions about witnesses and evidence collected by authorities.

In its response Tuesday, the U.S. attorney's office disputed the notion that authorities used a threat allegedly involving Pellicano as a ruse to search his Sunset Strip offices.

The search warrant, they said, was based on a June 2002 threat against a Los Angeles Times reporter and the agents involved in the search "were no more looking for evidence of wiretapping than they were looking for the plastic explosive and homemade bombs that they found in defendant's safe."

*

Times staff writers Andrew Blankstein and Chuck Philips contributed to this report.

Astorga Waives Extradition, Will Return To New Mexico (ALBTRIB)

By Maggie Shepard, Tribune Reporter

Albuquerque Tribune, April 5, 2006

Posted 12:48 p.m. Michael Paul Astorga, wanted in connection with two Albuquerque-area homicides, waived his extradition hearing in an El Paso, Texas courtroom, Erin Kinnard, Bernalillo County Sheriff's Department spokeswoman, said this afternoon.

That means Astorga won't put up a court fight about returning to New Mexico to face at least two open counts of murder, one of which could carry the death penalty.

It's unclear when Astorga, 29, will return to Albuquerque.

Astorga, who spent a day on the FBI's top 10 "Most Wanted" list over the weekend, was captured Monday in Mexico.

He's wanted in the March 22 killing of Bernalillo County sheriff's Deputy James McGrane Jr., 38.

At the time of McGrane's killing, Astorga was a fugitive wanted for the slaying of Candido Ray Martinez last November.

Astorga Headed To New Mexico (KTSM-TV)

KTSM-TV, April 5, 2006

After being caught in Juarez on Monday, Michael Astorga is back in the U.S. and headed to New Mexico.

Tuesday, April 4, 2006 — Michael Astorga was brought back into the United States early Tuesday morning. That's just one day after being caught in Juarez. Chiuhuaha State Police found him in an SUV with guns, bullets and marijuana.

Astorga had two outstanding warrants: One for the shooting death of Bernalillo County Sheriff's Deputy James McGrane. The other for the murder of Candido Martinez last November.

Officials say Astorga is a flight risk and will be heavily guarded in all of his transfers.

"There will be a great deal of protection and security, especially because he killed a law enforcement officer. It shows that he doesn't have much regard for those with guns or law enforcement. So he'll be well guarded," says Andrea Simmons, FBI.

Once he gets to Albuquerque he'll face those two warrants for murder. But, there is no timetable as to when he'll be back in court.

Man Sought In Deputy's Death Is Captured In Mexico (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, April 5, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE - A man who had been on the FBI's most wanted list waived extradition Tuesday, a decision authorities said speeded up his return to New Mexico to face charges in the slaying of a Bernalillo County sheriff's deputy.

Police in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, handed over Michael Paul Astorga, 29, to the FBI and Bernalillo County authorities in El Paso, Texas, early Tuesday morning. By Tuesday evening, Astorga - wearing shackles and handcuffs - was escorted into the Metropolitan Detention Center in Albuquerque.

Astorga had been sought for nearly two weeks in the March 22 killing of Deputy James McGrane Jr., 38, who was shot in the head after stopping a pickup truck on N.M. 337 in Tijeras, east of Albuquerque. Before McGrane's death, a warrant had been issued for Astorga in the Nov. 5 killing of Candido Martinez, 27, of Albuquerque.

Chihuahua state police said officers found three handguns and a small amount of marijuana when they pulled over Astorga and another man in a sport utility vehicle about 1:50 a.m. Monday.

Astorga insisted in a television interview in Mexico hours after his arrest that he had been on vacation in Juarez, and expressed surprise that police had been looking for him.

He also said he was asleep at a motel when Mexican police showed up and arrested him. He denied having any weapons.

His attorney, Gary Mitchell of Ruidoso, said Astorga "has the presumption of innocence" and that he wants to assure his client receives a fair trial after the highly publicized manhunt.

District Attorney Kari Brandenburg said her office has not decided whether to seek the death penalty in the case.

"We don't have to make that decision for a while," she said.

Killing a law enforcement officer is one of the criteria under state law for seeking the death penalty.

Authorities had offered a $130,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of Astorga. The sheriff's department received about 1,000 tips, and Sheriff Darren White said it will be up to the FBI to determine if someone gets the reward money and how much.

White said information leading to the capture came from good police work.

After Astorga's capture, sheriff's officers removed the black bands that had covered their badges since McGrane's death.

The department also contacted McGrane's family.

"It's kind of scary when you get a phone call early in the morning, but this was the best news we've heard in two weeks," James McGrane Sr., the deputy's father, told KOB-TV.

Astorga's mother, Theresa Romero, told the station she had no idea her son was in Mexico and that she had been out looking for him. She also said she doesn't believe her son killed McGrane.

Astorga Waives Extradition From Texas (KOB-TV)

By Reed Upton

KOB-TV, April 4, 2006

A man suspected of slaying a deputy has waived his extradition from Texas after being released to US officials by the Mexican Government early Tuesday morning.

Ironically, it was the law enforcement agents that had been pursuing Michael Astorga ever since the March 22nd shooting death of Deputy James McGrane that posted Astorga's bail with Mexican officials.

Bernalillo County deputies and FBI agents learned at about midnight Monday night that what Astorga was being held on in Ciudad Juarez was an immigration charge. They also learned his bail was only $2,000.

"Our detectives in El Paso called home, found out how much money was in their checking accounts," said Undersheriff Sal Baragiola. "They went to their ATMs. Everyone kicked in whatever they could kick in. We added up the numbers, came up with $2,000, paid it to Mexican officials, and Michael Astorga was in our custody within a couple of hours."

By waiving his extradition from Texas to New Mexico, Astorga could be back in Bernalillo County as early as Tuesday evening.

Astorga was wanted at the time of McGrane's murder in connection with the November 5th killing of 27-year-old Candido Martinez of Albuquerque.

Bernalillo County Sheriff Darren White said at the time that investigators believe Astorga shot and killed McGrane during a routine traffic stop so that he wouldn't be picked up on the pending murder charge.

After eluding a massive manhunt for 12 days, Astorga was apprehended by Mexican officials early Monday morning.

Astorga has denied involvement in the killing of McGrane.

Judge Declares Second Mistrial In Tenet Case (WSJ)

By Rhonda L. Rundle

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

A federal judge in San Diego declared a mistrial in an 11-month criminal case against a unit of Tenet Healthcare Corp., its Alvarado Hospital Medical Center and its former chief executive officer. It was the second mistrial declared by the same judge on nearly the same charges against the defendants.

The Tenet unit, the hospital and its former CEO, Barry Weinbaum, were accused by U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam of violating the federal antikickback statute by paying bribes to doctors in exchange for patient referrals to the hospital. The alleged conspiracy involved the illegal use of relocation packages to recruit physicians to Alvarado's service area.

"Like the two juries that have deadlocked in February 2005 and now April 2006, Tenet and the prosecutors disagree over whether anyone at Alvarado Hospital Medical Center intended to break the law when they recruited physicians to the fast-growing eastern part of San Diego County," Peter Urbanowicz, Tenet's general counsel, said in a statement.

The case is important to Tenet, which has been negotiating a settlement with the Justice Department to resolve a multitude of allegations of misconduct. Some investors yesterday said the mistrial could clear the way for a final settlement, assuming that the government doesn't pursue a third trial. Tenet, based in Dallas, is the nation's second-largest hospital company.

DOJ_NMG_0025331

"This is quite positive for Tenet. If they had lost and the contracts were declared illegal, it would be a setback and an enormous issue for the entire hospital industry," said Joseph Chiarelli, chairman of Chiarelli & Co., a small research boutique in New York. The mistrial "paves the way for a settlement" with the government, possibly for an amount below $1 billion, he said.

Mr. Weinbaum's attorney, Charles G. La Bella said: "I think it's time for the government to acknowledge that they are trying to criminalize something that isn't criminal. They should end this and admit that the prosecution was ill-advised."

In the second trial, the government's case was largely presented by Ms. Lam, a leading health-care fraud prosecutor and co-author of a textbook on the subject. Her office now must decide whether to pursue a third trial in the Alvarado case. Judge M. James Lorenz, who presided over both trials, set April 17 for a status conference on the case. Ms. Lam couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. La Bella, who interviewed jurors after the mistrial was declared, said they were "pretty much split down the middle for most counts," in the case. "It wasn't a situation where there were only two people for the defense," which might encourage the government to move forward with a third trial.

Another Guilty Plea In Hired Truck Case (CHIT)

Tribune Staff Reports

Chicago Tribune, April 5, 2006

A Dolton man pleaded guilty Tuesday to bribing two Chicago city foremen to obtain at least $45,000 in city-owned asphalt for private paving projects.

Carl Edwards, 34, a private truck driver, said in a plea agreement that he paid bribes to Patrick Stillo and Robert Laino from April 2002 to November 2004.

Edwards used bribery to obtain at least 75 truckloads of city-owned asphalt, worth about $600 each, according to the plea agreement.

Edwards passed the asphalt on to private paving contractors for a fee of about $300 per truckload, then paid $150 in bribes to Stillo and Laino, the plea agreement said. Edwards sometimes paid an additional $50 to other truck drivers who helped in the scheme.

In exchange for Edwards' guilty plea and cooperation, prosecutors agreed to recommend a 9-month prison sentence. The plea agreement allows Edwards to argue for a lower term, including probation.

U.S. District Judge Harry Leinenweber is to sentence Edwards on Aug. 25.

Edwards' lawyer, Ellen Domph, could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

Edwards is the 35th defendant convicted in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program.

Both Stillo and Laino pleaded guilty last year. Stillo was sentenced to 1 year in prison and Laino to 6 months.

G-Sting: Herrera's Former Friend Testifies Against Him (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, April 5, 2006

Former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera claims he didn't take bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi. But according to a close friend, that is not the case. From him, the jury in the G-Sting political corruption trial got insight into Herrera's relationship with Galardi.

It was a potentially damaging day for Dario Herrera as one of his former best friends testifies Herrera often bragged about his relationship with strip club owner Mike Galardi. This man, Terry Lamuraglia, says his friendship with Dario Herrera ended because he objected to Herrera's ties with Mike Galardi.

Lamuraglia told the jury he and Herrera could get comped drinks and lap dances at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club anytime. He said, "Dario would place a call to make sure everything was set up, that they knew we were coming."

Lamuraglia believes every time he and Herrera visited Cheetahs, he received sexual favors from dancers there. Further damaging Herrera's case, Lamuraglia testified Herrera bragged about "getting a free trip, getting free golf, getting entertainers, getting things paid for" by Galardi.

Jerry Bernstein, Herrera's attorney, stated, "I don't want to comment because we are in the middle of cross-examination. I don't feel that it is appropriate for me to comment about his testimony."

Herrera's attorney Jerry Bernstein was largely silent when he left court, not wanting to talk about Lamuraglia's testimony, which included an unusual story about Herrera's finances.

Lamuraglia told the court Herrera "...wanted to use my credit card to purchase furniture for the house."

Herrera used Lamuraglia's credit to purchase $20,000 worth of home furnishings and then paid Lamuraglia back largely in cash. Prosecutors imply the money was from bribes Herrera received from Mike Galardi when Herrera was a county commissioner.

Jerry Bernstein believes Lamuraglia is seeking revenge for a soured friendship, citing an interview Lamuraglia gave to a local newspaper. "'I love you, I miss you, I'm gonna hurt you.' That's what he told the Las Vegas Sun," Bernstein said.

Lamuraglia returns to the witness stand Wednesday morning.

The man at the heart of the G-Sting trial, strip club owner Mike Galardi, was at the George Federal Courthouse Tuesday. Galardi was scheduled to testify Tuesday, but will instead testify Wednesday.

George Federal Courthouse -- April 4 -- 3:30 p.m.

This afternoon federal prosecutors called Vanessa Baca to the stand. She worked for Mike Galardi as a bartender at his Cheetahs strip club.

Prosecutors in their opening statement three weeks ago identified Baca as a woman Galardi has selected to accompany Dario Herrera on a golf outing at the Southern Highlands Golf Course. But on the stand today, Baca testified Galardi asked her to go, but then added, quote, "I didn't know who was going to be there."

Baca testified at one point she and Herrera went to a section of the course that was secluded, quote, "I just remember bits and pieces of making out." Baca said she began performing a sex act on Herrera but then stopped because she did not want to continue.

Baca testified following the outing she was paid in the neighborhood of $500 by Mike Galardi, but Baca adds Galardi frequently paid her for accompanying him on social outings.

On defense cross-examination, Herrera's attorney Marc Rothenberg asked Baca when Galardi gave her $500 was she being paid as a prostitute. Baca answered, quote, "No."

Rothenberg then asked her if she made out with Herrera because it was something she wanted to do. She answered, quote, "Yes."

George Federal Courthouse -- April 4 -- 12:30 p.m.

This afternoon former Las Vegas strip club owner Michael Galardi is expected to began giving testimony in the G-Sting political corruption trial.

In late 2003, Galardi entered into a plea agreement with federal prosecutors where he admitted giving thousands of dollars in cash and gifts to former Clark County Commissioners Erin Kenny, Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

According to federal prosecutors, the G-Sting scam began in early 1999 with Galardi being fueled by a desire for wealth and to become the valley's premiere strip club owner. He viewed the construction of his Jaguars strip club as his monument to that cause.

During construction Galardi was plagued by numerous construction set backs and liquor licensing issues. Prosecutors contend and Galardi admits that to clear all those hurdles Galardi hatched a systematic plan with another former County Commissioner Lance Malone to bribe elected officials.

Former Commissioner Erin Kenny also has plea agreement with federal prosecutors. During the last two days of testimony she has outlined how she received upwards of $70-thousand dollars from Galardi. Under Galardi's plea agreement with the government he will serve no more than five years in prison after his sentencing later this year. It is possible he could serve less if G-Sting prosecutors feel he has been helpful.

George Federal Courthouse -- April 4 -- 10:30 a.m.

Strip Club Manger Says Dario Demanded Lap Dances

This morning Southern Highlands golf course manager Douglas Hensley testified that course records show strip club owner Mike Galardi often took Dario Herrera on golfing outings. Those outings started in Oct. 2000, two months after Herrera cancelled his own membership at the same club.

Prosecutors imply Herrera didn't need a membership if Galardi was footing the bill. Prosecutors then called Robert Leslie to the stand. Leslie was a manager at Galardi's Cheetahs strip club for nine years. Leslie testified that twice in 2001, Herrera demanded lap dances and drinks at the club to be comped out to the tune of $1,900. Leslie said Herrera was adamant about it. "He said that I needed to get that money for him," Leslie testified.

Leslie also testified he never saw any direct exchange of money or gifts between Galardi and Herrera.

Prosecutors then called Stacy Woodbury to the stand. She is the executive director of the Nevada Commission on Ethics. She testified in the case of both Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid Chauncey, neither claimed any money from Mike Galardi on state financial disclosure forms. Those are the forms elected officials must fill out when they take office to declare their financial interests.

Woodbury told the jury, "If you accept a gift of a loan you are not to approve or disapprove...." She is referring to when voting on issues involving the person who gave the gift. Clark County Commission records show neither Herrera or Kincaid-Chauncey every disclosed a relationship with Galardi or abstained on voting on issues involving Galardi.

"The statute does not define what a gift is," said Woodbury on defense cross-examination. When Kincaid-Chauncey's attorney Richard Wright asked Woodbury what criteria elected officials are supposed to use in making a conflict of interested determination., Woodbury replied: "The statute doesn't give you any clear guidance in that area."

Email reporter Brian Allen at ballen@klastv.com

Accused Fixer Now Wants Trial, Not A Guilty Plea (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, April 5, 2006

Molden David Faison now wants to go to trial.

Faison, a former city hearing officer accused of fixing parking tickets for $200 in cash and Prince concert tickets worth $169, had been set to plead guilty on Monday.

His change of heart yesterday came one day after U.S. District Judge Norma L. Shapiro refused to accept his guilty plea.

On Monday, the judge had expressed "doubts" that the government's charge of Hobbs Act extortion against Faison could be proven at trial. Yesterday, she said that an FBI sting like the one that led to Faison's arrest could meet the test for that kind of extortion charge - under certain conditions.

A Hobbs Act violation occurs when a public official obtains or attempts to obtain something of value that affects interstate commerce in exchange for official action.

Shapiro set a trial date of June 5 for Faison, who remains free on $50,000 bail. The trial is expected to last less than a week.

Faison signed a plea agreement with the feds on Monday, but Shapiro declared it "null and void" in light of his decision to go to trial.

Faison's attorney, Edson A. Bostic, declined to say what induced his client to change his mind.

Faison, 43, was indicted by a federal grand jury Jan. 12. He is alleged to have accepted $169 in Prince concert tickets from an FBI informant, John Florio, during a meeting Aug. 18, 2004.

Two months earlier, Florio had paid Faison $200 to fix more than $1,000 worth of his own parking tickets, according to the indictment.

As part of an FBI undercover operation, Florio, who was wearing a listening device at the Aug. 18 meeting, posed as an agent for a plumbing company engaged in interstate commerce that wanted its city parking tickets dismissed.

Florio told Faison the plumbing company (which actually had outstanding parking tickets), had paid for the concert tickets and Faison, according to the indictment, then agreed to dismiss the tickets.

The plumbing company was also cooperating with the FBI and had purchased the concert tickets as part of the sting. Shapiro raised concerns on Monday about whether that scenario met the Hobbs Act interstate-commerce test.

Yesterday, after reviewing case law on the subject, Shapiro said an FBI sting would meet the test if Faison had known or had been informed that he was accepting concert tickets from a company involved in interstate commerce.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Judy Smith declined comment after the hearing yesterday.

Feds Bust 3 In Credit Help Scam (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, April 5, 2006

Officials charge managers of operation in Huntington with defrauding 17,000 out of $24 million

In a federal crackdown on allegedly crooked operators of consumer credit-counseling businesses, three managers of a former service in Huntington were charged yesterday with defrauding 17,000 customers around the country out of $24million, according to court papers and officials.

The three former supervising managers of Debticated Consumer Counseling arrested by FBI agents and inspectors from the U.S. Postal Inspection Service were identified in court papers as Bradley Dorman, 47, of Greenlawn; Louis Mustachio, 29, of East Northport; and Daniel Ruggerio, 28, of Kings Park. They were charged with conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

Debticated, formerly of 775 Park Ave., Huntington, which went out of business in May 2003, was controlled by two Long Island brothers, Andris and Erik Pukke, according to court papers. The two were not charged in yesterday's case. The Pukke brothers have been named in civil actions filed around the country against an interlocking group of debt counseling firms that the brothers allegedly controlled, including Debticated.

Debticated and Erik Pukke, for example, were barred from operating in California in 2003 for not being licensed in that state.

In January, Andris Pukke settled for $35 million a civil suit brought by the Federal Trade Commission against another of the family's credit-counseling firms, Maryland-based Ameridebt. The FTC had accused Ameridebt of cheating 400,000 customers out of $172 million.

Legitimate credit-counseling firms, which have mushroomed in recent years, charge fees for helping consumers work their way out of debt. Many of them are quietly subsidized by credit card companies seeking at least some part of the debt they are owed.

Allegedly fraudulent firms, including Debticated, claim to be nonprofits, but charge excessive fees without disclosing them to customers and often say that the fees are part of debt repayment, according to officials.

Debticated employees also used high-pressure sales pitches falsely claiming that customers could obtain low-interest loans, according to officials. Officials declined to identify any of the victims, but said all were from out of state.

Geoffrey Irwin, a Washington attorney who represents Andris Pukke in civil cases, declined to comment. Neither brother, nor an attorney for Erik Pukke, could be reached for comment.

Dorman, Mustachio and Ruggerio pleaded not guilty at arraignment before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert, who released them on $50,000 bail.

The attorney for Mustachio and Ruggerio, Raymond Suris, of Melville, declined to comment, as did Dorman's attorney, federal public defender Michael Weil. Assistant U.S. Attorneys John Martin and Demetri Jones declined to comment.

Alice Hrdy, an assistant director of the FTC, which brought the Ameridebt suit, said yesterday that in shopping for credit-counseling services, consumers should check with agencies such as the Better Business Bureau, and not deal with firms that insist on immediate payment of fees, that do not provide extensive free advice initially and do not provide written agreements as to fees and services.

Fatal Abuse Of Children Up In '04; Neglect Cases Decline (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

The number of fatally abused children rose slightly in 2004 from the previous year as the overall number of abused and neglected children dropped, a new report says.

Officials from the Department of Health and Human Services said that one reason for the increase in fatalities is improved reporting by states, but that the drop in abuse was encouraging.

"Nevertheless, we cannot tolerate the abuse of even one child," said Wade F. Horn, HHS assistant secretary for children and families.

The number of fatally abused children rose 2 percent from 1,460 in 2003 to 1,490 in 2004, according to the "Child Maltreatment 2004" report. Overall neglect and abuse dropped 4 percent from 872,000 in 2003 to 838,000.

More than 80 percent of the children who died of abuse or neglect were 3 or younger. Among infant boys, the fatality rate was 18 deaths per 100,000 boys. Among infant girls, the fatality rate was 17 deaths per 100,000 girls.

More than three-quarters of the children were killed by one or more parents, and almost a third were killed by their mothers acting alone.

Postpartum depression sometimes plays a role, but there are myriad reasons mothers or fathers hurt or kill their children, said John Orellana, a spokesman for Childhelp USA, the nationally known child-abuse prevention and treatment organization that runs the 1-800-4-A-Child hot line.

Overall, in 2004, state child protective services received about 2.9 million reports of possible child maltreatment. Less than a third of the reports -- 872,000 -- were substantiated.

This translates into a child victimization rate of 11.9 per 1,000 children in 2004. This is about 5 percent lower than in 2001, the most recent peak, when the victimization rate was 12.5 per 1,000.

Overall, the highest victimization rate was 15.3 per 1,000 children in 1993.

As is typical, roughly two-thirds of the substantiated reports in 2004 involved child neglect.

Almost 18 percent of victims were abused, about 10 percent were sexually abused, 7 percent suffered "psychological" abuse and 2 percent were "medically" neglected. In addition, 15 percent of abused children experienced "other" types of maltreatment such as abandonment or exposure to drugs at birth.

These victimization rates have fluctuated only slightly in the past five years, the HHS report said.

Nearly 79 percent of child abusers are parents, followed by "other relatives" (6.5 percent) and "unmarried partners of parent" (4.1 percent).

Abusive foster parents in New Jersey, Ohio and Florida have made headlines in recent months, but statistically, this is rare: 0.04 percent of foster parents were reported to be abusive or neglectful, the federal report said.

Reflections Behind The Badge (WP)

By Allison Klein

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

They've heard it before.

When yellow police tape is streaked across a struggling Prince George's County neighborhood, the telltale sign someone has been killed, homicide detectives Kelly Rogers and Meredith Bingley show up on the scene. It's 3 a.m., and they've been called out of bed.

"Which station do you work for?" Rogers has heard more times than she can count. With her smooth makeup, hot-pink fingernails and sleek chestnut-colored hair, people in the community think she's a television reporter.

Bingley, a stylish blonde who has down-to-earth looks, is pegged as a social worker. "Nobody thinks I'm police," Bingley said.

No matter that they have their police badges prominently displayed. They are not men in suits and ties, the typical look of Prince George's 26 homicide detectives.

Cpls. Rogers and Bingley are the only female homicide detectives in the county. There have been just six before them in the 75-year history of the department.

The small number of women is typical of area homicide units -- three of 15 homicide detectives in Montgomery County and one of 10 in Fairfax County are women.

The Prince George's detectives work in the most violent of Washington's suburbs, where last year there were 173 homicides, an average of one slaying about every other day.

DOJ_NMG_0025336

"You have to be able to balance this job," said Rogers, explaining that every fourth homicide on rotation, they are called away from their husbands and children, usually in the middle of the night, to go to a scene. More often than not, they are greeted by a bloody body and hostile witnesses.

Male detectives also have to leave their families in the wee hours to go to homicides, but once they get there, nobody in the community is likely to address them as "honey." There have been times when Rogers and Bingley show up at a scene and someone will ask when the "real" detective will be there.

Although the gender barrier may have crumbled in many respects, the world of guns and violence is still fueled by testosterone. Of the department's 1,348 officers, about 17 percent are women.

"People say, 'You don't look like a police officer,' " Rogers said. "I tell them this is all I bring. What does a police officer look like?"

Bingley, 35, and Rogers, 36, are not partners or even on the same squad within the homicide unit. But they are very close friends and watch each other's backs. They talk on the phone about cases. They have similar lives, both married with young children. And both read detective novels in their spare time.

Since coming to the homicide unit in 2004, Rogers has closed eight of her 10 cases. Bingley, who has been in the unit since 2001, has solved 14 cases and is working on eight others.

County detectives generally solve 50 to 60 percent of their homicides, which is on par with such urban areas as Washington and Baltimore.

Sgt. Michael Straughan, who works with both detectives and supervises Bingley, said he has the "utmost respect" for them as investigators. He said he doesn't have an opinion of their role as women in a unit that's mostly male.

But in the community, Rogers and Bingley stand out, in part because they're white women responding to crimes, usually in depressed, majority-black neighborhoods. Last year, of the 169 homicides the department investigated, 114 of the victims were black men, and 10 were black women.

One night several years ago, Bingley drove her patrol car to a grocery store to buy a few things, and a customer commented how kind her husband must be to allow her to use his car.

She told him in a stage whisper, "This might be surprising, but I'm a police officer."

Often, they use their gender to their advantage. They say they have a knack for getting people to confess.

"People will talk to us faster; maybe I'm more patient with them," Rogers said. "They think we're more sympathetic."

Well, are they?

"Probably not," Rogers said.

Showing up on a scene and seeing blood doesn't bother Rogers. In fact, she will go to autopsies for cases that are not hers because she finds them instructive. "The smell can be the worst part," she said. "And you have to make sure they don't run over your toes with the gurney."

Bingley said she doesn't mind seeing an autopsy for forensic purposes, but she won't go more than she has to. "I don't like it, but I deal with it," she said.

For the most part, they both say they get respect on the street because they give respect to whomever they're talking to. They learned this in the academy.

"When I was in patrol, I was the only female, and I never had a problem," Rogers said. "I consider myself one of the guys."

But just because Rogers thinks she's one of the guys doesn't stop her from offering a soft touch now and again. She remembers a time she had to tell a mother her son, an innocent victim, had died. The mother broke down crying and shaking.

"I hugged her and rubbed her back," Rogers said. "I'm a mom. I felt terrible for her. Her son was just on his way to work."

Both got into the profession because they liked the excitement of it. They didn't think of the danger.

Bingley became a police officer in 1993 after graduating from the University of Maryland with an economics degree. She had planned to become an FBI agent but took the test for Prince George's police because a friend of hers didn't want to take it alone. She got the offer.

DOJ_NMG_0025337

Rogers became an officer in 1990 after attending Prince George's Community College as an art major. She wanted to go into advertising. During a part-time job keeping books at a grocery store, she went on a ride-along with one of the officers assigned to the store. She was hooked. Once she got in the department, she knew exactly what she wanted to do.

"Homicides are the most important thing you can investigate," Rogers said. "When I say we have the coolest job in the world, I don't mean it in a flip way. "

On a recent chilly night, Bingley pulls up to a rowhouse in Northeast Washington where one of her victims used to live. She grabs her thick coffee-colored case file, pulls on her jacket and eases her long, blond hair out of the jacket's collar.

The victim was shot in November, and she hasn't had a good break in the case since.

Her black pumps click-click on the pavement up to the house, where a drug dealer is going to meet her in the basement and give her some information.

"You got the pictures?" the man asks her. She gets what she needs from him, then leaves.

She gets back in her car. "I'm so close," she says about the case.

Her shift is over, and she drives toward home, knowing that if gunplay turns deadly before sunrise somewhere in Prince George's, she'll be back on the street in a few hours.

CIVIL LAW:

Agencies Not Protecting Privacy Rights, GAO Says (WP)

By Robert O'Harrow Jr.

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Government agencies that use private information services for law enforcement, counterterrorism and other investigations often do not follow federal rules to protect Americans' privacy, according to a report yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

The Justice Department, the Department of Homeland Security and two other agencies examined by the GAO spent about $30 million last year on companies that maintain billions of electronic files about adults' current and past addresses, family members and associates, buying habits, personal finances, listed and unlisted phone numbers, and much more.

But those agencies often do not limit the collection and use of information about law-abiding citizens, as required by the Privacy Act of 1974 and other laws. The agencies also don't ensure the accuracy of the information they are buying, according to the GAO report. That's in part because of a lack of clear guidance from the agencies and the Office of Management and Budget on guidelines known as "fair information practices," the report said.

At the same time, the contractors are not bound by those "fair information practices," and they often don't comply with all of them, the report said. Companies do not notify individuals when information is collected, for instance. They limit individuals' access to records about themselves, and they generally do not have provisions for correcting mistakes, the report said.

"The nature of the information reseller business is essentially at odds with the principles," the report said. "Resellers make it their business to collect as much personal information as possible."

The 83-page report, the subject of a congressional hearing yesterday, was spurred in part by massive security breaches reported last year by ChoicePoint Inc. and LexisNexis in which sensitive files involving almost 200,000 people were sold to fraud artists.

It highlights a difficult truth about the government's increasing reliance on information services: By outsourcing the building of rich dossiers, the government is sidestepping checks on surveillance approved in the wake of domestic spy scandals involving the FBI, Army and other agencies in the 1960s and 1970s.

The report recommends that Congress consider requiring private information contractors to "more fully adhere" to fair information practices.

Information services play an important but quiet role in homeland security and criminal investigations. ChoicePoint officials last year acknowledged that they serve in effect as a private intelligence service for the government.

DOJ_NMG_0025338

Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on commercial and administrative law, said the hearing was held because the ability of private information services to collect information and the government's use of those services have grown far beyond existing laws and oversight.

Peter Swire, a law professor at Ohio State University, said the information industry delivers information more efficiently than ever before, helping investigators in many ways. But he told the congressional panel that the government needs to ensure that the information it buys is accurate while giving people a chance to correct mistakes. "Accuracy that is good enough for marketing is not necessarily good enough to detain a suspect," said Swire, who served as the chief privacy counselor in the Clinton administration White House.

FDA Warns Maker Of Anthrax Vaccine (WP)

By Justin Gillis

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Federal drug regulators have accused a California company of breaking the law by making exaggerated claims about the purity and effectiveness of a new vaccine for anthrax, a fresh blow for a troubled $1 billion program at the center of the government's plans to counter bioterrorism.

In a letter made public yesterday, the Food and Drug Administration accused VaxGen Inc. of making "false or misleading statements" about the vaccine, essentially by offering rosy interpretations of the handful of scientific studies that have been completed on the product.

The agency specifically cited a promotional document the company handed out in Washington in October that claimed the company's techniques allowed it to produce a vaccine "at nearly 100% purity" and asserting that the product generates immunity comparable to that induced by an older vaccine. Neither claim is warranted on the basis of early research, the FDA declared.

The statements in the VaxGen document closely resemble assertions the company has made in regulatory filings and in public meetings over the past two years. The FDA threatened court action unless VaxGen devises a plan to "disseminate truthful, non-misleading, and complete information" about the vaccine to anyone who might have received such puffed-up claims, an audience that may well include thousands of individual stockholders.

Though the letter was made public only yesterday, VaxGen received it March 24 and neither disseminated it nor filed any disclosure about it with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Paul Laland, a VaxGen spokesman, said the company did not feel such disclosure was warranted. "Based on our internal assessment and research of industry standards, we did not believe this was material information," he said.

He added that VaxGen was still reviewing the FDA letter and could not comment at length on the agency's assertions.

"We'll review it internally, and we're going to respond, and if needed we'll put a plan together," Laland said. "If there is something that's incorrect, then we will take corrective action."

VaxGen has been struggling to fulfill $1 billion worth of federal contracts to make 75 million doses of anthrax vaccine, enough to immunize 25 million people, a population roughly the size of the combined New York and Washington metropolitan areas. The vaccine would most likely be used after a large-scale anthrax attack to immunize people exposed to the germ, whose spores can take months to germinate, causing a deadly lung infection.

The VaxGen contracts are the largest awarded to date under Project BioShield, President Bush's program to create defenses against biological and radiological attack. Members of Congress have complained sharply about delays and other problems in the way the Health and Human Services Department has handled that program, and HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt responded recently by promising improvements.

VaxGen has long had a troubled history, including accounting problems that the company has pledged repeatedly to fix but so far hasn't. The company has acknowledged that it is at least a year behind in producing the anthrax vaccine and will default on its contracts in November unless the government grants a time extension.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ_NMG_0025339

Federal Authorities To Investigate Businessman's Death (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. - A federal investigation has been opened into the shooting death of a businessman, who was killed by a bystander during a scuffle with a Baton Rouge police officer.

The Justice Department has ordered the FBI to investigate, department spokesman Eric Holland said Monday. He would not speculate on how long the investigation would take.

George Temple II was killed Feb. 17 during a scuffle with a police officer that began when he was pulled over for cutting into a funeral procession. During the fight with Officer Brian Harrison, Temple was shot five times.

Authorities said one of the shots came from the officer's gun. The other four came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities say came to help the officer during the struggle. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head and killed him, according to an autopsy.

Police said Temple offered a bribe to the police office and a struggle began when the officer attempted to arrest Temple.

District Attorney Doug Moreau already has said that a state grand jury will review the shooting.

Trial No. 2 For Newport Officers (KNOXNS)

By J.j. Stambaugh

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), April 5, 2006

Pair of sergeants stand accused of shakedown

Two Newport police sergeants accused of shaking down a pair of Hispanic men during a 2005 traffic stop will face trial a second time today on federal civil-rights charges.

Sgts. James W. Roach Jr., 29, and Patrick Sheldon, 33, were arrested last year by the FBI after they were swept up in a five-year probe into public corruption in Cocke County dubbed "Rose Thorn." They were acquitted of felony civil-rights conspiracy charges in February, but jurors couldn't reach a verdict on misdemeanor charges of depriving the alleged victims of their civil rights.

During the first trial, Assistant U.S. Attorney Neil Smith said the officers had targeted Wilder Gomez Roblero and Marcos Mijia Vasques during a March 12, 2005, traffic stop because they were illegal immigrants and, therefore, were unlikely to report the alleged crime.

The officers, who didn't testify, have denied ever stopping the men and provided matching alibis to the Tennessee Bureau of Investigation after the alleged incident was reported.

Jurors today will be asked to ultimately render a verdict on the misdemeanor charges. Sheldon also faces an additional misdemeanor charge of being an accessory after the fact that was lodged against him after the first trial.

Through motions filed by his attorneys, Sheldon has maintained that he has been pressured by the FBI to implicate Roach and was told he would be "prosecuted to the fullest extent of the federal government's resources" if he refused to cooperate.

The evidence presented to the new jurors may differ in key respects from what the first jury heard. U.S. District Judge Ronnie Greer, for instance, has ordered defense attorneys to avoid making comments that smack of racial overtones and has also barred prosecutors from questioning a possible defense witness about a prior felony conviction.

The defense witness, Newport store operator Charles "Mo" Swanson, had been subpoenaed to testify in the first trial but didn't take the witness stand. Defense attorneys later said his gun permit had been revoked by the state Department of Safety as the result of a letter sent by Smith, who pointed out that he was a convicted felon.

Attorneys for Roach and Sheldon accused Smith of intimidating Swanson to prevent him from testifying, an allegation that Smith denied. The accusation was one of several made in an effort to have the indictment against the officers dismissed due to prosecutorial misconduct, but Greer rejected the officers' arguments in a ruling handed down Tuesday.

J.J. Stambaugh may be reached at 865-342-6307.

Report Faults Prisons Bureau On Chemicals (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

DOJ_NMG_0025340

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The federal Bureau of Prisons failed to address concerns that inmates and staff members at several prisons were exposed to toxic chemicals in recycling programs where inmates use hammers to smash discarded computers, according to the agency that handles whistle-blower complaints.

In a letter to President Bush and Congress on Monday, the agency, the Office of Special Counsel, called for an independent investigation into the complaints, which were brought to the federal government by a whistle-blower from a California prison in 2004.

The office criticized the Bureau of Prisons for not investigating the accusations thoroughly, saying the agency's review was deficient and "appears to be cursory at best."

The inmates dismantled the computers as part of the federal prison industries program, or Unicor, which has become one of the nation's largest recyclers, providing low-cost recycling to government agencies, schools and private companies.

The whistle-blower, Leroy A. Smith Jr., the former safety manager at Atwater Federal Prison outside Merced, Calif., said factory workers in the recycling facility there and at four other federal prisons in the country were exposed to hazardous materials including lead, cadmium, barium and beryllium when the inmates took hammers to cathode ray tubes from computers.

According to federal health agencies, overexposure to the chemicals can cause cancer, kidney disease, damage to the reproductive and central nervous systems, and death.

Mr. Smith told federal officials that he had several times ordered a shutdown of the program at Atwater after air quality tests revealed the chemicals in the factory and in a nearby food service area, but that the prison's managers and federal prison industry officials routinely ignored his recommendations, resuming the recycling without the safety measures he recommended.

The Justice Department referred the complaints to the Bureau of Prisons, which produced two reports responding to Mr. Smith's complaints in June and August 2005, concluding that the bureau, the federal prison industries program and prison staff members "took appropriate steps" to make sure the programs were operating safely.

Mr. Smith disputed those findings, and in the letter this week, the special counsel, Scott J. Bloch, a Bush appointee, took his side, saying the agency's reports were "unreasonable" and relied "on strained interpretations of applicable rules and procedures in order to justify past actions."

The report faulted the Bureau of Prisons as failing to talk to staff members who knew about potentially toxic exposure at other prisons, and as ignoring documentary evidence that contradicted its findings.

It also criticized the bureau for dismissing exposure to the chemicals as not "imminently dangerous, as no immediate threat of death or serious harm occurred." The operations should have been shut down, Mr. Bloch said, if conditions "could reasonably be expected to cause death or serious physical harm."

"I am left to conclude that a thorough, independent and impartial investigation into recycling activities" at federal prisons is still required, Mr. Bloch said in his report.

A spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons did not reply yesterday to a request for comment.

In a statement, Mr. Bloch said yesterday: "This is a matter where real concerns exist that need to be addressed. Unfortunately, they have not been addressed, and we find ourselves at an impasse."

Same-sex Marriage Lands Before Federal Appeals Court (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, The Associated Press

AP, April 5, 2006

PASADENA -- A lawyer for a gay couple suing for the right to wed told a federal appeals court Tuesday that it's unconstitutional to prevent same-sex marriage, but one judge appeared unmoved and two others said the case could die on procedural grounds.

"Everything that is wrong is not discrimination," said Judge Jerome Farris, part of a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that heard 40 minutes of arguments.

DOJ_NMG_0025341

The case was brought by two gay men who sued after being denied a marriage license in Orange County. They claim California's ban on same-sex marriage and federal laws against it are unconstitutional because gays and lesbians are treated differently than heterosexuals.

U.S. District Judge Gary Taylor last year ruled against the pair Arthur Smelt and Christopher Hammer, both 46, of Mission Viejo. They appealed.

Taylor ruled the law "has a disproportionate effect on homosexual individuals," but said the government's desire to promote procreation is a valid reason for infringing on the rights of gays.

Farris agreed with that assertion.

"I think marriage is a bundle of sticks and sticks include procreation," Farris said.

Richard Gilbert, the gay couple's attorney, said procreation is not the important element of marriage and Judge Sidney Thomas appeared to agree.

"I don't understand, really, the procreation argument," Thomas said.

After the hearing, Hammer said he would prevail all the way to the Supreme Court "if they acknowledge that we are human."

Still, the heavyweights of the same-sex marriage movement aren't supporting the case and instead are waging their campaigns in the state courts of California, Iowa, Washington, New Jersey, New York and elsewhere, seeking rulings similar to the 2003 decision that led to legal gay marriage in Massachusetts.

The strategy of Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund and the American Civil Liberties Union is to win in several states before going to the federal courts and eventually the Supreme Court. They say there is a strong national consensus against same-sex marriage meaning the Supreme Court today would likely rule against it.

"We are interested in serious, incremental work in order to succeed," said Jennifer Pizer, a Lambda attorney who attended the hearing.

In an interview, Gilbert said Lambda and the ACLU's strategy was failing.

Nineteen states have amended their constitution to outlaw gay marriage, and voters in at least six other states could be asked to amend theirs similarly this year.

During the hearing, Justice Department lawyer Gregory Katsas told the panel that the traditional definition of marriage doesn't violate the constitution.

The judges did not indicate when they would rule.

Thomas and Judge Ferdinand Fernandez suggested that the case may be premature, noting that a state court of appeals in San Francisco is weighing a lawsuit brought by gays and lesbians challenging California's prohibition against same-sex marriage.

A trial judge declared the ban violated the California Constitution's equal protection guarantee. The decision could reach the California Supreme Court later this year.

A same-sex marriage victory in California, Thomas and Fernandez noted, would allow Hammer and Smelt to get married.

Gilbert, however, wanted a definitive ruling on whether federal laws and the 49 states that don't permit same-sex marriage are violating the U.S. Constitution's equal protection guarantee.

If California approved same-sex marriages, the federal government would not recognize them and would prohibit his clients and others from filing federal income taxes as a married couple.

"It's a second-class marriage," Gilbert argued.

The case is Smelt v. Orange County, 05-56040.

Feingold Says He Supports Gay Marriage (AP-Y2)

AP2, April 5, 2006

Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record), a potential presidential candidate, said Tuesday he supports giving gays and lesbians the right to marry, again positioning himself to the left of possible 2008 rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0025342

"Gay and lesbian people in our country are fighting a mean-spirited movement to harm them and to discriminate against them," Feingold, D-Wis., said in a telephone interview. "I stand with them against that movement, and I'm proud to stand with them."

Feingold said he decided to express his support for gay marriage in response to a Wisconsin constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and civil unions, which will appear on the state ballot in November.

Feingold Backs Legalizing Same-Sex Marriages (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), a prospective 2008 presidential candidate, said yesterday that he thinks bans on same-sex marriages have no place in the nation's laws.

Feingold said in an interview that he was motivated to state his position on one of the most divisive social issues in the country after being asked at a town hall meeting Sunday about a pending amendment to the Wisconsin state constitution to ban same-sex marriages.

Feingold called the amendment "a mean-spirited attempt" to single out gay men and lesbians for discrimination and said he would vote against it. But he went further, announcing that he favors legalizing same-sex marriages.

That puts him at odds with many prominent Democratic politicians who support gay rights but not same-sex marriage. Should Feingold decide to run for the party's presidential nomination in 2008, his position would put him to the left of many likely rivals.

"Obviously, it's a very difficult issue and evokes a lot of emotions," Feingold said in a telephone interview yesterday. "I think it's something ultimately that people throughout the country will accept, but it's not an easy issue." He accused the Bush White House and the Republican Party of using same-sex marriage as a wedge issue "to hurt Democrats who are against discrimination."

The Wisconsin senator said he is prepared to work with supporters of same-sex marriage to ensure that it is legal in the future.

"Further steps would be appropriate," he said, noting that his first priorities are to defeat the proposed Wisconsin amendment as well as a federal constitutional amendment that is expected to come to a vote in the Senate later this spring.

San Antonio Couple Wins $125,000 Judgment Against Housing Authority (SABIZ)

San Antonio Business Journal, April 5, 2006

U.S. Judge John Primomo ordered the Housing Authority of San Antonio, the San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., Pat Matherly and the Pilgrim Allena Housing Development Corp. to pay $125,000 to resolve a tenant disability discrimination case.

On June 2, 2005, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed a complaint on behalf of local residents Antonio and Josefina Maldonado in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Texas alleging that the Westminster Square Apartments unlawfully discriminated against the couple because of their disabilities.

According to the complaint, Pilgrim Allena Housing owns the local apartment complex where the Maldonados have lived since 1989. The San Antonio Housing Facility Corp., a subsidiary of the local Housing Authority, manages the apartments. Matherly was the on-site manager at the property at the time.

Antonio Maldonado is a double-leg amputee and Josefina Maldonado has osteoporosis, hyperlipidemia, angina, diffuse arthritis and diabetes. Over the years, Josefina Maldonado increasingly had been experiencing difficulty maneuvering her husband in his wheelchair from their third-floor apartment to the ground floor via elevator.

On Feb. 23, 2004, according to the complaint, the Maldonados requested the complex make a reasonable accommodation to move them to a first floor apartment because of their deteriorating health. The couple claimed on March 15, 2004, they provided the apartment manager with documented proof from their health providers of their conditions.

The defendants denied the Maldonados' request, citing the elevators in the apartment building, according to the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0025343

However, the couple complained that they had been trapped in the elevators on previous occasions. They also discovered that the elevators weren't working at other times and that the elevators weren't near their unit, requiring Josefina Maldondo to travel much further to move to and fro.

After the apartment complex denied the Maldonados' requests, two ground-floor apartments were leased to other tenants. The couple filed a complaint with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the government found that they had a cause to proceed with a civil suit. That case was filed on Aug. 29, 2005.

Last week, lawyers from the Justice Department and the Housing Authority reached a settlement. With the judge's signature in hand, the Maldonados will receive the $125,000, with part of that settlement going to the Fair Housing Council of Greater San Antonio for their help in the suit.

Bill To Delay Runoff Elections Passes Committee (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. - The Alabama Legislature moved a step closer Tuesday to approving legislation to delay the June 27 primary runoff elections to July 18 to give military personnel overseas more time to vote.

The House Constitution and Elections Committee approved a Senate-passed bill to delay the party primary runoffs on a unanimous voice vote. The bill is expected to come up in the House Wednesday or Thursday, when it could receive final passage.

Attorney General Troy King and Secretary of State Nancy Worley asked the Legislature to delay the runoffs in response to a lawsuit filed against the state by the U.S. Justice Department.

The lawsuit claims there is not enough time between the June 6 primaries and the June 27 runoffs for service members, particularly those fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, to receive and cast ballots.

The House originally passed a bill that would have kept the runoffs on June 27, but allowed service members to vote by a special ballot that would have been sent to them at the same time as the primary ballot.

King has said he doubts the Justice Department would go along with the special ballot, partly because it would not allow soldiers who did not vote in the primary to vote in the runoffs.

The Senate sponsor, Sen. Wendell Mitchell, D-Luverne, said delaying the primary is the only immediate solution.

"Unless we do something to move the primary we risk having the federal government involve itself in our election," Mitchell said.

Tilting Maryland's Vote (WP)

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

IN THE SANCTIFIED name of expanding the popular vote and widening access to the polls, Maryland Democrats have sacrificed fairness to partisan advantage. The Democrats, who dominate the state legislature in Annapolis, pushed through a bill allowing voting to take place for five days before Election Day -- but mostly at polling stations in Democratic strongholds.

This isn't the first time a majority in a state legislature has sought electoral advantage by ramming a brazenly partisan measure down the throat of the minority party. The justification generally comes down to, "Well, they'd do the same to us if they were in power." But no matter which party is behind such partisan mischief, the effect is the same: to subvert the faith that Americans place in the electoral system's fairness.

The procedural aspects of this bill's passage are odious enough. Before they voted, Democratic lawmakers stripped the bill of provisions that would have permitted Republicans an equal role in deciding where to place the early-polling stations and that would have required that the stations' locations be geographically central. The conference committee that wrote the bill was composed of six Democrats and zero Republicans.

The locations of many of the polling stations for early voting seem designed to mine Democratic votes, which tend to be in more heavily populated areas. In Howard County, early-voting stations were placed in heavily Democratic areas in an apparent effort to weaken the reelection prospects of freshman state Sen. Sandra B. Schrader, probably the most imperiled of Maryland's 14 Republican state senators.

DOJ_NMG_0025344

Democrats enjoy a healthy advantage in voter registration and are understandably eager to recapture the state's governorship, which they lost in 2002, in this fall's elections. Over the past two years they have sought to leverage their statewide numerical advantage by enacting a set of relatively permissive elections laws under the aegis of what the party has called a "voters' bill of rights." As a result, Maryland voters will not be required to show any form of identification, and they will be able to cast provisional ballots practically anywhere in the state, regardless of their home address.

Republicans insist that these measures will open the door to electoral fraud; if fraud does mar the November ballot, the Democrats will be responsible. But they are not unfair on their face. By contrast, tilting the early-voting system toward heavily Democratic areas in strategically key jurisdictions taints the election even before it occurs. With such arrogance and abuse, the Democrats will only erode their majority in Maryland.

ANTITRUST:

Perspective: Bumps In The Road For AT&T-BellSouth Merger? (CNET)

By Mark Del Bianco

CNET News, April 5, 2006

The conventional wisdom in Washington is that regulatory approval of the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is a done deal. The consensus is that this deal will sail through with flying colors--and a few not very onerous merger conditions.

The conventional wisdom may be wrong. There is a twist that ought to give the regulators pause. Both BellSouth and AT&T own considerable chunks of prime wireless spectrum that is unused and that could quickly and relatively cheaply be used to provide broadband services that would compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services--in other words, the long-sought "third pipe" to the home or business.

Competitors will no doubt argue that the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department should worry about the loss of intermodal competition that will result if the two companies are permitted to retain this valuable spectrum.

Over the last year, the development of worldwide standards for WiMax and improvements in equipment performance and cost have made the 2.3GHz and 2.5GHz frequencies more attractive. They are now among the most desirable for use in providing broadband voice, data and video services that will compete with telecom and cable wireline broadband services. These spectrum bands can also be used to compete in the backhaul and special access (both last-mile and interoffice transport) markets where the regional Bell operating companies are also dominant. Soon. they may even be used to compete with cellular and other mobile voice and data services. Equipment costs will be low and will keep falling as economies of scale kick in.

Intermodal competition cannot develop if two of the three modes--wireline and wireless--are in the hands of a single, gigantic company. Off-the-shelf WiMax products for the 2.5GHz band will be available from numerous manufacturers later this year, and a 2.3GHz version of WiMax may be developed. Mobile WiMax equipment that provides voice and high-speed data is now being tested on KDDI's network in Japan and should be widely available by early 2007.

The competitive importance of this spectrum was acknowledged by the FCC last year. As a condition to its approval of the Sprint-Nextel merger, the FCC required that Sprint meet certain milestones for offering broadband service in the 2.5GHz band. Sprint agreed to offer such service to at least 15 million Americans within four years of the order (for instance, by fall 2009), and to offer it to an additional 15 million customers by two years later. Sprint controls the most 2.5GHz spectrum in the U.S., and its planned use of this spectrum to provide services competitive with (or as Sprint claims, better than) wireline broadband services is one of the key drivers of Sprint's ongoing spinoff of its wireline operations. But Sprint's spectrum holdings, large as they are, do not provide adequate coverage in many areas, particularly in the BellSouth footprint.

BellSouth, the second-largest owner of 2.5GHz spectrum in the U.S., controls spectrum in most of the 50 largest markets, according to published reports. It also has substantial 2.3GHz spectrum (acquired in auctions in 1997). SBC Communications also gained a large amount of 2.3GHz spectrum when it acquired AT&T. According to publicly available information, neither company has yet developed any of the spectrum into a commercial line of business; rather, the spectrum is effectively warehoused at present. (However, BellSouth has deployed test broadband service in nine in-region markets using its 2.3GHz spectrum, and it announced in March that it would use the 2.3GHz spectrum to provide "backup" broadband for its wireline broadband service.)

DOJ_NMG_0025345

The proposed merger will concentrate huge blocks of spectrum in one company with every incentive not to use it. Assuming that AT&T's licenses are spread equally around the U.S. and that BellSouth's licenses are located primarily in the BellSouth service area (as appears to be the case), then prior to the merger, approximately 40 percent of the BellSouth and 30 percent to 35 percent of the AT&T licenses are located in the parent Bell operating company's (BOC) service area and are not likely to be used to compete with companies' wireline broadband services.

The postmerger wireline service area will be much larger, however, and substantially less than 50 percent of the spectrum would be out of region. It is unlikely that a postmerger AT&T would have any incentive to develop this spectrum for wireless broadband. Competing with itself in-region would not be attractive; and BOCs have yet to engage in meaningful competition out of region.

Given this scenario, competitors can be expected to argue that the FCC and the Antitrust Division should require BellSouth and AT&T to divest at least their in-region 2.3GHz and 2.5GHz spectrum (together with any existing deployments). Divestiture benefits consumers and businesses if the spectrum is used by an entity or entities that will compete in the broadband, backhaul and special access markets.

It may even be argued that AT&T and BellSouth should be required also to divest all their out-of-region spectrum in order to enable nationwide competition.

Preventing a BOC from acquiring assets that could be used to compete with its core wireline business--and in this case also with its growing wireless business--is not a novel idea. In the Primestar case a few years ago, for example, the Antitrust Division prevented cable operators from buying DBS satellite assets, for fear they would warehouse the satellites in order to prevent new entrants from using them to compete with traditional cable TV.

Similar precedents involve the divestiture of manufacturing plants, drug compounds in the FDA approval pipeline, and other competitive assets in non-telecom markets.

The FCC ought to be particularly receptive to such arguments, given the importance that former Chairman Michael Powell and current Chairman Kevin Martin have placed on the development of facilities-based intermodal competition in their decisions and public statements these last few years. Intermodal competition cannot develop if two of the three modes--wireline and wireless--are in the hands of a single, gigantic company.

Interestingly, the fact that the FCC has in the past permitted BOC ownership of this spectrum and never found it to be a problem is irrelevant. The public interest standard that the FCC applies in merger approval proceedings is based partly on antitrust analysis, but also explicitly permits it to "consider technological and market changes, and the nature, complexity and speed of change of--as well as trends within--the communications industry."

Thus, the FCC could take into account the recent technological and market changes that have transformed this spectrum into a valuable competitive alternative to wireline broadband services. The FCC could determine that the merger, by effectively shielding so much spectrum from the hands of potential competitors, would not be in the public interest absent substantial spectrum divestiture.

The Antitrust Division may also act. Provided it found that the spectrum controlled by the postmerger company represents a source of substantial potential competition, it would be fairly straightforward for it to conclude that without divestiture of the spectrum, the effect of the merger "may be to substantially lessen competition"--the standard it must follow in reviewing mergers under the Clayton Act.

Whether the FCC or the Antitrust Division in this administration will take competition-preserving action is an open question. But for those who seek competition in U.S. broadband markets, and for proponents of network neutrality for whom a third pipe could be a godsend, it certainly looks like a fight worth fighting.

Biography Mark Del Bianco practices law and publishes on issues at the intersection of communications law, antitrust and new technologies. His clients include a variety of VoIP and competitive telecommunications providers and e-commerce companies. He can be contacted at mdelbianco@aya.yale.edu.

DOJ_NMG_0025346

EU Pushes Governments To Open Gas Markets (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, April 5, 2006

Filed at 1:28 p.m. ET

STRASBOURG, France (AP) -- European Union regulators on Tuesday started legal proceedings against 17 countries for not doing enough to open up their energy markets, just weeks after the EU criticized France and Spain for trying to protect their national energy companies.

Delays in drafting new rules to liberalize gas and electricity markets are keeping prices too high, the European Commission has said.

Austria, Belgium, Britain, the Czech Republic, Germany, Estonia, Spain, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lithuania, Latvia, Poland, Sweden and Slovakia will be sent a warning to put rules in place.

The Commission sent the 17 countries a letter of formal complaint. The member states concerned have two months to reply to the Commission. The final stage of the proceedings would mean taking countries to the European Court of Justice.

The Commission also said it would take Spain and Luxembourg to court for not sending it information to show they had put the legal framework in place. A court ruling can force a country to change national laws under threat of heavy fines. The Commission is still examining Portugal's and Hungary's laws.

It criticized the lack of free choice of supplier for many customers and the continued existence of regulated prices, saying that made it harder for new companies to break into the energy sector. Certain long-standing electricity and gas contracts still get preferential access, the Commission said.

It also criticized the way some energy companies do business -- without naming names -- saying there was often not enough separation between electricity and gas transmission and distribution to make sure each was independent. Many companies own the network and sell directly to customers, meaning they are wholesalers selling network access to the rivals they compete with on the retail market.

Another problem was that third-party access to networks could be "discriminatory" and the tariffs charged were not transparent enough, it said.

The power of national energy regulators was also a problem, it said, particularly their ability to set tariffs for access to networks.

"I expect that these infringement proceedings will attract member states' awareness, that these things will be (fixed)," EU energy chief Andris Piebalgs said. "I hope there will be measures taken by the member states."

High oil prices and a gas dispute between Russia and Ukraine this winter have made energy a sore point for some governments anxious to protect old monopolies from foreign predators wanting to take advantage of a move toward a single European energy market.

France backed a combination of Suez SA and state-controlled Gaz de France to fend off a possible bid from Italy's Enel SpA, while Spain faces EU legal action for a decree that could help block a bid from Germany's E.On AG for Endesa SA.

EU countries agreed in 2003 to lift barriers and allow new companies to start providing gas and electricity. However, many nations have been slow to put their promises into practice.

Only five countries had adopted rules opening up the gas and electricity markets for business customers by July 1, 2004. Nations also have to ensure that the legal framework is in place to open up markets for domestic customers by July 1, 2007.

In a parallel antitrust probe, the Commission found "serious malfunctions" across Europe's energy markets, saying it would investigate further into companies and countries where stalled deregulation has left prices too high.

It indirectly criticized "highly concentrated" gas and electricity markets where old monopolies were still firmly in place.

Belgian electricity customers, for example, have a choice of only two suppliers -- both soon to have the same owner as Suez and Gaz de France complete their tie-up.

Citigroup Cleared For Big M&A Deals (FT)

By David Wighton

DOJ_NMG_0025347

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

One of the clouds hanging over Citigroup was lifted on Tuesday when the world's largest financial services company revealed that the Federal Reserve had removed the ban on it making large acquisitions.

The New York Fed, Citigroup's lead regulator, said in a letter to the company that it had dropped the ban because of the "significant progress" it had made in improving its internal controls.

The Fed imposed the restriction a year ago following Citigroup's string of regulatory problems, including the forced closure of its private bank in Japan and the furore in Europe over controversial government bond trades.

Mr Prince said the move reflected the "cumulative effect" of moves taken over the last year, including his introduction of a "five-point plan" to improve Citigroup's compliance culture.

Although the Fed ban was a blow to Citigroup's reputation, Mr Prince said the company had not been significantly hampered by the restriction, which applied only to very large transactions. "I am not sure it was a net loss," he said in an interview.

Mr Prince has shifted Citigroup's focus onto organic growth, following the deal-making of his predecessor, Sandy Weill. Moreover, most large potential targets look expensive, particularly given Citigroup's own depressed stock price.

"Transactions of size, here in the US especially, are priced at levels that are not attractive to most people," he said.

Executives have said privately that Citigroup would have liked to get involved in the $35bn battle for control of UFJ, the Japanese bank, but decided against. This was as much due to its particular problems in Japan as the Fed ban.

Mr Prince said its acquisition strategy was concentrated on medium-sized deals that "extend the franchise", particularly in Asia, eastern Europe and other emerging markets, he added.

In contrast, Western Europe was "uninviting" because of the "Balkanised" regulatory regimes.

Citigroup this week lost out in the auction for Finansbank in Turkey which is being acquired by National Bank of Greece with an offer valuing Finansbank at $5bn. "Turkey is a very interesting country. But we are very focused on not overpaying for transactions," said Mr Prince.

Analysts believe the relatively small size of the deal meant it would not have been covered by the Fed ban on Citigroup, which has a market value of $240bn, undertaking "significant expansion".

The Fed letter, from William Rutledge, excutive vice president, was dated April 3, three days after the Australian regulator announced it was taking action against Citigroup for insider dealing and failing to manage conflicts of interest.

The timing suggests that the Fed is not too concerned by the Australian regulator's move which Citigroup claims is an attack on accepted industry practice.

Citigroup shares gained 1.7 per cent, or 80 cents, to close at $48.21.

Citigroup Is Cleared To Pursue Deals (WSJ)

By Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

The Federal Reserve cleared Citigroup Inc. to pursue future acquisitions, lifting a yearlong restriction that was imposed following a string of scandals and regulatory missteps at the financial-services company.

In a letter sent late Monday to Charles Prince, the company's chief executive, William L. Rutledge, executive vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, said that Citigroup had made "significant progress" by implementing new internal compliance and risk-management programs, and therefore "the understanding that you would refrain from significant expansion is no longer in operation."

The Fed issued its unusual prohibition in March 2005, demanding that Citigroup get its house in order following a string of problems, including run-ins with regulators over a bond-trading strategy in Europe -- that its traders dubbed "Dr. Evil" -- and activities that led to the loss of its private-banking license in Japan.

The Fed's letter came just days after securities regulators in Australia accused Citigroup of insider trading. Citigroup has denied any wrongdoing and says it will "vigorously defend" its actions. While Citigroup executives and a team of in-house regulators from the Fed stay in regular contact, it is unclear whether the Fed considered the merits of the lawsuit filed by the Australian regulators before lifting the ban on acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0025348

A spokeswoman for the New York Fed declined to comment.

Citigroup spent the better part of 2005 implementing what Mr. Prince dubbed his "five-point plan," a roadmap aimed at strengthening internal controls, employee training and communications within the bank.

Mr. Prince, who will add the title of chairman later this month, reacted to the long-awaited news from the Fed by sending a companywide letter yesterday morning thanking Citigroup's 300,000 employees scattered around the world for their efforts. "Today we continue toward our goal of becoming the world's most respected global financial-services company." Mr. Prince wrote. "I am confident of the course we have set, and excited about our future."

Still, in an interview, the CEO said he cautioned the company's top executives in an address, "Be careful. This was not a one-year plan. It is not as if we are done."

Speculation has circulated for months that the Fed might soon loosen the reins on the New York-based bank after it became widely known that the company had entered the bidding for an estimated $3 billion majority stake in Guangdong Development Bank in China and a separate purchase of Finansbank, Turkey's eighth-largest bank by assets. Over the weekend, it was disclosed that the much smaller National Bank of Greece had beaten out Citigroup in the bidding for Finansbank.

The Fed's Mr. Rutledge said in his letter that regulators would continue to "carefully review any expansion proposal undertaken by Citigroup."

Mr. Prince, who took over as chief executive in October 2003, has told investors that 2006 is the year that the new management team he has assembled must execute and improve the company's bottom line. To do that, Mr. Prince and his team will have to expand its business in foreign markets, the company's top priority, and improve the operation of its consumer business in the U.S.

Expectations by some investors that Citigroup will once again flex its financial muscle by going on a major acquisition spree will likely be disappointed. Mr. Prince said in the interview that the Fed's letter didn't alter his commitment to expand the financial institution, which has $1.5 trillion in assets, by generating more profits from its existing businesses and expanding its reach to more customers overseas and domestically.

"It does not change our priorities," Mr. Prince said. "We are just too big to just rely only on deals."

However, Mr. Prince did say that deal-making isn't totally out of the question for Citigroup, a company with more than $28 billion in cash on its books at the end of last year. As examples of the types of deals Citigroup might do, Mr. Prince pointed to the company's April 2004 purchase of South Korea's KorAm Bank Co. for $2.7 billion; the purchase less than a year later of the 106-branch First American Bank in Texas for an undisclosed sum; and the acquisition earlier this year of OnTrade Inc., an electronic-trading platform bought for about $8 million.

In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Citigroup's shares were up 80 cents to $48.21.

Arcelor Transfers Dofasco Unit To Block Takeover (WSJ)

By Jason Singer and Charles Fleming

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Arcelor SA transferred its lucrative Canadian operations to a Dutch foundation in an effort to block a €20.4 billion ($24.8 billion) hostile offer by rival steelmaker Mittal Steel Co., a move that drew rebukes from Arcelor shareholders and corporate-governance activists.

Arcelor also raised its dividend by 54% to €1.85 a share and said it will make a special payment to shareholders of $5 billion after Mittal drops its bid or the takeover attempt fails. The two payouts are meant to make siding with Arcelor financially equivalent to accepting Mittal's bid, boiling the choice down to which management team investors prefer.

Mittal vowed to press on with its bid, which has sparked debate over national pride, cultural compatibility and economic openness across Europe and in other parts of the world. But Mittal, based in Rotterdam, the Netherlands, said it would reduce the cash portion of its cash-and-stock bid because it considers the increased dividend an advance, though it hasn't yet disclosed details.

DOJ_NMG_0025349

Many shareholders reacted angrily to Arcelor's move to prevent its Dofasco Inc. unit of Ontario, Canada, from being sold even if Mittal succeeds in its bid for Arcelor. They said the action is contrary to Arcelor's promises to let shareholders be the ultimate arbiters of Mittal's offer. Still, other observers said the moves could frustrate Mittal's efforts.

Arcelor's transfer is "against shareholders' interests," said Gérard Augustin-Normand, chief executive of Richelieu Finance, an investment fund based in Paris that holds about three million Arcelor shares. "It's also against Arcelor's own interests because its shareholders were its best defense," he added. "I was confident that it was going to be a fair fight, but now I'm not so sure."

Mittal, the world's largest steelmaker by production, launched its bid for Arcelor, the industry's No. 2 player, earlier this year. The two sides have since been waging aggressive campaigns to woo shareholders, with Arcelor Chief Executive Guy Dollé at one point suggesting Mittal lacks "European cultural values"; Mittal's chief executive, Lakshmi Mittal, whose family controls the company, was born in India but is based in London.

In Paris trading yesterday, Arcelor fell slightly to €32.50. Mittal fell 3.6% to €31.10 in Amsterdam. Based on Mittal's closing price yesterday, the bid values Arcelor at €31.93 a share.

Arcelor's higher dividend and one-time payout combined roughly total the cash portion of Mittal's offer and some of the savings Mittal would bring to a combined company. Tony Taccone, a steel consultant at Pittsburgh's First River, said Arcelor's dividend increase could placate some investors, while the increase and the Dofasco transfer could make the deal more difficult for Mittal to consummate.

Mr. Dollé has repeatedly but vaguely made reference to a plan Arcelor had for Dofasco that Arcelor hoped would scupper a deal. Dofasco is important because under Mittal's offer, Dofasco would be sold to Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG for 5.4 billion Canadian dollars (US$4.6 billion) if the takeover of Arcelor is successful. Selling Dofasco would help Mittal finance the cash portion of its Arcelor bid and help ease any antitrust concerns in the North American market, where Mittal already has a significant presence.

People close to the matter said Mittal and its advisers were looking at potential legal challenges to Arcelor's move, which would be prohibited in many European countries, including the United Kingdom and France, but is allowed in Luxembourg. Mittal may also try to renegotiate a sale of Dofasco's management control and financial access -- the elements still controlled by Arcelor -- to ThyssenKrupp while leaving ownership of the shares in the trust. It isn't clear whether such a transfer would satisfy regulators or what price ThyssenKrupp would pay for those rights.

Yesterday Mittal said that its bid doesn't hinge on the sale of Dofasco to ThyssenKrupp and that it will continue its quest to acquire Arcelor. "Nothing in this announcement alters our resolve or ability to proceed with our offer," Mittal said. "Today's announcement by the board of Arcelor goes against the interests of its own shareholders and is an attempt to deprive them of the right to decide on the merits of Mittal Steel's offer."

A ThyssenKrupp spokesman declined to comment.

Arcelor said it transferred ownership of Dofasco to a newly formed Dutch foundation, even though Arcelor maintains management control and all financial rights to Dofasco. The trust, called Strategic Steel Stichting, is run by a board of three Arcelor appointees: an Arcelor executive, a former Arcelor executive and Allan A. Tuttle, an American lawyer and former general counsel of Gucci Group NV. The trio has the power to determine whether Dofasco can be sold for the next five years.

Arcelor Chief Financial Officer Gonzalo Urquijo said the company made the transfer "to defend shareholders" from a potential sale of Dofasco because the Canadian company is integral to Arcelor's business strategy. "This was done in the interest of our shareholders." Corporate-governance activists scoffed at that assertion. "All the assets of a company should be able to be bought or sold," said Colette Neuville, founder and president of French minority-shareholder defense movement ADAM.

Netflix Sues Blockbuster Over Web Expansion (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- Online DVD rental service Netflix Inc. on Tuesday accused Blockbuster Inc. of illegally copying its ideas in a patent infringement lawsuit challenging the video store chain's recent Internet expansion.

DOJ_NMG_0025350

The complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in San Francisco, focuses largely on the online wish lists that prioritize the DVD desires of about 5.4 million people who subscribe to either Netflix or Blockbuster's Internet service.

Netflix also believes its patents cover perhaps its most popular feature -- the option of renting a DVD for an unlimited time without incurring late fees.

That change, introduced by Netflix seven years ago, became so popular that Blockbuster last year stopped charging late fees for tardy rental returns to its video stores. Dallas-based Blockbuster once pocketed hundreds of millions of dollars annually from those late fees.

Both Netflix and Blockbuster's online service charge $17.99 per month to rent up to three DVDs at a time. When subscribers return a DVD in a postage-paid envelope, the rental services automatically send the next available movie on their wish lists.

Blockbuster initially denigrated the flat-fee concept, but then reversed course and launched its Internet service in 2004 after scores of customers defected to Netflix, based in Los Gatos, Calif.

"Blockbuster has been willfully and deliberately copying Netflix's business methods," Netflix spokesman Steve Swasey said.

Blockbuster spokesman Randy Hargrove declined to comment Tuesday because the company hadn't yet seen the suit.

Netflix contends it first patented the process for managing DVD wish lists -- known as queues -- in June 2003.

A second patent issued Tuesday to Netflix apparently triggered the lawsuit. Netflix believes the additional patent covers an even wider range of automated interaction with its customers.

Netflix hopes to obtain a court order that would force Blockbuster to change the way its online rental service operates or require the company to pay patent royalties -- a potentially huge bill, based on other recent patent disputes.

For instance, the maker of the popular Blackberry email device last month agreed to pay $612.5 million to settle a long-running patent infringement case.

Because patent cases often delve into highly technical issues, they can take several years to wind through the legal system.

If Netflix prevails, it could thwart its biggest competitor in the steadily growing field of online DVD rentals.

Netflix began the year with about 4.2 million subscribers. Blockbuster has signed up about 1.2 million online customers so far. Netflix's success already has hurt Blockbuster, which lost $588 million last year and expects to continue to close stores as more DVD renters turn to the Internet.

In contrast, Netflix earned $42 million last year. But its service has been recently fending off a backlash triggered by a class-action lawsuit that focused attention on a scoring system that penalizes its most frequent renters. Netflix is awaiting court approval of a proposed settlement that would give free DVDs for a month to millions of former and current subscribers.

Authorities Raid Color Line Ferry Company (AP-Y2)

AP2, April 5, 2006

European competition authorities on Tuesday raided the headquarters of Norway's Color Line AS ferry company as part of an antitrust investigation.

The surprise inspection was to check for possible competition violations by the Norwegian ferry operator, the EFTA Surveillance Authority, or ESA, said in a statement.

"Surprise inspections are a preliminary step in antitrust investigations. The fact that the EFTA Surveillance Authority carries out an inspection does not mean that the company is guilty of anticompetitive behavior," the ESA said.

ESA is the enforcement arm of the European Free Trade Association, or EFTA. Through treaties with the European Union, EFTA members Norway, Iceland and Liechtenstein have open markets with the 25-nation European bloc even though they are not members.

Color Line spokesman Helge Otto Mathisen said the company was cooperating fully with the ESA inspectors, who were assisted by the Norwegian Competition Authority.

"Such a review of documentation is a normal practice when competition authorities want insights in the market," he said.

Oslo-based Color Line is a major European ferry line, with 3,500 employees in four countries, 10 ships and seven international routes between Norway, Denmark, Germany and Sweden.

DOJ_NMG_0025351

The group said it transports about 4.2 million passengers and nearly 1 million motor vehicles per year, and has annual revenue of about 4 billion kroner ($615 million).

___

On the Net:

http://www.eftasurv.int

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Air-toxics Plan Sparks Internal Rift (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

The Environmental Protection Agency has drafted a plan that would allow so much extra industrial air pollution that 7 of 10 of the agency's own regional air-quality directors have signed on to a memo condemning it.

While disagreement on policy issues is not unusual, former EPA officials say the regional directors used particularly strong language in criticizing the plan developed on William Wehrum's watch in a December memo, which surfaced Monday.

The stinging internal criticism is likely to pop up Wednesday at Senate confirmation hearings for Mr. Wehrum, who is nominated to become the nation's top air-quality officer.

The plan proposes loosening limits on toxic emissions from scores of industrial sectors, including refineries, chemical plants, steel mills, and smelters.

The changes, the memo said, would "essentially negate" today's limits on industry toxic air emissions like arsenic, mercury, and lead, also called "hazardous air pollutants" or "air toxics."

Such poisons are considered by the Clean Air Act to be far more dangerous to public health than air pollutants like nitrous oxides or sulfur dioxide.

Under today's requirements, any facility emitting more than 10 tons per year of a single toxin, or 25 tons of several toxins, must install pollution control equipment to cut emissions by as much as 95 percent. The new plan would allow large polluters that previously had brought emissions down below the 25-ton limit - say, to 2-3 tons - to boost emissions, as long as they remained under 25 tons.

Criticizing the plan as an unjustified "drastic change" in emissions rules, the memo cites Wehrum's office for a "trend of excluding" regional offices from rule and policy development that was "disturbing."

If adopted, some environmentalists say the new plan would blow open the most significant new hole in the Clean Air Act since the Bush administration's reinterpretation of the act's "new source review" provision, which curbed power plant emissions.

That interpretation was struck down by the US Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia last month.

"Wehrum is the architect of a lot of changes to the Clean Air Act that have weakened environmental protections," says Eric Schaeffer, director of the Environmental Integrity Project in New York, former head of the EPA's office of regulatory enforcement until 2002. "This new proposal on toxics pushes past science, law, and fair public process."

An EPA spokesman says it's too early to assess the policy proposal.

"This is a preliminary draft that is currently under development and internal review which could change before EPA issues it as a proposal," said John Millett, an EPA spokesman in an e-mailed statement. "EPA will seek public comment when it issues the proposal."

Still, some like what they've been hearing about the draft so far.

The proposed change is "good news" for health and the environment, said Bob Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "Without the proposal, power disincentives would exist to make these [pollution] reductions," he said in a statement.

But enforcement could be a problem. The regional directors memo calls "unfounded and overly optimist" the new plan's contention that toxic emissions are unlikely to rise since industry will want to "avoid negative publicity" and "maintain their appearance as responsible businesses."

DOJ_NMG_0025352

Instead, "the cost of the increased [toxic] emissions would be borne by the communities surrounding the sources," the memo concludes.

"It's pretty clear this plan is out of bounds," says John Walke, clean air director for the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington. "It's also clear the regional directors found it to be extreme."

Feds Want To Expand Yucca Nuclear Dump (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

The Bush administration wants to bury tens of thousands of tons more nuclear waste at the Yucca Mountain dump in Nevada than now allowed — part of a package of new proposals meant to spur development of the controversial and long-delayed dump.

The Energy Department proposed lifting the 77,000-ton storage limit on the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas and allowing as much waste as the facility can hold.

That figure has been estimated by federal environmental impact studies at 132,000 tons. About 55,000 tons of nuclear waste are waiting at utility sites around the country.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, an opponent of the dump, said the bill was “not even on life support. It's dead when it gets here.”

Yucca Mountain was approved by Congress in 2002 and was to open in 2010. The opening date has been repeatedly delayed and is now expected in 2015 or later.

The deputy press secretary for the Department of Homeland Security was arrested for using the Internet to seduce what he thought was a 14-year-old girl, according to a statement by the Polk County Sheriff's Office in Florida.

Brian Doyle, 55, was arrested at his residence in Silver Spring, Md., after an incident that allegedly occurred March 14. The “girl” was an undercover computer crimes detective in Polk County, according to a sheriff's statement.

Doyle could not be reached. Homeland Security press secretary Russ Knocke said: “We take these allegations very seriously, and we will cooperate fully.”

Caspar Weinberger, who died last week at 88, was given a special military funeral at Arlington National Cemetery following a memorial service at the Fort Myer Memorial Chapel across the Potomac River from Washington. He was Defense secretary under President Reagan in the 1980s.

Among those attending was former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, 80, who has rarely appeared in public after suffering a series of small strokes. Weinberger supported her decision to dispatch British forces to take back the Falkland Islands after they were invaded by Argentina in 1982.

Former secretary of State Colin Powell told mourners, who included Weinberger's widow, Jane, that Weinberger's life “rested on a bedrock of beliefs.”

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said Weinberger “made changes that restored pride in our country's uniform and helped win the Cold War.”

Justin Berry, who for five years starred in his own Web cam child pornography business, told the House Energy and Commerce Committee that the Justice Department is moving too slowly to round up 1,500 pedophiles whose information he surrendered last year. Berry, 19, said the names, credit card numbers and other details he provided has resulted in only one arrest.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would not discuss Berry's case but said there has been a threefold increase in federal prosecutions of child pornography and abuse cases over the past decade.

Congress Is Asked To Set Opening Of Nuclear Dump (WSJ)

By John Fialka

Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Energy Department, hoping to spur development of the nuclear-waste repository being built at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, is calling on Congress to set a timetable for opening the facility and enlarging its capacity.

DOJ_NMG_0025353

"We need an expansion of nuclear power in this country," said Clay Sell, the department's deputy director, who said the changes will help speed the construction of a new generation of nuclear power plants, increase domestic energy supplies and reduce air pollution.

Controversy over the facility, originally scheduled to open around 1997, and dogged opposition from Nevada's congressional delegation has resulted in a series of delays.

Mr. Sell said the proposal, if approved by Congress, would make it easier for the department to tap billions of dollars of fees, collected from utilities with nuclear power plants, to provide the $700 million to $800 million a year to finance the remaining work at the facility.

The proposal asks Congress to raise the legal limit on the capacity of the mountain's usable storage space from 70,000 to 120,000 metric tons. (A metric ton equals 2,204 pounds.) The enlargement would accommodate one of the administration's longer range plans to remove and reuse parts of the spent fuel, leaving a relatively small percentage of waste for permanent storage. Without the reduction, the department has estimated, it might need at least six more permanent storage sites.

Cleanup At West Valley Faces Legal Challenge (Times Herald)

By RICK MILLER

Times Herald, April 5, 2006

The New York State Energy Research and Development Authority has authorized a lawsuit against the U.S. Department of Energy over the nuclear cleanup at the West Valley Demonstration Project.

"The Department of Energy has taken a very limited view of its responsibility to clean up nuclear wastes at West Valley," said Vincent Delorio, Authority chairman.

"We have been working for 10 years to convince the Feds to live up to their obligations, but have been unable to reach agreement," Mr. Delorio said.

"We're very concerned that DOE is cutting the budget and the work force at West Valley when there is a great deal more work to do," he said. "DOE seems to be planning an early departure and we don't want the taxpayers of New York state left holding the bag."

Last June, U.S. Rep. John R. "Randy" Kuhl, R-Hammondsport, introduced a bill authorizing the Department of Energy to take over the site in the northern Cattaraugus County town of Ashford and spend $95 million a year to completely clean up the entire site.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission also would be given authority over DOE activities at the site.

U.S. Reps. Brian Higgins, D-Buffalo, Thomas Reynolds, R-Clarence, and Sherwood Boehlert, R-New Hartford, are co-sponsors of the legislation. U.S. Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Charles Schumer introduced an identical bill in the Senate.

Bob Van Wicklin, a spokesman for Rep. Kuhl, told The Times Herald today, "It's unfortunate that New York has to go this route to get the Department of Energy's attention but we're running out of options and the West Valley question must be answered."

He said, "Congressman Kuhl will still try to move his bill through Congress and supports NYSERDA's efforts to clarify the situation on the courts as well. The Department (of Energy) could avoid a costly court mess by just coming to the negotiating table with New York."

The Times Herald was unable to reach DOE officials at the West Valley site for comment this morning.

The Department of Energy broke off negotiations with NYSERDA at the end of President Bill Clinton's Administration after more than two years of talks. Efforts to move the talks forward since then have been unsuccessful.

The DOE has reduced the funding levels for cleanup activities and staffing levels at the West Valley Demonstration Project to about $70 million this year.

The site of the country's first commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing plant, it was operated by Nuclear Fuel Services Inc. from 1966 to 1972 when operations were discontinued. In 1976, NFS informed state officials it would leave the site when its lease expired in 1980.

DOJ_NMG_0025354

The plant separated reusable uranium and plutonium from spent fuel rods, primarily from the federal nuclear weapons reactor at Hanford, Wash., as well as other nuclear power plants.

The 1980 West Valley Demonstration Project Act authorized clean-up of the site with the federal government paying 90 percent of the cost and New York state paying 10 percent.

At the end of 2004, the project had succeeded in converting more than 600,000 gallons of highly radioactive liquid waste stored in underground tanks at the site into 275 glass logs now stored in 10-foot high stainless steel cylinders.

One of the areas of disagreement has always been the disposition of the underground tanks. The state has asked that the tanks, which contain a radioactive residue, be removed from the site, while the Department of Energy is proposing to fill them with a concrete-like grout.

The DOE also wants to demolish nuclear fuel reprocessing buildings, fill them with grout and leave them at the site.

NY May Sue US Govt To Get W Valley Nuclear Site Cleaned (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

BUFFALO, N.Y. (AP)--The state is prepared to take the federal government to court to end an impasse over cleanup and long-term management of the West Valley nuclear site, which once housed the nation's only commercial nuclear fuel reprocessing operation.

Talks between New York and the U.S. Department of Energy stalled during the Clinton administration. Now, with the DOE cutting staff and funding at the site, state energy officials worry the federal agency is getting ready to leave.

"DOE seems to be planning an early departure, and we don't want the taxpayers of New York state left holding the bag," said Vincent Delorio, chairman of the New York State Energy Research & Development Authority.

The agency this week authorized litigation to determine the federal government's responsibility at the Cattaraugus County site 30 miles south of Buffalo.

From 1966 to 1972, spent nuclear fuel from commercial nuclear power plants and DOE sites was chopped and dissolved, and its uranium and plutonium were extracted. The operation shut down for upgrades in 1972 but remained closed after stricter regulatory requirements passed during the closure made the prospect of reopening too expensive.

The 1980 West Valley Demonstration Project Act passed by Congress obligated the DOE to decontaminate and decommission facilities at the state-owned site, with the state pitching in on the cost.

Since 1981, West Valley Nuclear Services Co., the DOE's onsite contractor, has solidified and stored more than 600,000 gallons of high-level liquid radioactive waste, while shipping low-level waste off site. More than 300,000 cubic feet of low-level waste was removed last year.

"As past performance shows, the U.S. Department of Energy remains committed to meeting the requirements of the West Valley Demonstration Project Act," the DOE said in a statement issued Tuesday in response to the NYSERDA action. "... Overall, DOE has reduced the volume of legacy waste at the West Valley Demonstration Project by 70% in the last few years."

Legislation proposed by Rep. John "Randy" Kuhl would update the 1980 law and require the federal government to take ownership of the site and full responsibility for its cleanup. The bill would end the state's financial obligation, which has totaled more than $200 million.

NYSERDA views legal action as a last resort that would be pursued if face-to-face negotiations and the legislation were to fail, officials said.

"The progress of the legislation is uncertain, and we feel compelled to proceed simultaneously along the litigation track to make sure that we get these responsibility issues resolved so that we can move forward with the cleanup," NYSERDA President Peter Smith said.

"It's unfortunate that New York has to go this route just to get the DOE's attention, but we're running out of options," said Bob Van Wicklin, a spokesman for Kuhl, R-N.Y.

The DOE last week said it would award a contract for continued cleanup at West Valley in the coming months. West Valley Nuclear Services spokesman Terry Dunford said the company, which has held the contract since 1981, would seek to continue its work there.

DOJ_NMG_0025355

AK Steel Settles 6-year-old Environmental Lawsuit With Federal And Ohio EPAs (MIDDJOUR)

Middletown (OH) Journal, April 5, 2006

Steelmaker plans to spend $13 million to clean up two streams

AK Steel Corp. will launch a nearly $13 million effort to clean up two streams contaminated with "significant" toxins as part of an agreement reached with federal and Ohio environmental protection agencies to settle a six-year-old lawsuit, the company and government officials announced Monday.

The settlement — filed in the U.S. District Court for Southern District in Cincinnati Monday morning — addresses claims that AK Steel violated the federal Clean Water, Clean Air and Resource Conservation and Recovery acts, as well as, Ohio environmental regulations in and surrounding its 2,700-acre Middletown Works.

The 103-page federal consent degree ends decades of contamination from Middletown Works, according to Sue Ellen Wooldridge, assistant Attorney General for the U.S. Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division.

"By removing contamination from the areas currently known to contain significant polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB) concentration, AK Steel will immediately begin cleanup work to protect the environment and reduce the potential for human exposure to PCBs," Wooldridge said.

As part of the agreement, AK Steel will pay $460,000 in civil penalties to be split equally between the state of Ohio and U.S. governments. AK Steel also will spend an additional $750,000 on an "environmentally beneficial project that will remove ozone-depleting refrigerants from certain equipment at the plant."

The agreement resolves claims filed June 2000 by the federal and Ohio Environmental Protection Agencies, the Sierra Club and the Natural Resources Defense Council. The groups claimed Middletown Works posed a threat to human health and the environment. For its part, AK Steel has agreed to pay $450,000 to the two citizen groups for their claim for costs and attorney fees.

The Curtis Street-based steelmaker signed the settlement without "admissions or findings of such violations," according to a press release issued by the company.

The agreement, which is before U.S. District Judge Herman Weber, becomes official after a 30-day comment period, the U.S. EPA said.

AK Steel will launch its clean-up efforts after the settlement is approved, said Alan McCoy, AK's vice president for government and public relations.

Part of the cleanup effort requires AK Steel to test portions of the soil for PCB contamination around Dicks Creek and its Monroe Ditch — tributaries to the Great Miami River — and to remove contaminated soils from adjacent floodplain areas.

"I'm gratified that AK Steel, government and citizens have been able to agree on a solution to address difficult issues which have gone unresolved for many years," said Joseph Koncelik, director of the Ohio EPA. "As a result of the hard work of all involved, we can look forward to leaving our children a cleaner, safe environment."

'Landmark agreement'

James Wainscott, AK Steel's chairman, president and CEO, hailed the news as a "landmark agreement."

"This agreement, and the investigation and clean-up work that will follow, is yet another tangible example of AK Steel's commitment to the environment, improved relationships and to the citizens of Middletown and its surrounding communities."

Contamination of the creek has long been a focus of community concern because of the access children have to the area, said Marilyn Wall, conservation chair for the Sierra Club's Ohio chapter.

Wall said the steelmaker has taken a positive step in vowing to test for PCBs around the creek and commended the company's involvement of Middletown residents in the cleanup process. PCBs once were widely used to insulate electrical equipment, but the government banned their production in 1979 because of studies linking them to cancer and other health problems for fish, wildlife and humans.

"It's unusual that citizens get a chance to be part of the discussion process," Wall said.

Thomas V. Skinner, U.S. EPA Region 5 Administrator, said the settlement will resolve several environmental issues the government has pursued against AK Steel.

DOJ_NMG_0025356

"It is the culmination of six years of litigation and negotiations," he said. "This settlement will result in environmental improvements in Dicks Creek basin for Middletown-area residents and workers at the AK Steel plant."

The steelmaker will spend at least $750,000 for an environmental project focused on replacing ozone depleting refrigerants with non ozone-depleting refrigerants at Middletown Works, McCoy said.

The lawsuit was first filed June 29, 2000, on behalf of the U.S. EPA for environmental allegations. The next day, Ohio filed a similar lawsuit. The court combined the actions, and since then, has dismissed some of the claims, including several air pollution claims. In 2003, Judge Weber allowed the Sierra Club and the National Resources Defense Council to join the lawsuit.

The settlement comes almost two years after AK Steel announced a similar settlement with the Ohio EPA.

In March 2004, AK Steel settled air nuisance claims with the Ohio EPA by agreeing to install new air pollution controls on its Middletown ironmaking and steelmaking facilities.

The controls — dubbed MACT for "maximum achievable control technology"— satisfy new federal requirements, McCoy said.

Ahead of schedule

AK Steel installed the first of those controls on its Middletown blast furnace last May, nearly a year ahead of the federal deadline. It had been fined $1.7 million, but received credits worth $1.3 million toward the penalty by agreeing to install the equipment sooner than required by the federal Clean Air Act.

Next month, McCoy said the steelmaker will complete the upgrade of pollution controls by installing the same controls on its Middletown basic oxygen furnace.

Since 2003, AK Steel has spent more than $370 million for environmental capital investment projects and compliance costs across the corporation, including $66 million to install new air emission controls on the ironmaking and steelmaking furnaces, McCoy said.

When fully operational, the new air emission controls are expected to capture 900 tons of non-hazardous dust emissions a year that would have resulted in offsite emissions into surrounding neighborhoods.

This is the second settlement AK Steel has reached with the EPA. In December 2004, the steelmaker reached a $1.2 million settlement for pollution violations at its steel plant in Butler, Pa.

Under that consent decree, AK Steel agreed to pay a $300,000 penalty and undertook $900,000 worth of projects to reduce smog-producing ozone in Pennsylvania, which went beyond federal and state environment regulations.

AK Steel (AKS) rose 0.07 cents to close at $15.07 Monday on the New York Stock Exchange.

Contact Meghan Crosby at (513) 705-2813, or e-mail her at mcrosby@coxohio.com.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

7 In Colombia Face U.S. Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Seven drug-smuggling suspects, including five Colombian police officers and an airline employee, have been arrested in Bogota in connection with the shipment of more than $10 million in cocaine to the United States, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said yesterday.

An indictment handed up in the case and unsealed yesterday accused the seven of smuggling the cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota for importation into the United States, said DEA Special Agent-in-Charge John P. Gilbride.

"Narcoterrorism is a real threat to the security of the United States, and we must never let our guard down," Mr. Gilbride said.

"This operation sends a strong signal to traffickers worldwide that the international drug-enforcement community will continue to aggressively pursue any potential compromise to airport security."

DOJ_NMG_0025357

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne in Washington said the arrests were part of Operation Caso Dorado, a joint undercover investigation by DEA agents in New York and Bogota, the U.S. attorney's office in New York, agents from U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities.

"More than ever, the public must be able to rely on the integrity of the law-enforcement and airline personnel responsible for the safety of airline passengers and shipments," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in New York.

"When such officials allow smuggling of contraband destined for the United States, they violate our criminal laws and endanger our national security, and they will face justice in an American courtroom."

Named in the indictment were Leonidas Molina-Triana, a former major in the Colombian National Police (CNP); Juan Carlos Cardona, a former CNP captain; Jaime Enrique-Padilla, a former CNP lieutenant; Jorge Plazas-Silva, a CNP patrolman; Humberto Avila, a CNP patrolmen; Maria Christina Marin-Castro, an employee of Avianca Airlines; and Henry Ferro-Varon.

They were accused of conspiracy to distribute cocaine shipments through El Dorado Airport en route to the United States.

If convicted, the seven face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison.

According to the indictment, representatives of Colombia's notorious Norte Valle drug cartel, including former high-ranking Colombian police officials, recruited active members of the Colombian police responsible for El Dorado Airport security operations and Avianca Airlines employees at El Dorado Airport's cargo facility to permit the smuggling of cocaine from Colombia to Mexico and ultimately into the United States.

The indictment said that in October, corrupt Colombian police officials and Avianca Airlines employees permitted 900 pounds of cocaine worth more than $10 million on the streets of New York City to pass through security at the Avianca Airlines cargo facility at El Dorado Airport without detection.

7 Arrested In Cocaine Smuggling Ring (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Active and retired police and army officers working for one of Colombia's largest cocaine cartels used commercial cargo planes to ship drugs to the United States, authorities said Tuesday in announcing seven arrests.

U.S. officials, who are seeking the extradition of the seven, said the case illustrates the reaches of Colombia's notorious drug rings and the danger posed by corruption among the country's security and transportation workers.

Among those arrested are a retired police major and captain, a former army lieutenant, two police officers and an employee of Colombia's national airline, Avianca. The seventh suspect was described as a liaison between the active and former police officials and the Norte del Valle cartel, one of Colombia's largest drug traffickers. Police said the cartel used Avianca's cargo plans to transport the drugs.

"There is a national security component to this case," said Boyd Johnson, chief of the international narcotics trafficking unit at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Manhattan.

Authorities said the seven would be extradited to New York to stand trial on charges they smuggled more than 900 pounds of cocaine bound for the United States. Police said they seized 1,200 pounds of cocaine linked to the cartel in a warehouse in northern Bogota on Monday.

The arrests, beginning Monday night, were based on a U.S. indictment in New York that alleges the Norte del Valle cartel recruited the airline worker and police involved with security at El Dorado Airport.

It alleges the ring shipped the cocaine in October through Avianca's cargo facility after an airline employee approved false paperwork. The drugs were allegedly destined for the United States via Mexico.

Two patrolmen let the shipment go through security and guarded it for three days at the airline cargo area, the indictment alleges. The cocaine noted in the indictment was seized in Mexico City by Mexican law enforcement agencies on Oct. 17, it adds.

If convicted, the defendants could face anywhere from 10 years to life in prison, though the United States has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from there.

DOJ_NMG_0025358

Colombia is the world's largest producer of cocaine. In the last four years, nearly 350 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to stand trial on drug trafficking charges.

The Norte del Valle cocaine cartel is considered to be one of the largest mafias operating in Colombia. One of its leaders, Diego Montoya, sits alongside Osama Bin Laden on the FBI's ten-most-wanted list.

Associated Press writer Nahal Toosi in New York contributed to this report.

8 Charged In Cocaine Smuggling CaseOperation Used Airliners Headed Into New York, Officials Say (CNN)

CNN, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Eight people, including seven current or former Colombian police officers, have been charged in an alleged plot to smuggle $10 million worth of cocaine into New York on airliners, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

The officers and an employee of the Colombian airline Avianca are in custody in Colombia, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. attorney's office in New York.

The indictment in the case alleges that between August and December of last year members of a Colombian cartel recruited police officials responsible for airport security and airline employees to allow drugs to be smuggled from Colombia to Mexico and, ultimately, the United States.

The arrests were the result of a joint investigation by the DEA and the U.S. attorney's office in New York along with Colombian and Mexican officials.

Meanwhile, the Justice Department has reached a settlement with Avianca requiring it to take several measures to stop what officials call repeated seizures of illegal drugs from its flights into John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York, CNN has learned.

The agreement is being filed in U.S. District Court in New York after an attempt to seize some of the airline's interests.

Officials said the required measures include hiring a private agency to monitor the airline's anti-smuggling efforts concerning drugs, explosives and weapons.

CNN's Kevin Bohn contributed to this report.

Prosecutor: Colombian Smugglers Reveal Air Travel Vulnerability (WNYC)

WNYC, April 4, 2006

A top federal prosecutor says the arrests of five current or former Colombian police officers and an employee of Avianca Airlines in a drug smuggling case raises concerns about the vulnerability of the nation's skies.

Boyd Johnson, of the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan, says the smugglers used Avianca jets, which fly to New York daily. He added authorities obviously have lot of concern about that and the damage that can cause.

Federal prosecutors and drug enforcement officials say the ring tried to smuggle more than $10 million worth of cocaine to the United States through Mexico.

DEA Investigates Oceanside Humane Society North County Humane Society Had Three Visits From DEA (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, April 4, 2006

OCEANSIDE, Calif. -- One of the county's oldest animal organizations is under investigation, 10News reported.

The Federal Drug Enforcement Agency is investigating Oceanside's North County Humane Society.

The North County Humane Society was founded nearly 70 years ago as a nonprofit organization -- funded mainly through private donations.

Like any other humane organization, it is subject to federal spot checks. The DEA conducted inspections in March and more information is expected.

A spokesperson for the DEA confirms agents conducted an investigation at the North County Humane Society regarding its handling of controlled substances. The DEA will not say what agents found, if anything.

According to a statement released by NCHS Tuesday afternoon, the DEA made three prearranged visits to the site and completed its review, but NCHS has not been notified of any conclusion to those visits.

10News visited Dr. Jennifer Luke, a veterinarian in Tierrasanta.

She is not associated with nor commenting on the NCHS case.

Luke did agree to explain how the DEA regulates controlled substances used at veterinary and humane facilities.

"I have to account for every CC in my vials," said Luke.

Luke says every office handling controlled substances must have an FDA-approved lock box permanently attached to something -- in her case, a concrete wall.

That box can only be opened with dual keys -- keys only Luke has access to.

A log book tracks every vial that comes into the office. Employees must see Luke when checking out drugs for a procedure.

When a drug leaves the cabinet, it's noted in a log book. Then each ounce of the drug used is also noted, which employee used it, which patient received it and how much. Why is the process so strict? Luke says it boils down to abuse.

NCHS also confirmed the recent resignation of executive director Stacy Steel, but calls it a separate event.

In her press release, board President Julie Moran said Steel was "invaluable to the growth and visibility of NCHS."

North County Humane Society Executive Director Resigns (NCT)

By PHILIP K. IRELAND

North County Times, April 5, 2006

OCEANSIDE ---- Officials with the North County Humane Society on Tuesday confirmed both the resignation of Executive Director Stacy Steel and an inquiry of the humane society by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

Steel could not be reached for comment on her March 25 resignation.

The DEA notified the humane society on March 8 that an "inquiry" had begun, the press release stated. Special agents completed "three prearranged site visits with the (North County Humane Society's) cooperation, and to our knowledge has completed its review."

The humane society has not been notified of the results or conclusions of those visits, the press release stated.

Special Agent Dan Simmons, a spokesman with the DEA, confirmed Tuesday that the animal shelter was the subject of an investigation, but declined to elaborate. Simmons would not say why or when the investigation began. He also declined to say if the investigation was a routine periodic inspection or an investigation launched as the result of specific allegations.

The press release lauded Steel's tenure with the shelter, saying she was "invaluable to the growth and visibility" of the humane society.

Humane society board president Julie Moran said Tuesday that Steel served as executive director for three years.

Both Moran and board member Linda Sabo declined to say why Steel resigned, referring all questions to Alexis Gutierrez, the humane society's attorney. Gutierrez said he could not comment on Steel's resignation.

The humane society is run by a seven-member board of directors that includes Moran, Sabo, Connie Hoban, Renee Simmons and Pamela Hower.

Hoban, reached by phone at her Carlsbad home on Monday, declined comment, referring all inquiries to Moran. Sabo said Tuesday that employees of the humane society would not comment either. Attempts to contact the other board members failed.

The humane society has been involved in several high-profile events recently. The organization is working with the city of Oceanside to build the city's first dog park. And it's also in the middle of $300,000 renovation of its cat adoption and isolation centers in the wake of an outbreak of panleukopenia, a highly contagious virus disease spread through the air or by contact. Outbreaks of Panleukopenia, caused by feline parvovirus, have killed hundreds of cats at the facility during the hot summer months in each of the last two years.

The society has redesigned its two cat centers to minimize cat-to-cat contact and cat-to-human-to-cat contact and to filter and refresh air in the buildings several times per hour. Construction of the facility is still under way.

The humane society is supported by public donations and contracts to provide animal control and animal rescue services for the cities of Oceanside and Vista. Of $2.2 million in total revenue collected by the humane society in 2004, $1.3 million came from city contracts. The animal shelter reported $773,334 in public donations, according to documents filed with the Internal Revenue Service.

DOJ_NMG_0025360

Father Says Daughter Acted To Avoid Prison (RTD)

By TOM CAMPBELL

Richmond (VA) Times Dispatch, April 5, 2006

Says she believed sex act with DEA agent would prevent term

The young woman, barely 18 and a new mother, did everything the feds asked her to do after she was arrested last year along with her crack-dealing boyfriend.

She pleaded guilty to drug conspiracy. She helped agents make controlled drug buys from dealers. She told them what she knew about illegal activities.

And when a special agent of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration asked her to, she performed oral sex on him last summer in a Glen Allen motel.

The Richmond-based DEA agent was William Carter Harden, who pleaded guilty March 28 in U.S. District Court to the crime of lying to a federal officer. According to court records, he denied having sex with the woman when his supervisors questioned him about it three separate times in October.

Harden, 46, faces a maximum prison term of five years at sentencing July 14. He resigned from the DEA the day before his guilty plea.

The young woman's father, James Morrow of Ashland, said his daughter told him Harden promised her he would keep her out of prison if she had sex with him. She had pleaded guilty by then, he said, but she remained free until October while working as an informant for federal prosecutors and investigators.

"She worked all through the whole thing, before and after she pleaded guilty," Morrow said, as well as before and after the incident with Harden. She knew she faced a potentially long prison sentence and she was "trying to help herself," he said.

Morrow said his daughter and her boyfriend, Christopher S. Sandridge, had been living in a Northern Virginia hotel room before they were arrested early last year. He said Sandridge was dealing crack and was the target of an investigation by Virginia State Police.

His daughter "lived in a hotel room where the guy was selling [crack], and she admitted that," Morrow said.

Both cases were later transferred to the federal court system. The daughter's case is sealed, so the court records are not available to the public. Her father said she was sentenced to serve six years in prison.

Records show Sandridge, now 23, was sentenced to serve 15 years in prison after pleading guilty to drug conspiracy and illegal firearm possession. He is in the U.S. penitentiary at Canaan, Pa.

James Morrow said his daughter told him that on July 22, the day of the sexual encounter, Harden picked her up and then stopped by the DEA office before driving her to the motel. Court records show it was the Knights Inn at 9002 Brook Road.

While Harden maintains the sex was consensual, the young woman has testified that she went through with it out of fear. Prosecutors say the government evidence could prove that the sex was meant to be payment for Harden keeping her out of prison.

The young woman "was convinced that she wasn't going to prison," her father said.

He said she was convinced of it right up to the October day when U.S. marshals arrived to take her into custody. She complained about Harden to the marshals and an investigation ensued.

He denied that he had sex with her. Records show that later Harden on five dates in October and November attempted to impede the investigation by interviewing employees at the motel about receipts, surveillance cameras and whether anyone remembered him staying there.

On Oct. 26, the records say, Harden "endeavored to persuade the desk clerk to withhold information from federal investigators."

DOJ_NMG_0025361

John L. Brownlee, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Virginia, said last week that Harden was not charged with additional crimes because his guilty plea "encompasses all the facts" of what he did. It means Harden, a 14-year veteran of the DEA, can never be a federal agent again.

Richmond is in the Eastern District, but to avoid conflict because Harden has worked with prosecutors here, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas J. Bondurant Jr. of Brownlee's office is prosecuting.

Morrow said he and his wife are caring for their daughter's child. His daughter recently turned 19 in a federal prison, he said.

According to a U.S. Bureau of Prisons Web site, she has a projected release date of August 2010.

Her father said her sentence may yet be reduced because of her cooperation with federal agents.

"My daughter's an angel," James Morrow said. "I definitely think [she]'s got something coming from all this."

Grover Beach Extends Ban On Medical Marijuana Shops (SLOT)

By Larissa Van Beurden-doust

San Luis Obispo Tribune, April 4, 2006

Grover Beach has extended its moratorium on medical marijuana dispensaries and has taken steps to make the ban permanent.

The council voted 5-0 Monday to extend the 180-day moratorium that would have expired April 19. Without the extension, there would have a period before a permanent ban was in place that would have allowed such dispensaries to be established within the city.

The council voted 4-1 to make the ban permanent. The soonest it could become affective is 30 days after a second vote on April 20.

Mayor Larry Versaw dissented. While he said he's strongly opposed to recreationally using marijuana or any drugs and thinks a dispensary could be extremely problematic, he didn't want to give the message that the city has forever closed the door on using marijuana medicinally.

"My mother died of cancer," Versaw said while trying to hold back tears. "I do believe that in her case and a lot of cases like hers, that marijuana could serve a purpose. If not curative, at least it would have eased her suffering."

-Larissa Van Beurden-Doust

News Briefs From California's Central Coast (AP)

By AP

The San Diego Union-Tribune, April 4, 2006

BUELLTON – The City Council will decide this month on a yearlong moratorium on new medical marijuana dispensaries.

During that year, City Manager Steve Thompson said, city officials would decide whether a permanent ban is needed. The city recently enacted a 45-day moratorium on new marijuana dispensaries.

"This is wait-and-see game," Thompson said. "This is an attempt to see what the federal and state governments are going to do with regard to conflicts between their laws."

In 1996, California voters approved medical marijuana use, but the federal government classifies marijuana, along with heroin and PCP, as an extremely dangerous substance with no medicinal value.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled last June that federal law trumps state law when it comes to enforcement.

There are two pot dispensaries in Buellton, including Hezekiah Inc. owned by Steve Allbritton. He has met with city officials and they are trying to work out a solution.

If the City Council decides to ban dispensaries permanently after studying zoning and health issues, "they would have to go," Councilman Dale Molesworth said.

"This is not the kind of thing you want spread all over the countryside,' Molesworth added.

"If they want to shut us down, it would be pretty sad. A lot of people need this service. We're the only place to go for many of our customers," Allbritton said.

DOJ_NMG_0025362

Officials Say They've Cracked Major Utica Drug Ring (UTOD)

Utica (NY) Observer-Dispatch, April 5, 2006

UTICA -- Local, state and federal law enforcement have charged 13 people as the result of an investigation into a major cocaine and crack cocaine distribution ring that officials claim trafficked drugs throughout the Mohawk Valley.

In a news release, U.S. Attorney Glenn T. Suddaby said today police recovered several ounces of cocaine and crack cocaine, as well as three pistols and ammunition, more than $80,000 in cash, drug paraphernalia, a large quantity of gang photos and eight cellular phones.

The 13 people arrested were each charged with conspiracy to possess cocaine and crack cocaine with intent to distribute, Suddaby said:

-- Raymond Garrett, 35, of 901 South St.

-- Durrell Liggins, 27, of 160 Grove Place.

-- Ty Albrecht, 26, an inmate in the Oneida County jail.

-- Gregory Lee Jr., 26, of 1500 Conkling Ave.

-- Roger Patterson, 18, of 8 Shaw St.

-- Ali Shabazz, 19, of 1600 Howard Ave.

-- Jacques Yates, 26, of 518 Mandeville St.

-- Richard Gilmore, 22, an inmate in the Wyoming Correctional Facility.

-- Ann Marie Spina, 30, of 1500 Conkling Ave.

-- Haikham Phimasone, 28, of 1636 Elm St.

-- Terence Hines, 29, of 1527 Elm St.

-- Juan Breton, 31, of 102 Expense St.

-- John Spratt, 37, of 1420 West St.

If convicted, Suddaby said, each would be sentenced to a minimum of 10 years to life in prison.

The investigation included officers from the Oneida County Drug Task Force, which encompasses the Utica, Rome and New Hartford police departments, as well as the Oneida County Sheriff's Office, state police and the FBI. Assisting in the investigation were the U.S. Marshals Service, the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the state Office of Parole.

Selig Defends Choice Of Mitchell (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) -- Commissioner Bud Selig defended his choice of George Mitchell to head baseball's steroid investigation, saying the former Senate Majority Leader has independence.

Selig brushed off criticism that Mitchell is too much of an insider for the job -- Mitchell is a director of the Boston Red Sox and chairman of The Walt Disney Co., a national broadcaster of baseball and the network airing Barry Bonds' new reality show.

"It's important for somebody who understands what I call the mores of culture of this sport as well as he does. That helps in the investigation. That doesn't hurt it," Selig said Tuesday after helping hand out World Series rings to the Chicago White Sox.

"He has complete autonomy. He wouldn't have taken this without complete autonomy. I mean the fact that we're friends had nothing to do with it. ... He doesn't come back and talk to me. I don't want to hear from him. And he can do whatever he wants with whomever he wants. So I don't know how anybody could have more independence than Sen. Mitchell."

The investigation is already under way and has no time limit. It was launched after a book detailing allegations that Bonds, who is approaching the Hank Aaron's career home run record, used performance-enhancing drugs for five years starting in 1998. The probe will be limited to events since September 2002, when baseball banned steroids, but Mitchell can expand the investigation if he feels it is necessary.

"What I said to Sen. Mitchell was that, `Look, we've done now everything we can do.' We have the toughest program in American sports. We've banned amphetamines, which I think a lot of people don't understand the significance of that," Selig said.

DOJ_NMG_0025363

"And while the book triggered, as I said last week, some of this because of the specificity of things, I think it's fair -- and I've thought a lot about it since -- that we've taken care of the present, we've taken care of the future and now I think it's important to look at the past," he added. "We'll see what happens. ... There's no sense in me speculating."

Selig emphasized that Mitchell was not looking into just Bonds. He's looking at the entire game.

"For anybody who thinks this is just a singular investigation is just wrong," Selig said. "It's incorrect. I don't know how much clearer I can be."

Selig was saddened by the fans' response to Bonds in San Diego on Monday night, when a syringe was tossed in the direction of the Giants' left fielder.

"I guess none of this is unexpected. I'm saddened by it in the sense that opening day was such a good, positive day," Selig said. "Every game was sold out. It was really a great baseball day. But controversy will spawn with that type of activity, whether I like it or not."

Bonds began the season with 708 homers and trails only Babe Ruth (714) and Hank Aaron (755) on the career list. Selig said baseball currently has not made plans for a celebration should Bonds move past Ruth's mark but could do so in coming weeks.

Bonds TV Show Debuts With Talk Of Steroids (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' new television show didn't shy away from the steroid allegations.

"Bonds on Bonds" debuted Tuesday night on ESPN2, opening with footage of fans booing, a syringe being thrown at the San Francisco Giants' slugger and announcers discussing the steroid allegations on opening day in San Diego.

"If it makes them happy to go out of their way to destroy me or whatever they want to try to do, go right ahead. It doesn't bother me," Bonds said. "You can't hurt me anymore than you've already hurt me. You can't hurt my family anymore than you've already hurt them."

Bonds then went on, tearing up at one point.

"They can take me down. I don't really care," he said. "I never cared. Baseball, if they want to take me down, go right ahead take it. Anyone who ever knows me knows ... I don't care. But there's so many other people who depend on me to stay strong."

Bonds, who has faced questions about steroid use for years, is under new pressure this year following last month's release of the book "Game of Shadows," which detailed allegations that he used steroids for at least five seasons.

The book contributed to commissioner Bud Selig's decision last week to announce an investigation into past steroid use in the game.

While the show aired on ESPN2, Bonds was on a couch in the Giants' clubhouse in San Diego, while three other baseball games and the NCAA women's basketball championship were on the TVs. Bonds said he thought the show was on later at night and said he'd watch the DVD when he got a chance.

Giants manager Felipe Alou flipped through the channels in his office while talking to reporters before the game, stumbling across women in a hot tub on MTV2 before putting the show on for a few minutes.

"I don't see Barry there," Alou said when he saw the hot tub. "What is that? It's pretty good."

Bonds joked about killing somebody because of all he's been through, was amazed at the number of reporters following him after excerpts from "Game of Shadows" were released, and compared the racist hate mail he receives to what Hank Aaron went through when he broke Babe Ruth's career home run record in 1974.

He also discussed his relationship with his father, three-time All-Star Bobby Bonds and his drinking habits. He said he has always measured himself against his father and godfather, Willie Mays.

Bonds entered the season with 708 home runs, seven shy of passing Ruth for second place all-time and 48 away from breaking Aaron's career record.

He said he's already surpassed the "heights" of Ruth and Aaron and said his focus is not on the record. He talked about how he wished he could leave the game but that it would let down his parents, his teammates and the fans -- he estimated half -- that root for him.

DOJ_NMG_0025364

The show, put together by Tollin/Roberts Productions and ESPN Original Entertainment, has received criticism from people within and outside ESPN for its relationship with a player the network covers.

It featured interviews with reporters who have covered Bonds, including ESPN's Peter Gammons. Bonds talked about how his relationship with the media has always been "rocky" -- but that it motivates him.

There was also footage of Bonds' interaction with the media, archival video of Bonds dating to his college days at Arizona State, interviews with other players and his former manager, Dusty Baker.

The show also showed Bonds away from the ballpark, cleaning up the mess from a broken pipe from his fish tank in Arizona, often cursing and reading an article about the 10 most hated athletes in sports.

Bonds questioned that he only finished second on the list, behind NFL bad boy Terrell Owens.

"How did he get in front of me?" Bonds asked.

AP Sports Writer Bernie Wilson contributed to this report from San Diego.

Alleged Plot To Bomb County Courthouse Uncovered (MINNST)

By Robert Franklin and Randy Furst

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 5, 2006

A Kenyon, Minn., man is accused of assembling explosives to destroy the county courthouse and 'take out' judges and lawyers.

FARIBAULT, MINN. - A plot to blow up the Rice County Courthouse and law enforcement center and perhaps kill several public officials has been uncovered, authorities said Monday.

Law enforcement officials said they recovered two propane tanks, the type used with outdoor grills, that appeared to be filled with explosives made of diesel oil and fertilizer -- similar to those used to blow up the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City 11 years ago.

Each of the 62-pound devices "probably could kill everybody here," Rice County Sheriff Richard Cook said Monday at a news conference.

No timetable for the plot was discovered, Cook said, but "we believe there was some urgency."

Allan Weatherford, 44, who lives on a farm near Kenyon, Minn., is being held in lieu of $1 million bail after being charged with seven counts of attempted arson, possession of explosives and being a felon in possession of firearms.

His brother Mark, 34, was jailed last month on an unrelated charge of reckless discharge of a firearm.

Authorities monitored phone calls between Allan Weatherford and his brother in jail, the complaint said. "It's bad out here" and "that's going to start a war," the criminal complaint quotes Allan Weatherford as saying.

Weatherford's attorney, David Ludescher, of Northfield, who was at Monday's court appearance, said Allan Weatherford had been in chemical dependency treatment in recent weeks. He is appealing a 2004 conviction for fifth-degree possession of a controlled substance and misdemeanor theft and was found not guilty of a more serious drug charge, the attorney said.

Mom got nothing in land deal

Court papers, law officers and neighbors portrayed the Weatherfords as unemployed gun enthusiasts and collectors of junk cars who depleted the estate of their mentally-incapacitated mother of hundreds of thousands of dollars. A conservator last week told a court that Lucile Weatherford, 73, got nothing three years ago when she deeded 80 acres worth at least $276,000 to her sons.

Allan Weatherford was angry because, as part of the conservatorship battle, he was being forced to move to a mobile home on the far edge of the family farm, said Scott Robinson, a Rice County sheriff's deputy who investigated the explosives case.

Robinson was named as a likely target of Allan Weatherford's wrath, along with Rice County District Judge Bernard Borene and Nathan Crowe, an assistant county attorney. All had been involved in Weatherford's 2004 drug case.

Weatherford's arrest "helps you sleep better," Crowe said, although Weatherford "was threatening basically everybody in law enforcement, everybody in the courts."

DOJ_NMG_0025365

Threats against judges and prosecutors are rarely carried out. But they have been harmed on occasion: The homes of two judges were bombed in Austin and Blooming Prairie, Minn., in the 1980s; a Chicago judge's husband and mother were shot to death last year; a judge was wounded in 1992 in his courtroom in Grand Forks, N.D.; a district attorney's house was firebombed in 2001 in Superior, Wis., and an estate conservator was shot to death in 2003 in the Hennepin County Government Center.

The Rice County investigation, which began as a drug probe, involved raids and arrests in Rice, Goodhue and Dodge counties in the past two weeks by several law enforcement agencies.

A criminal complaint quoted unnamed "cooperating citizens" as saying they had seen Weatherford make a fertilizer and diesel-oil bomb out of a propane cylinder and had heard him say he wanted to blow up the courthouse to "take out" attorneys and judges. Faribault city maintenance facilities also were a likely target, the complaint said.

Allan Weatherford had worked at a fertilizer plant three years ago, the complaint said.

Steve Lurken, who rents the Weatherford family farmland, totaling about 160 acres, said the brothers lived in a machine shed on the half of the farm their mother retained.

Luverne Johnson, a neighbor, said the Weatherford sons "would stand and shoot for hours."

A sister of the Weatherfords came and got the men's widowed mother and took her home to Utah, he said.

Court papers said Lucile Weatherford suffered from Alzheimer's disease and had no idea that she had transferred land to her sons.

Mark Weatherford was removed as her co-conservator and the sister, Tammy Carter, was temporarily removed in November by Judge Gerald Wolf after the court was told that the estate's liquid assets were being depleted and no inventory was filed.

During a two-year conservatorship, the assets may have been used to support Allan Weatherford, and the other two children couldn't work together to manage the financial affairs, according to Jennifer Mittelstaedt, the original petitioner for the conservatorship.

The investigation was conducted by the South Central Drug Investigation Unit, FBI, U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, State Patrol, Department of Natural Resources, Faribault and Northfield police departments and Bloomington police bomb squad.

IMMIGRATION:

GOP Split Over Immigration Provisions (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP2, April 5, 2006

The Senate skirmished inconclusively over immigration legislation Tuesday, with Republicans deeply divided over provisions relating to millions of illegal immigrants and Democrats maneuvering to avoid politically difficult votes on border security.

"I don't know that we're going to get a bill," Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), R-Ohio, said at the end of a full week of debate. "It's tough."

In a written statement issued late in the day, the Bush administration renewed its call for legislation that includes a temporary worker program to go "hand in hand with efforts to secure the border."

The carefully worded statement said the administration wants a bill that "does not create an automatic path to permanent residency or citizenship," but it did not elaborate. Nor did it address one of the issues dividing Senate Republicans — under what conditions, if any, the estimated 11 million immigrants in the United States should be permitted to seek citizenship, and whether they should be required to return to their native country first.

"We have to resolve some differences," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record) of Nebraska, one of the GOP lawmakers involved in a series of closed-door negotiating sessions designed to achieve a Republican consensus.

Under one approach, illegal immigrants would be divided between those who have been in the country more than five years and those here a shorter time.

DOJ_NMG_0025366

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist floated a proposal Monday night to require illegal immigrants in the United States less than five years to travel to a U.S. border entry point if they wished to gain legal status. But neither they nor the longer-term undocumented immigrants would be compelled to go to their native countries.

Several rank-and-file Republicans objected, and Frist and fellow Republicans spent much of the day trying to find an alternative.

For their part, Democrats made a show of support for legislation that emerged from the Judiciary Committee more than a week ago. It provides for tightened border security, an increase in the number of temporary workers allowed in the country, and allowing illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship after they meet several conditions, including the payment of fines and any back taxes and passing a background check.

Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada, the Democratic leader, blocked numerous attempts by Republicans during the day to hold votes on selected amendments. "We do not need a compromise. It's in our bill," he told reporters. He set the stage for a test vote on Thursday, but supporters will need 60 votes to prevail.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the second-ranking Democrat, said the leadership was "trying to preserve a strong bipartisan bill" and didn't want to have it watered down before any later compromise talks with the House.

Republicans loudly accused Reid of attempting to hijack the proceedings by refusing to allow votes, and privately, some Democrats acknowledged they did not want to expose their rank and file to difficult choices.

The only vote of the day did little to clarify the likely outcome, coming on a proposal by Sens. Jon Kyl of Arizona and John Cornyn of Texas to deny legal permanent residency to immigrants convicted of certain crimes or believed to pose a danger to U.S. security.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., engineered a vote to scuttle the proposal, but said he would oppose the effort to do so. In the end, the vote was 99-0.

The amendment remained alive, Democrats avoided a direct yes-or-no vote, and Republicans resumed efforts to unite on a compromise covering the legal fate of illegal immigrants.

Lawmakers Urge Bush To Do More On Immigrant Bill (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With the Senate at an impasse, President Bush faces growing pressure to intercede more aggressively if he is to salvage a landmark immigration bill and move it into negotiations with the House.

"He's got to get more involved. I'm not sure where we're going, if we're going at all," said Sen. Mike DeWine (R., Ohio). Hoping to force the president's hand, Democrats broke custom and jumped ahead of the Republican leadership last night by filing a petition to force a vote tomorrow on cutting off debate.

"It is as muddled a situation as you can find," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), who brought the measure out from his panel last week with high hopes. And even as Republicans struggled to bridge their differences, the party leadership appears to be operating without a formal whip count on whether it can expect the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture.

Senate Minority Whip Richard Durbin (D., Ill.) predicted Democrats can deliver close to 40 votes themselves. And by forcing the roll call now, Mr. Durbin hopes to pressure Mr. Bush to come out more directly, embrace Senate passage and use the talks with the House to make any changes he wants.

"I tell you what would help, is if we had the support of the White House," Mr. Durbin said. "If the president would pick up the phone and call the Republican senators and tell them, I'm ready to support this bill, I want you to support this bill."

Mindful of the turmoil, the administration released a four-page policy statement saying it "strongly supports Senate passage of comprehensive immigration reform," and not just a narrow border-security bill such as was passed by the House and is favored by many conservatives.

There were signals from the White House that Mr. Bush may speak out on the issue today. White House officials say the president has reservations about how far the Judiciary Committee bill goes toward legalizing the status of millions of undocumented immigrant workers already in the U.S. and putting them on a path toward citizenship. The statement of policy is carefully parsed to give the president some flexibility on this issue. (See related article.)

DOJ_NMG_0025367

The Senate Republican leadership dismissed the Democratic cloture motion as "premature and immature." Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) has predicted that without more compromise, cloture will fall short of the 60 votes needed.

"My caucus is a little diffused right now," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R., Fla.), who supports the Judiciary bill but is working toward some compromise on the treatment of undocumented workers. Mr. Frist's office was heartened that Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.), a chief sponsor of the immigration bill, was open to some changes, but the very complexity of the legislation demands more time than is available this week.

"The measure of this is, will people come forward?" said Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum, which supports the bill. "I am nervous at some of the changes I have heard discussed, and the committee bill and conference is our best shot."

The floor debate came as a $106.5 billion bill funding continued military operations overseas and hurricane relief for the Gulf Coast cleared the Senate Appropriations Committee after a flurry of amendments that added to its costs. The speed of the action cast some doubt on how realistic the spending is, but the final tally is more than $14 billion above Mr. Bush's $92.22 billion request.

Among the add-ons were a nearly $4 billion farm disaster-aid package, $2.3 billion to help the nation prepare for the threat of avian flu, and nearly $1.2 billion to aid the Gulf Coast seafood industry and pay for the mapping and removal of debris in the Gulf of Mexico.

The bill is expected to come to the Senate floor after the two-week spring recess that begins this weekend.

Deal On Immigration Elusive (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

A Senate agreement on overhauling the nation's immigration laws remained elusive Tuesday, despite efforts by Republican leaders to broker a compromise between conservatives who insist that illegal immigrants return home and moderates who support a Judiciary Committee bill that allows some 12 million illegal workers to remain in the United States.

Late in the day Tuesday, aides to lawmakers involved in the internal GOP negotiations said that a series of four compromises offered to the Republican Conference by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had done little to bring the internal fight to an end.

Those proposals are based on a partial amnesty under which employed illegal immigrants who have been in the U.S. for a set period of time would be allowed to stay and seek formal worker status. All other illegal immigrants would be required to return either to their home country or to some other "point of entry" to seek temporary worker papers.

Frist has said he wants to hold a final vote on the bill by week's end, and aides said they remain hopeful that the proposals floated to Republicans on Tuesday will spur a move to finish the bill.

However, a leadership aide said that while it is "too early to tell" whether the talks will result in a compromise, GOP lawmakers have all but abandoned the committee's plan to grant guest worker status to all 12 million illegal workers. This aide noted that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — the author, along with Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), of the Judiciary-approved language — had initially rejected a partial guest worker provision Monday evening, but had since "come to the table" during the Conference's morning meeting.

However, aides involved in the discussion said that both the full "guest worker" program included in the committee bill and any language based on the proposed compromises floated by Frist remained far short of the 60 votes required to break a filibuster by conservatives.

A GOP aide added that Kennedy has signaled that he will oppose a partial amnesty plan. So as long as conservatives maintain that any form of amnesty is unacceptable, the likelihood of Frist being able to cobble together a coalition of 60 Republicans and Democrats remains unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0025368

In addition, McCain and Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) said they are still unsure whether they can back a compromise. They also said that questions about any such deal's mechanics remain unanswered.

"I'm not really sure what it does," DeWine told reporters prior to his party's weekly luncheon.

McCain echoed those sentiments, though he cautioned that this week may represent the Senate's best chance of addressing immigration reform this year.

"You know the attention span of the Senate," McCain said. "If we take up something and concentrate on it we get it done. If we can't concentrate on it [and take time off] things grind to a halt."

House leaders, meanwhile, remained ambivalent toward any guest worker proposal. The House earlier this year passed a measure that includes no guest worker provisions. Asked Tuesday whether the chamber would agree to a bill that did include guest worker language, House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said, "When the Senate passes a bill and we go to conference we'll deal with it. Until then it's a lot of, 'Yah, yah, yah.'"

A statement of administration position released by the Bush White House early Tuesday evening was silent on how to address the guest worker impasse. The document was vague on the kind of program the White House would find acceptable, saying that the president would support a "temporary worker" program but not a "amnesty" program.

Nevertheless, Republicans hailed the White House statement as a potential breakthrough. In a statement, Frist said he hoped it would pave the way for a final agreement.

"Finally, a consensus on immigration can emerge here in the Senate, and the president's SAP today demonstrates that," Frist said. "Together, we agree our borders must be secure first, to make America safer. Together, we agree."

Immigration Measure Stalls In The Senate (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Senate Republicans who support legislation that would legalize the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants said Tuesday that they lacked enough support to bring the measure to a vote this week and were working on a more limited compromise that would rally a broader cross-section of Republicans.

But Democrats, angered by what they viewed as Republican efforts to gut the legislation, responded by using a parliamentary tactic to force lawmakers to decide Thursday whether the bill should be considered for a vote on the Senate floor.

"What we're trying to do is preserve a strong, bipartisan bill," said Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois. "Are the Republicans going to stand up and vote for comprehensive immigration reform? Or are they not?"

Eric Ueland, chief of staff for Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, assailed the Democrats' move as "a serious blow to efforts to find common ground," and said Republicans would continue their negotiations on a possible compromise.

"The minority will be held accountable," Mr. Ueland said.

Mr. Frist has imposed a deadline of the end of this week for a vote on immigration legislation. With the growing prospect of a deadlock on a comprehensive bill, Republicans and Democrats started pointing fingers and warning that the opposing party would be to blame if efforts at passing a bill were to collapse.

Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, warned that the Democratic maneuver might result in the demise of his bill, which called for the legalization of the nation's immigrants. He said that "both sides are going to be losers" if a bipartisan compromise did not emerge.

"It's getting very late in the week to salvage the bill," Mr. Specter said. "It's a power struggle now. It's a struggle of wills."

The Republican compromise centered on a proposal that would eventually grant citizenship to illegal immigrants who had already lived in this country for five years or more, provided that they remained employed, paid fines and back taxes and learned English, among other things, said a Senate aide familiar with the compromise.

Illegal immigrants who have lived here for less time would have to report to an American port of entry, such as an airport or land port, where they would be classified as temporary workers and allowed to work for up to six years before returning home or applying for permanent residency, which could ultimately lead to citizenship.

DOJ_NMG_0025369

The proposal was intended to bridge the sharp divide between those Republicans who argue that illegal immigrants should return home and those who believe that they should be put on a path to citizenship.

Republicans, who huddled in a flurry of meetings to work through the details, said they hoped that such a compromise would result in some consensus in their party so a vote on immigration legislation could be held this week.

Last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee voted in favor of legislation that would legalize nearly all of the nation's illegal immigrants. But the supporters of that bill, including Mr. Specter and Senators John McCain of Arizona and Mel Martinez of Florida, both Republicans, said Tuesday that they did not have enough support to bring the committee's legislation to the floor for a vote.

"We're going to have to find a place where we can all land," said Mr. Martinez, one of the principal architects of the compromise. "What we're all trying to find is something that is common ground enough to get the majority of Republicans on board."

Mr. Martinez said that his first allegiance remained with the legislation produced by the Judiciary Committee but that he feared it lacked adequate Republican support. "I'm trying to find a fallback," he said.

That effort was swiftly attacked by Democrats, who said that it would weaken the committee's bill, which has the backing of most Democrats. And they worked to block any Republican amendments to the immigration bill in an effort to force a decision on whether to bring the committee bill to a vote on the Senate floor.

Senator Harry Reid, the minority leader and a Democrat from Nevada, said there was no need for a compromise.

"We have a bill that's bipartisan," said Mr. Reid, referring to the Judiciary Committee's legislation. "It covers strong borders, a guest worker program and a path to legalization for the people about whom you just spoke. We don't need a compromise."

The White House also entered the debate on Tuesday, issuing a statement of administration policy that praised the Senate Judiciary Committee for including a temporary worker program in its legislation.

But the Bush administration warned that the final bill should not "create an automatic path to permanent residency or citizenship."

Republicans said they would be working into the night to build a compromise on the question of illegal immigrants that might attract more Republican support without alienating conservatives opposed to amnesty.

Mr. Ueland said he was hopeful that a bill would be passed this week. But he and others acknowledged that time was short.

Mr. Martinez said, "We're still looking to find a magic formula."

Senate Moves Closer To Vote On Immigration (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — With Republicans still deeply divided, Senate Democrats moved Tuesday to force a showdown over immigration reform, filing a motion to end debate and vote on a bill that provides the option of citizenship to guest workers and illegal immigrants already in the United States.

The move means the Senate will have to vote Thursday on whether to end debate. That in turn could force action on final passage three days later for the bill now on the Senate floor, which has White House support but does not command a majority among Republicans in either chamber of Congress.

"We've got to move this to a showdown vote," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's second-ranking Democratic leader. "The members on the other side of the aisle will have to make a choice. I think the momentum is with us."

In essence, Democrats — who generally favor less restrictive treatment of illegal immigrants than many Republicans do — sought to take advantage of GOP divisions by forcing a vote on the relatively moderate approach now on the Senate floor before the Republican majority could hammer out an agreement on a more severe measure.

Republicans, who failed again Tuesday to bridge their differences on the immigration proposals, reacted angrily to the Democratic maneuvering.

DOJ_NMG_0025370

"This was premature and immature given the velocity of the debate," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Frist has said he wants to complete legislation by Friday, and failure to reach that goal would be a blow to his image as an effective leader at a time when he is preparing to run for president.

Although many Republicans have not made up their minds, fewer than half are believed to support the current bill, which was passed by the Judiciary Committee last week with some Republican support.

Earlier in the day, Democrats had used parliamentary procedures to block debate on an amendment that could make some or all visitors who overstay their visas ineligible for legalization or citizenship.

"We're going to work hard to make sure that the bill is not damaged before leaving the floor," said Minority Leader Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "But if there's any effort to denigrate this bipartisan bill, then we won't have votes on those amendments."

"I'm very frustrated now," Frist said on the Senate floor. "It's very apparent now that the other side is trying to block a bill."

Durbin said all but a handful of the Senate's 44 Democrats and one independent supported the bill as currently drafted. In the Senate, 60 votes are needed to ensure passage and override a possible filibuster by opponents.

"If they can produce 20-plus votes, we can get a bill this week," Durbin said of the Republicans.

Even before Democrats filed the motion to end debate, Republicans accused them of being obstructionist and trying to scuttle the bill by blocking debate over amendments. And the atmosphere on and off the Senate floor grew more and more heated during the day, as Republicans realized Democrats were digging in their heels.

"I feel like there are those who are trying to jam this version of the bill down our throats … trying to deny those of us who have different ideas from presenting those ideas," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who opposes any citizenship provision for workers currently in the United States illegally.

Democrats were unapologetic, with Reid noting pointedly that Republicans had repeatedly barred the minority from offering amendments on other legislation.

"As my mother would say, they're getting a taste of their own medicine," Reid said.

Members and staff were meeting into the evening in an effort to agree on a compromise that might permit votes on less controversial amendments.

Republicans were also debating whether to file a countermotion to the Democrats that would force a vote on a competing bill — currently on the sidelines — that would enhance border security but does not include a guest-worker program or legalization.

Both sides said it was too soon to predict the demise of the immigration reform effort.

"We have time on our side. As we get closer to recess, cooler heads will prevail," said Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.).

Despite holding a string of meetings in recent days, Republicans have reported little progress toward bridging their differences, however. Senators said discussion at the weekly Republican strategy lunch was lively, loud, and in the end, inconclusive.

"We're 100 senators and I think if you polled us you would find 100 different ways of dealing with illegals," said Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.).

"We're still looking for the magic formula," said Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.).

The question of giving citizenship to the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States has become the major stumbling block for some senators, especially conservative Republicans, who argue that it is an "amnesty" that undermines respect for the law and will encourage more immigrants to cross the border illegally.

The bill currently under debate would boost enforcement, create a guest-worker program with a path to legal status and offer the possibility of citizenship to illegal immigrants who meet certain requirements, including learning English and paying back taxes.

The bill would also limit the opportunity for citizenship to illegal immigrants in the country on or before Jan. 7, 2004, and they would only be processed after legal immigrants who have already applied.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, did not express optimism that Republicans could overcome their differences quickly enough to meet the Friday deadline.

"We have retrogressed," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0025371

Senators said White House officials continued to be deeply involved in discussions. President Bush has urged Congress to pass a guest-worker program, but has said that he would not favor a program that allowed illegal immigrants to gain citizenship before those already in line for legal permanent resident status.

McCain Lacks Votes For Guest-Worker Plan (AP-Y2)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP2, April 4, 2006

Supporters of a guest worker program that would let illegal immigrants stay in the United States said Tuesday they don't have enough Senate votes to overcome objections from conservatives who oppose the measure on grounds it amounts to amnesty.

As negotiators worked on a compromise to let those who have been here longest remain, Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., said a majority in the 100-member Senate support his and Massachusetts Democratic Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record)'s proposal to provide green cards to illegal immigrants after they've worked in the U.S. for six years.

But it takes 60 senators to overcome opponents' parliamentary tactics, and McCain said he doesn't have that many.

More than 11 million illegal immigrants are believed to be in the U.S., and Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., said he and Sen. Chuck Hagel (news, bio, voting record), R-Neb., are pushing a "fallback" plan that would put those who have been here the longest on a track toward citizenship but treat more recent arrivals differently. A similar approach was rejected by the Senate Judiciary Committee last week but it was revived Monday night during a meeting in Majority Leader Bill Frist's office.

About 30 Republican senators huddled for more than an hour Tuesday but no consensus emerged. President Bush has championed a program that would give illegal immigrants a legal status to work in the U.S. but has not specified whether they should have to leave the country at some point.

McCain and Kennedy deny that their proposal is amnesty, saying illegal immigrants would have to pay $2,000 in fines and any back taxes and clear background checks before they could get in line for a green card.

The proposal, dubbed the "roots concept, by Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., seemed to have some support from Frist. He told CNN over the weekend that 40 percent of illegal immigrants have been in the country less than five years and "need to be dealt with in a different fashion."

The Senate is in its second week of debate on immigration-broder security legislation and there is pressure to complete a bill before Congress recesses on Friday for a two-week holiday.

A bill approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee — based on a proposal by McCain and Kennedy — would allow illegal immigrants in the United States before Jan. 7, 2004, and who have jobs, to work legally for an additional six years and eventually become citizens.

Both Frist and McCain are considered likely candidates for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

A separate bill filed by Frist does not deal with illegal immigrants, but boosts border enforcement and cracks down on employers who hire illegal workers. The House in December passed a bill that would make being in the country illegally a felony.

Opponents consider the Judiciary Committee bill amnesty. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country, before they can return legally to apply for permanent residence or be guest workers.

Cornyn was not at the meeting at Frist's office, but his spokesman Don Stewart was skeptical of the suggested compromise.

"It's a matter of giving amnesty to 8 million people or giving amnesty to 12 million people. It's still amnesty to millions of people," Stewart said.

A Split On The Lines Of Illegal Immigration (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025372

Disagreements over how to deal with illegal immigration are splitting the Republican Party as few issues have lately, dividing state congressional delegations down the middle and bringing the Senate to a virtual standstill yesterday.

Epitomizing the divisions are Arizona's GOP senators, Jon Kyl and John McCain. Both face important elections and represent the same 5.8 million people. But they are leading the two main opposing approaches that Republican senators will have to reconcile if Congress is to address border security, illegal worker status, deportation practices and other issues.

McCain, hoping to gain the 2008 presidential nomination, is the chief sponsor of legislation that would give millions of illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship if they pay fines and back taxes, learn English, stay employed and do not break laws. Kyl, facing a potentially strong Democratic challenger this fall in his bid for a third term, is a key proponent of a guest-worker program that would require undocumented workers to return to their countries when their visas expire, a move that critics call unrealistic. Both bills would pour billions of dollars into greater border enforcement.

The House has approved an enforcement-only bill, but the immigration debate has deeply divided the Senate, especially its 55 Republicans. Party leaders unsuccessfully sought a compromise in several closed meetings yesterday.

"I'm very frustrated," Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) announced on the Senate floor. He accused Democrats of obstructionism, but Democrats shrugged off the charge. The Republican-controlled Judiciary Committee sent a bill to the floor that a majority of Republicans apparently will not embrace, they noted, because of the disagreements personified by Kyl and McCain.

McCain supports the committee-approved bill, but acknowledges that Congress's divisions over immigration reflect those of the public. "I live in a state where it's the number-one issue," he said yesterday. "I know that Americans are of different minds on this, including my state. But that doesn't mean the United States Senate shouldn't act."

Kyl spent much of the day on the Senate floor, trying to amend the committee bill to add tougher sanctions against some illegal immigrants, such as those with criminal records. Aides said he did not have time for interviews.

Experts on Arizona politics say the immigration issue generates enough crosscurrents to provide ample justification for both senators' views. On one hand, Arizonans have been alarmed by the influx of impoverished Mexicans pouring into the state following tougher enforcement on the Texas and California borders in recent years, said Rodolfo Espino, a political scientist at Arizona State University. But the state's booming construction and tourism industries crave the low-wage workers, he said, and the steadily growing number of legal immigrants are wary of actions they view as punitive to fellow Latinos.

"It's a pretty conservative electorate that Kyl is facing" this fall, Espino said, and his emphasis on tighter borders and sanctions against those who crossed illegally will probably serve him well. Kyl is largely in line with Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano, who declared a state of emergency along Arizona's Mexican border last August, Espino said, so the strategy may limit Democratic challenger Jim Pederson's room to maneuver on immigration.

"It was very surprising to see 20,000 people in the streets of Phoenix," Espino said, referring to the recent mass protest against the Kyl-backed legislation. "But in the short run, it's not going to scare any local politicians here." The prospect of a large pool of Latino citizens, eligible to vote, "is just too far off in the future for anyone to be concerned."

McCain, meanwhile, is virtually a legend in Arizona politics and has long thrived on bucking orthodox Republican positions on key issues, Espino said. Even if more Arizonans side with Kyl on immigration questions, he said, "this would not be enough to cause McCain trouble. He does enough other maverick things that endear him to the hearts and minds of Arizona voters."

The Kyl-McCain split also applies to Arizona's Republican-dominated House delegation. GOP Reps. Jim Kolbe and Jeff Flake side with McCain, saying the notion of deporting millions of illegal immigrants is unfeasible. Rep. J.D. Hayworth, meanwhile, is one of the most vehement advocates of tightening the borders and criminalizing illegal immigrants before addressing guest-worker questions.

Tamar Jacoby, who studies immigration issues at the Manhattan Institute, supports McCain's approach but says Kyl should not be dismissed as someone seeking to score political points. Both McCain and Kyl "are reformers or would-be reformers," she said, noting their similar efforts to tighten control of border crossings.

"Kyl is not grandstanding for his reelection," Jacoby said. But his notion that millions of Mexicans will willingly return home after working in the United States for several years is unrealistic, she said. McCain's emphasis on helping such workers become citizens invested in their adopted country is the better long-range bet, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0025373

Criminal Alien Exception Blocked (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Senate Democrats refused to allow consideration of an amendment yesterday that would bar illegal aliens convicted of felonies from obtaining U.S. citizenship.

Democrats said the amendment would "gut" the immigration bill under consideration in the Senate and refused to allow a vote on it.

"It hurts the bill," said Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "It hurts the very foundation and what I believe is the spirit" of the legislation.

Republican Sens. Jon Kyl of Arizona and John Cornyn of Texas restated the purpose of their amendment and appeared incredulous that anyone would object to it.

"I do not have to explain in any more detail than what I have as why I don't want to move forward," Mr. Reid said. "I don't agree with the amendment. I don't think it's going to benefit this legislation that is pending before the Senate and I'm going to do what I can to prevent a vote on it."

Later, Mr. Reid added, "We're not going to allow amendments like Kyl-Cornyn to take out what we believe is the goodness of this bill."

The entire bill is "in effect being blocked by the other side," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

After debate over the bill ground to a halt last night, Democrats filed a "cloture motion" that could set up a final vote before the end of the week on an immigration bill that many conservatives view as "amnesty." The bill allows illegal aliens to pay a $2,000 fine and remain working in the U.S. while applying for citizenship.

The Kyl-Cornyn amendment would have barred from U.S. citizenship any illegal alien who has been convicted of a felony, three misdemeanors or refused a court order to leave the country.

Democrats said the amendment is not necessary because crimes of "moral turpitude" such as rape and murder already prevent an illegal from obtaining U.S. citizenship, as would violations of drug laws.

Mr. Kyl came to the floor and listed the crimes he said would not be included without his amendment, such as burglary, assault and battery, possession of an unregistered, sawed-off shotgun, kidnapping and alien smuggling.

McCain Threatens To End Speech After 'boos'Published (WT/AP)

By Associated press

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Sen. John McCain threatened yesterday to cut short a speech to union leaders who booed his immigration views and challenged his statements on organized labor and the Iraq war.

"If you like, I will leave," Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, told the AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department, pivoting briefly from the lectern. He returned to the microphone after the crowd quieted.

"OK, then please give me the courtesy I would give you."

The senator had been outlining his position on the Senate immigration debate, saying tougher border enforcement must be accompanied by guest-worker provisions that give undocumented aliens a legal path toward citizenship.

Murmurs from the crowd turned to booing.

"Pay a decent wage," one audience member shouted.

"I've heard that statement before," Mr. McCain said before threatening to leave.

Afterward, the senator said he offered to cut his speech short "because I wanted to be heard."

In the speech, Mr. McCain also said withdrawing U.S. troops prematurely from Iraq would turn terrorists loose on the United States.

This time, there was no booing -- though one audience member cursed from the back of the crowd.

Mr. McCain got a laugh when he finished the speech and asked whether anybody had "questions, comments or insults."

DOJ_NMG_0025374

The first questioner seemed to challenge Mr. McCain's commitment to organized labor. When the senator started to praise a particular labor group in Arizona, the crowd booed again.

"Stop," he said with a smile, drawing laughter from the crowd. "I surrender."

But he took more questions, including a pointed one on his immigration plan.

Mr. McCain responded by saying that immigrants were taking jobs that nobody else wanted. He offered anybody in the crowd $50 an hour to pick lettuce in Arizona.

Shouts of protest rose from the crowd, with some accepting Mr. McCain's job offer.

"I'll take it," one man said.

Mr. McCain insisted that none of them would do such menial labor for a complete season.

"You can't do it, my friends," he said.

Some in the crowd said they did not appreciate Mr. McCain's questioning their work ethic.

"I was impressed with his comedy routine and ability to tap dance without music. But I was impressed with nothing else about him," said John Wasniewski of Milwaukee. "He's supposed to be Mr. Straight Talk?"

Others said Mr. McCain showed some moxie, if not the best political judgment.

"Most of us don't agree with him on immigration, but I give him credit for trying," said Chris D. Schoenbeck of Milwaukee.

Florida Gov. Bush Calls Tone Of Immigration Debate `Hurtful' (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Accusing politicians of "pounding their chests" on immigration for short-term political gain, Florida Gov. Jeb Bush said Tuesday that the tone of the debate had been "hurtful" to him and his Mexican-born wife, Columba.

Bush, the younger brother of President Bush, reserved some of his sharpest criticism for conservatives in his own Republican Party, calling it "just plain wrong" to charge illegal immigrants with a felony, as a provision passed by the Republican-led House would do. He also opposed "penalizing the children of illegal immigrants" by denying them U.S. citizenship, an idea backed by some conservatives but not included in the legislation.

"My wife came here legally, but it hurts her just as it hurts me when people give the perception that all immigrants are bad," the Florida governor wrote in an e-mail exchange with The Times.

Gov. Bush has generally avoided injecting himself into national political fights, and he rarely invokes his soft-spoken wife of 32 years in such a public way. But his comments reflect the concern among many Republicans that calls by conservatives for an immigrant crackdown risk alienating Latino voters.

His brother is attempting to navigate a growing rift among Republicans over what to do with the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. The president has proposed a guest-worker program but has not said what should happen to those already here illegally.

Florida is home to millions of residents who were born in other countries. And the Bush brothers, in Florida and Texas, where the president was governor, have been popular with Latino voters.

Both have long advocated open immigration laws, putting them at odds with many in their party.

Longtime friends and associates say the president's relationship with his brother's family, along with his experiences living and working in Texas, contributed to his views on immigration.

The Senate is debating immigration proposals this week, and White House allies are beginning to speak out more forcefully on the issue.

Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman used a speech Tuesday to the Hispanic Chamber of Commerce to extol the contributions of immigrants.

In his e-mail, Gov. Bush chastised both politicians and the media for being simplistic on immigration, and he lauded his brother for seeking a civil tone.

DOJ_NMG_0025375

"The cumulative effect of some politicians pounding their chests about immigration is hurtful to both of us," he wrote, referring to himself and his brother. "I fear they do so for current political gain at the expense of thoughtful policy over the long term."

Jeb Bush pointed to the political damage wrought 12 years ago by California's Proposition 187, in which the state's voters backed a plan to strip illegal immigrants of public benefits. The initiative was pushed by then-Gov. Pete Wilson, a Republican. Some analysts have since blamed that campaign for a backlash among Latino voters that has made California reliably Democratic in national elections.

Gov. Bush wrote that Wilson "fell prey" to the short-term political temptations. "I know he felt he was doing the right thing, but matters are worse now and the Republican Party is now the minority party in California," Bush wrote.

Wilson, in a recent interview, rejected the theory that Prop. 187 turned California to the left — arguing that, instead, he had performed especially well with female voters who later abandoned the GOP over abortion.

Referring to Republicans who shied away from cracking down on illegal immigrants as "gutless," Wilson said they were "intimidated by the fear that they will be charged with racism."

For the Florida governor, though, immigration is a personal matter. He met his wife during a high school exchange program in Mexico, and the two married when he was 21. They settled in Miami in 1980 in part because she would feel comfortable in a heavily Latin city, home to Cubans, Mexicans and thousands of other Spanish-speaking immigrants.

The governor speaks the language fluently. His son, George P. Bush, has cited his Latino heritage in campaign appearances for his father and uncle and is considered an heir to the family political dynasty.

"Columba and I watch the news early in the morning and in the evenings," Bush wrote in the late-night e-mail exchange. "The cumulative effect of the coverage is that immigrants are bad and hurting our country. The coverage is black and white, good and bad, without the nuances that the coverage deserves."

The Florida governor has said he does not intend to run for president in 2008. But he has been mentioned as a potential running mate for another likely candidate, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

In his e-mail, Gov. Bush endorsed the idea of a broad guest-worker program encompassing the kinds of low-wage workers sought by farms and factories as well as high-tech professionals from places such as India.

Like his brother, he offered no specificity on how to treat current immigrants and whether they should be granted a path to citizenship.

"The focus should be on protecting our borders rather than these piling on provisions that are punitive to many who have made a great contribution to our country," he wrote. "Along with that, the focus should be on a guest worker program and a means to deal with the millions of long term undocumented workers….

"Frankly," he added, "I also believe we should open up legal immigration to the qualified scientists, innovators, entrepreneurs and others who can additionally add value to our great country."

Letter On Immigration Deepens Split Among Evangelicals (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

More than 50 evangelical Christian leaders and organizations voiced their support yesterday for an immigration bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become U.S. citizens without returning to their native countries.

The statement marks a deepening split among evangelicals over immigration. It was signed by a mixture of Hispanic and white church groups. But most of the nation's large, politically influential evangelical organizations either back rival legislation that focuses on border enforcement and the deportation of illegal immigrants, or have been silent on the issue.

Hispanic evangelical leaders said yesterday that they have received support from Roman Catholic, Jewish and Muslim groups, but have been bitterly disappointed by the response of most of their fellow evangelicals, both white and black.

"This is the watershed movement -- it's the moment where either we really forge relationships with the white evangelical church that will last for decades, or there is a possibility of a definitive schism here," said the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez, president of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference, which serves 10,700 Hispanic evangelical churches with 15 million members.

DOJ_NMG_0025376

"There will be church ramifications to this, and there will be political ramifications," he said.

In a letter yesterday to President Bush and members of Congress, Rodriguez's group and its allies cited Bible passages that call for the compassionate treatment of foreigners. Specifically, the letter urged "border protection policies that are consistent with humanitarian values," streamlined procedures for reuniting separated families, and an option for undocumented workers to legalize their status.

The letter effectively endorsed a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). The bill combines a guest-worker program with provisions allowing illegal immigrants to apply for citizenship after paying fines and back taxes, undergoing criminal background checks and learning English.

Among the signers was World Relief, the humanitarian arm of the National Association of Evangelicals. But the NAE itself did not sign the letter because its members are divided on how to deal with immigration, said the Rev. Richard Cizik, the NAE's vice president for governmental affairs.

Polls show that about two-thirds of white evangelicals consider new immigrants a burden on society, compared with about half of all Americans who hold that view. On the other hand, Cizik said, most evangelicals realize that Latino immigrants are the fastest-growing part of their church.

"Evangelicals are a lot more sensitive to the plight of immigrants than outside observers might think," he said. "When you put together the biblical mandate to care for the alien and the receptivity of the Latino community to the evangel, to the gospel, you have a sensitivity factor that almost outweighs the traditional evangelical concern for law and order."

Some predominantly white evangelical groups, such as the Christian Coalition and Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum, have strongly opposed the Kennedy-McCain bill, labeling it an "amnesty" package. They support a House-passed measure that would concentrate on sealing U.S. borders and enforcing existing immigration laws.

"We think our national boundaries should be respected. That's a biblical principle also," said Christian Coalition lobbyist Jim Backlin.

Many larger groups, such as James C. Dobson's Colorado-based Focus on the Family, have not taken a stand on the issue. Rodriguez, of the Hispanic Christian conference, said his group wants to know why.

"We need to know from white evangelical leaders why did they not support comprehensive immigration reform, why they came down in favor exclusively of enforcement, without any mention of the compassionate side, without any mention of the Christian moral imperatives," he said.

"So down the road, when the white evangelical community calls us and says, 'We want to partner with you on marriage, we want to partner on family issues,' my first question will be: 'Where were you when 12 million of our brothers and sisters were about to be deported and 12 million families disenfranchised?' "

Two Towns, Two Stands On Immigration Reform (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

MAYWOOD AND COSTA MESA, CALIF. - One community is car-horn noisy, smokestack gritty, and tightly packed - with narrow streets, tiny houses, and flowering window boxes. The other is golf-course quiet, sumptuously green, and suburban - with broad boulevards, spacious lawns, and parks.

Just a few miles of freeway separate these southern California towns, but they are light-years apart in their responses to America's immigration debate. Maywood, population 45,000 and 96 percent Latino, is a self- proclaimed "sanctuary" for illegal immigrants. Costa Mesa, population 110,000 and one-third Latino, is examining ways to train some of its police force to help US immigration officials identify illegals.

As Washington grapples with rewriting US immigration law, possibly settling the status of up to 12 million undocumented residents, the state that is home to 1 in 3 of them shows how the issue is playing out at the local level - with communities deciding for themselves whether to support or subvert the federal will.

DOJ_NMG_0025377

"Though immigration policy is primarily a federal prerogative, there is incredible variation at the local and state level playing out now," says Karthick Ramakrishnan, a political scientist at the University of California at Riverside and author of "Democracy in Immigrant America." "The big story at the local level now is that smaller towns, from 50,000 to 100,000 residents, are wading into the problem. Even though California has been dealing with this for decades, its smaller cities are just beginning to wrestle [with] the challenges."

Overlapping local, state, and federal mandates may be contributing to conflict and confusion among jurisdictions, say Professor Ramakrishnan and others. The federal government has primary responsibility for border enforcement and deportation, while local governments are responsible for maintaining law and order and providing public services.

In January, Maywood became the first municipality in California to declare itself a "sanctuary city." The city council, in effect, signalled its displeasure with legislation that had recently cleared the US House, voting to disregard the bill's call to classify illegal presence in the US as a felony and to enlist local police in enforcing federal immigration law. It also directed the city's police department to stop towing away cars of drivers who don't have driver's licenses - a practice it said unfairly targeted illegal immigrants.

"We did it because people in the community came to us and said we have to take a stand," says Deputy Mayor Felipe Aguirre, who runs a small Mexican art gallery on traffic-clogged Slauson Avenue. All last year, he says, residents became increasingly agitated about the Minutemen - groups of citizens, sometimes armed - standing watch at the US border to alert officials to illegal border-crossings. Then, in December, the House passed its tough border-security bill.

"The world around us is caught up in draconian ideas to tighten the noose around people who are taking care of their kids, landscaping their homes, making their clothes, picking their food," says Mr. Aguirre. "We believe there is a higher law."

A few freeway exits to the south in Costa Mesa, 24-hour fitness gyms, yoga centers, and franchise food outlets stand in contrast to Maywood's retail strips. Here, a different attitude toward illegal immigration finds expression.

"I just feel that immigration is out of control, and no one is standing up to say enough is enough," says Clara Forsythe, a college senior, sipping a latte outside the Starbucks on West 19th Street. She has felt the impact of increased street crime - including car theft and home burglary in recent years - and attributes rising problems at local schools to immigrants who don't know or won't learn English.

In the same way that Aguirre and other Maywood residents say they feel "embattled" by threats of crackdowns on illegal immigrants, Ms. Forsythe says she feels that her way of life is being "encroached on." She was distressed by a huge street demonstration in Los Angeles late last month in favor of immigrant rights, saying those demonstrators in the country illegally "disregard US law but then drain social services, from hospitals to schools and prisons."

She supports a move by Costa Mesa's city council to ask federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officers to "cross-designate" Costa Mesa police personnel - the first municipality in the country to do so. Cross-designation is a kind of additional training for nonfederal agents - in this case a small subset of Costa Mesa police - that allows them to access previously restricted federal databases relative to immigration status. If a database shows a suspected illegal immigrant is a known felon, local officials hand the person over to ICE officials, who begin deportation proceedings.

In both Maywood and Costa Mesa, not all residents are pleased with their town's immigration decisions. Former Maywood Mayor Sam Pena, who remains a councillor, says the city should not be flouting federal law, but rather should work within the system to change it. In Costa Mesa, public outcry forced local officials to scale down their initial proposal to give cross-designation training to most patrol officers. Instead, they are asking for training for about 30 gang-enforcement specialists and plainclothes detectives who deal with violent felons.

On Saturday, hundreds of Latinos demonstrated at Costa Mesa City Hall to protest the measure, and local tempers are flaring.

"There has been lots of misinformation and disinformation about these proposals," says Sgt. Ron Smith of the Costa Mesa police department. "There is both lack of general understanding of what is going on, as well as people on both sides trying to misrepresent the other for their own agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0025378

That lack of general understanding is exacerbated by at least two phenomena, say experts. One is a major finding of a 2005 Public Policy Institute of California study that "most immigrants in California lack much experience with the American political system ... immigrant involvement in city government may be quite limited."

The other is the clash between local law-and-order prerogatives and federal border-and-deportation mandates. When Congress debated in 2004 the so-called CLEAR Act (a law to let state and local agencies determine their own participation in enforcing federal immigration laws), the International Association of Chiefs of Police issued a statement saying such plans could have a "chilling effect" on the ability of local police to protect the public they serve.

The worry is that local police would see reports of criminal activity dry up in immigrant communities, as both legal and illegal immigrants come to avoid police contact.

"The role of local governments in immigration policy is likely to remain unclear," says Ramakrishnan of UC Riverside. "In some cities it might mean working hand in hand with federal immigration and border authorities, and in others it might mean looking the other way."

63-city Protest Set For Monday (WT)

By Keyonna Summers And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Immigration advocates yesterday announced plans for a 63-city rally on Monday that they hope will attract at least 2 million supporters to protest pending immigration reform legislation and press lawmakers into granting millions of current illegal aliens a path toward permanent residency and U.S. citizenship.

The advocates also called for a nationwide one-day boycott of work, school and shopping May 1 to protest the House and the Senate immigration reform bills.

Calling the National Day of Action for Immigrant Justice "a true grass-roots movement," Jaime Contreras, president of the National Capital Immigrant Coalition, said, "We want to announce to the world and our elected officials that we are not criminals, that the sleeping giant that was once sleeping is now awake.

"Enough is enough. We're not here to be used as scapegoats for political campaigns," he said during a press conference yesterday at the U.S. Capitol.

The advocates also will urge defeat of the House bill, which was approved last year and, among other things, increases immigration enforcement and border security, makes illegal entry a felony, requires employers to check the legal status of workers and penalizes those who help in illegal entry.

"We're building as we speak," said Mr. Contreras, whose group is planning the nationwide protest with dozens of other organizations.

Rallies last month drew well more than 10,000 each to Phoenix, Milwaukee and Denver, and an estimated 500,000 to Los Angeles. About 80,000 Hispanics walked off their jobs in Atlanta.

Organizers again expect the largest protests to strike major cities, including Pittsburgh and Cincinnati.

Meanwhile, the Great American Boycott of 2006 is being organized for May 1 by Latino Movement USA.

"We're flexing our muscles to send a message that we are not criminals," the group's director, Juan Jose Gutierrez, said yesterday during a separate D.C. press conference.

Mr. Gutierrez, whose organization helped coordinate the Los Angeles rally, called a pending Senate bill that would create a guest-worker program and put millions of illegal aliens on track toward permanent residency an "encouraging sign," but described it as too hard on those seeking citizenship.

"We think that the right thing to do is to grant full rights, full equality, under the laws in the Constitution of the United States to all immigrants, period," he said.

Yesterday, black and Hispanic leaders -- including South Carolina Rep. James E. Clyburn, House Democratic Caucus chairman and Congressional Black Caucus member, and Hilary Shelton , director of the D.C. bureau of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People -- connected immigrants' and illegal aliens' fight to that of blacks during the civil rights movement.

DOJ_NMG_0025379

Organizers are discouraging student walkouts, which last week took the region and the country by storm and were marred by the stabbing of a Northern Virginia high school student.

"We are encouraging students to get involved through the community organizations that are putting these events together," Mr. Contreras said.

Mobilizing For Monday (WSJ)

By Stephanie Kang And Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Hispanic immigrants and their advocates in recent weeks have learned a big lesson in how quickly they can mobilize behind a political cause. With more immigration-reform demonstrations planned for early next week, organizers are about to see how much muscle they have to flex.

To build on a movement that attracted as many as 500,000 protesters in cities like Los Angeles last month, a new round of demonstrations is set for Monday in an attempt to keep pressure on the immigration issue and broaden the base of support. At least 60 cities are scheduling events that include candlelight vigils in Los Angeles, a rally in front of the Washington monument in the nation's capital, and a "day without Hispanics" in Telluride, Colo. that is intended as a work stoppage.

Turnout is hard to predict given that the events take place on a Monday rather than the previous Saturday protests. But the events could be disruptive to normal business operations in places where Hispanics are a major part of the work force -- everything from the hotel and restaurant industries to construction and agriculture.

"It's got employers' attention and they're trying to figure out what to do," says John Gay, senior vice president of government affairs and public policy at the National Restaurant Association. He says some of the association's members, hoping to avoid losing the entire staff for the day, are offering some workers the day off with pay so they can attend the events.

Possibly adding to the impact: organizers now are aggressively reaching out to other ethnic groups that are affected by the immigration debate, including Koreans and Chinese. Their message is that Hispanics aren't the only group that stands to lose under certain proposed changes to immigration law that would make illegal immigrants felons and penalize their employers.

The large number of demonstrators across the country last month underscored the political possibilities of a well-mobilized, but previously untapped Hispanic immigrant base. School demonstrations in Los Angeles and elsewhere -- in which Hispanics walked out of classes -- indicate the prospect of more spontaneous protests.

While it appeared that demonstrators sprang up virtually overnight, the protests were actually the culmination of weeks of planning by a loose infrastructure of unions, religious organizations, and ethnic and immigrant rights groups that in many cases organized into national coalitions on immigration several years ago.

The short-term goal is to stop legislation like the House of Representatives bill sponsored by Wisconsin Republican James Sensenbrenner, which calls for deportation of all illegal immigrants, construction of a fence along the U.S. and Mexico border, and penalizing those who aid illegal immigrants. The bigger goal, say organizers, is the passage of a Senate bill that would post more patrols along the Mexican border and create a plan to allow workers into the country and grant them credits toward obtaining visas if they paid taxes and learned English.

Each group has its own reason for supporting immigration overhauls. Unions have seen a decline in membership in part because illegal immigrants fear that joining would result in deportation. Certain faith-based organizations, led by the Roman Catholic church, have picked up the cause on the grounds that it is immoral to punish working illegal immigrants and those who help them.

Groups like Koreans and Chinese have thrown their weight behind the issue partly because of the high numbers of illegal immigrants in their own communities. About 20% of Korean immigrants in the U.S. are believed to be undocumented, according to the non-profit Pew Hispanic Center. Thousands of Chinese are also believed to be here without documentation.

"It's not just an issue for Latinos," says Hamid Khan, a Pakistani who is executive director of South Asian Network, an advocacy group that joined a protest last weekend in Costa Mesa, Calif. "It's for all communities of color."

DOJ_NMG_0025380

But not all immigrants back the demonstrations. At the Costa Mesa event, a 20-year-old son of Chilean immigrants, Daniel Calderson, showed up to protest -- for the other side. "This isn't a race issue," he says. "It's about breaking laws. He held a sign that read: "My family did it the legal way. You should too!"

The creation of nationwide coalitions isn't just a response to recent legislation, but also to rising anti-immigrant sentiment after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and the threat represented by groups like the volunteer Minuteman Project, which patrols the U.S. borders and notifies authorities if people illegally enter the country.

The broadening effort was on display last week in Nashville, when an array of immigrants, including Hispanics, Somalis, Sundanese, Kurds and Laotions, turned out for the largest rally so far in the South -- with 15,000 people in attendance. "Before, the immigrant community was invisible," says David Lubell, director of the Tennessee Immigrant and Refugee Rights Coalition. Turning out protesters has proved more difficult in the South because newer immigrants feel their position in those local communities is more tenuous than in other areas, like the Southwest.

The groups are targeting the country's roughly 26 million legal immigrants as well as the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the country. Both immigrant communities are often intertwined, even within a nuclear family. So-called mixed status families are increasingly common, say immigration experts and may run counter to opponents' argument that legal immigrants resent the idea of illegal workers "cutting" in line for legalization.

"It really doesn't matter how an immigrant came to this country, or how they gained status as an immigrant," says Eun Sook Lee, executive director of the National Korean American Service & Education Consortium. "They face the same hard life -- grasping language, finding a job and really exercising their rights.".

U.S. Urged To Apologize For 1930s Deportations (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, April 5, 2006

His father and oldest sister were farming sugar beets in the fields of Hamilton, Mont., and his mother was cooking tortillas when 6-year-old Ignacio Pia saw plainclothes authorities burst into his home.

“They came in with guns and told us to get out,” recalls Pia, 81, a retired railroad worker in Bakersfield, Calif., of the 1931 raid. “They didn't let us take anything,” not even a trunk that held birth certificates proving that he and his five siblings were U.S.-born citizens.

The family was thrown into a jail for 10 days before being sent by train to Mexico. Pia says he spent 16 years of “pure hell” there before acquiring papers of his Utah birth and returning to the USA.

The deportation of Pia's family tells an almost-forgotten story of a 1930s anti-immigrant campaign. Tens of thousands — and possibly more than 400,000 — of Mexicans and Mexican-Americans were pressured, through raids and job denials, to leave the USA, according to a USA TODAY review of documents and interviews with historians and deportees. Many, mostly children, were U.S. citizens.

If their tales seem incredible, a newspaper analysis of the history textbooks used most in U.S. middle and high schools may explain why: Little has been written about the exodus, often called “the repatriation.”

That may soon change. As the U.S. Senate prepares to vote on bills that would either help illegal workers become legal residents or boost enforcement of U.S. immigration laws, an effort to address deportations that happened 70 years ago has gained traction:

•On Thursday, Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., plans to introduce a bill in the U.S. House that calls for a commission to study the “deportation and coerced emigration” of U.S. citizens and legal residents. The panel would also recommend remedies that could include reparations. “An apology should be made,” she says.

Co-sponsor Rep. Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill., says history may repeat itself. He says a new House bill that makes being an illegal immigrant a felony could prompt a “massive deportation of U.S. citizens,” many of them U.S.-born children leaving with their parents.

“We have safeguards to ensure people aren't deported who shouldn't be,” says Jeff Lungren, GOP spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee, adding the new House bill retains those safeguards.

DOJ_NMG_0025381

•In January, California became the first state to enact a bill that apologizes to Latino families for the 1930s civil rights violations. It declined to approve the sort of reparations the U.S. Congress provided in 1988 for Japanese-Americans interned during World War II.

Democratic state Sen. Joe Dunn, a self-described "Irish white guy from Minnesota" who sponsored the state bill, is now pushing a measure to require students be taught about the 1930s emigration. He says as many as 2 million people of Mexican ancestry were coerced into leaving, 60% of them U.S. citizens.

•In October, a group of deportees and their relatives, known as los repatriados, will host a conference in Detroit on the topic. Organizer Helen Herrada, whose father was deported, has conducted 100 oral histories and produced a documentary. She says many sent to Mexico felt "humiliated" and didn't want to talk about it. "They just don't want it to happen again."

No precise figures exist on how many of those deported in the 1930s were illegal immigrants. Since many of those harassed left on their own, and their journeys were not officially recorded, there are also no exact figures on the total number who departed.

At least 345,839 people went to Mexico from 1930 to 1935, with 1931 as the peak year, says a 1936 dispatch from the U.S. Consulate General in Mexico City.

"It was a racial removal program," says Mae Ngai, an immigration history expert at the University of Chicago, adding people of Mexican ancestry were targeted.

However, Americans in the 1930s were "really hurting," says Otis Graham, history professor emeritus at the University of California, Santa Barbara. One in four workers were unemployed and many families hungry. Deporting illegal residents was not an "outrageous idea," Graham says. "Don't lose the context."

In the early 1900s, Mexicans poured into the USA, welcomed by U.S. factory and farm owners who needed their labor. Until entry rules tightened in 1924, they simply paid a nickel to cross the border and get visas for legal residency.

"The vast majority were here legally, because it was so easy to enter legally," says Kevin Johnson, a law professor at the University of California, Davis.

They spread out across the nation. They sharecropped in California, Texas and Louisiana, harvested sugar beets in Montana and Minnesota, laid railroad tracks in Kansas, mined coal in Utah and Oklahoma, packed meat in Chicago and assembled cars in Detroit.

By 1930, the U.S. Census counted 1.42 million people of Mexican ancestry, and 805,535 of them were U.S. born, up from 700,541 in 1920.

Change came in 1929, as the stock market and U.S. economy crashed. That year, U.S. officials tightened visa rules, reducing legal immigration from Mexico to a trickle. They also discussed what to do with those already in the USA.

"The government undertook a program that coerced people to leave," says Layla Razavi, policy analyst for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund (MALDEF). "It was really a hostile environment." She says federal officials in the Hoover administration, like local-level officials, made no distinction between people of Mexican ancestry who were in the USA legally and those who weren't.

"The document trail is shocking," says Dunn, whose staff spent two years researching the topic after he read the 1995 book Decade of Betrayal: Mexican Repatriation in the 1930s, by Francisco Balderrama and Raymond Rodriguez.

USA TODAY reviewed hundreds of pages of documents, some provided by Dunn and MALDEF and others found at the National Archives. They cite officials saying the deportations lawfully focused on illegal immigrants while the exodus of legal residents was voluntary. Yet they suggest people of Mexican ancestry faced varying forms of harassment and intimidation:

•Raids. Officials staged well-publicized raids in public places. On Feb. 26, 1931, immigration officials suddenly closed off La Placita, a square in Los Angeles, and questioned the roughly 400 people there about their legal status.

The raids "created a climate of fear and anxiety" and prompted many Mexicans to leave voluntarily, says Balderrama, professor of Chicano studies and history at California State University, Los Angeles.

In a June 1931 memo to superiors, Walter Carr, Los Angeles district director of immigration, said "thousands upon thousands of Mexican aliens" have been "literally scared out of Southern California."

DOJ_NMG_0025382

Some of them came from hospitals and needed medical care en route to Mexico, immigrant inspector Harry Yeager wrote in a November 1932 letter.

The Wickersham Commission, an 11-member panel created by President Hoover, said in a May 1931 report that immigration inspectors made "checkups" of boarding houses, restaurants and pool rooms without "warrants of any kind." Labor Secretary William Doak responded that the "checkups" occurred very rarely.

•Jobs withheld. Prodded by labor unions, states and private companies barred non-citizens from some jobs, Balderrama says.

"We need their jobs for needy citizens," C.P. Visel of the Los Angeles Citizens Committee for Coordination of Unemployment Relief wrote in a 1931 telegram. In a March 1931 letter to Doak, Visel applauded U.S. officials for the "exodus of aliens deportable and otherwise who have been scared out of the community."

Emilia Castenada, 79, recalls coming home from school in 1935 in Los Angeles and hearing her father say he was being deported because "there was no work for Mexicans." She says her father, a stonemason, was a legal resident who owned property. A U.S. citizen who spoke little Spanish, she left the USA with her brother and father, who was never allowed back.

"The jobs were given to the white Americans, not the Mexicans," says Carlos DeAnda Guerra, 77, a retired furniture upholsterer in Carpinteria, Calif. He says his parents entered the USA legally in 1917 but were denied jobs. He, his mother and five U.S.-born siblings were deported in 1931, while his father, who then went into hiding, stayed to pick oranges.

"The slogan has gone out over the city (Los Angeles) and is being adhered to — 'Employ no Mexican while a white man is unemployed,' " wrote George Clements, manager of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce's agriculture department, in a memo to his boss Arthur Arnoll. He said the Mexicans' legal status was not a factor: "It is a question of pigment, not a question of citizenship or right."

•Public aid threatened. County welfare offices threatened to withhold the public aid of many Mexican-Americans, Ngai says. Memos show they also offered to pay for trips to Mexico but sometimes failed to provide adequate food. An immigration inspector reported in a November 1932 memo that no provisions were made for 78 children on a train. Their only sustenance: a few ounces of milk daily.

Most of those leaving were told they could return to the USA whenever they wanted, wrote Clements in an August 1931 letter. "This is a grave mistake, because it is not the truth." He reported each was given a card that made their return impossible, because it showed they were "county charities." Even those born in the USA, he wrote, wouldn't be able to return unless they had a birth certificate or similar proof.

•Forced departures. Some of the deportees who were moved by train or car had guards to ensure they left the USA and others were sent south on a "closed-body school bus" or "Mexican gun boat," memos show.

"Those who tried to say 'no' ended up in the physical deportation category," Dunn says, adding they were taken in squad cars to train stations.

Mexican-Americans recall other pressure tactics. Arthur Herrada, 81, a retired Ford engineer in Huron, Ohio, says his father, who was a legal U.S. resident, was threatened with deportation if he didn't join the U.S. Army. His father enlisted.

"It was an injustice that shouldn't have happened," says Jose Lopez, 79, a retired Ford worker in Detroit. He says his father came to the USA legally but couldn't find his papers in 1931 and was deported. To keep the family together, his mother took her six U.S.-born children to Mexico, where they often survived on one meal a day. Lopez welcomes a U.S. apology.

So does Guerra, the retired upholsterer, whose voice still cracks with emotion when he talks about how deportation tore his family apart. "I'm very resentful. I don't trust the government at all," says Guerra, who later served in the U.S. military.

Pia says his entire family got typhoid fever in Mexico and his father, who had worked in Utah coal mines, died of black lung disease in 1935. "My mother was left destitute, with six of us, in a country we knew nothing about," he says. They lived in the slums of Mexico City, where his formal education ended in sixth grade. "We were misfits there. We weren't welcome."

"The Depression was very bad here. You can imagine how hard it was in Mexico," says Pia, who proudly notes the advanced college degrees of each of his four U.S.-raised sons. "You can't put 16 years of pure hell out of your mind."

Backstory: Inside 'Border Patrol, Inc.' (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0025383

By Faye Bowers

The Christian Science Monitor, April 5, 2006

NOGALES, ARIZ. - Inside the border patrol, they're called the "rock group" - agents, trained as welders, who spend days repairing holes in a 15-foot-high steel wall here along the border to keep out illegal immigrants. Both human traffickers and drug smugglers pay Mexican boys to use hacksaws - sometimes working all day - to cut holes in the wall, an "iron curtain" made out of salvaged aircraft-carrier landing mats. The welders respond with molten metal.

But while they're working, the agents are frequently pelted with rocks by youths on the Mexican side of the controversial wall. Hence the rock group moniker - a reference to the mini-intafada here rather than any parallel with Mick Jagger. The "boys are hurling stones today, so be careful," one agent warns us as we tour the area.

The tale of the hacksaws and the welders is a metaphor for life along the dusty US-Mexico border in an era of heightened security and expanding illegal immigration.

Up and down the 2,000-mile border, the US government is throwing more manpower and sophisticated technology into slowing illegal entries into the US. But as it does, immigrants are showing greater ingenuity in circumventing the barriers and patrols.

Now, as Congress considers another overhaul of immigration laws, the encounters and clashes along the border are likely to intensify. Most of the bills in Congress include provisions to expand the border patrol (now part of US Customs and Border Protection), which has already seen agent strength along the nation's southern flank more than double since 9/11, to 11,000.

The result is an agency that is becoming increasingly complex and unwieldy. Agents already use everything from horses to mountain bikes to all-terrain vehicles to track drug smugglers and human traffickers. They also use aerial surveillance, periscope trucks, and underground sensors. Yet, through it all, the task of stopping illegal immigration can still seem daunting, if not futile, as a day in the life of the border patrol here recently showed.

***

The nerve center of operations in the Tucson sector, a 261-mile stretch of border, is an expansive new brick-and-glass headquarters in Nogales. In one room - the intelligence hub - sits a U-shaped set of desks with 25 television monitors that show various grids of the desolate desert area. The new technology employed along the border - movement sensors buried amid the mesquite, cameras, and two unmanned aircraft - transmit information instantly to the monitors.

Camera 17 is trained on someone walking along the border fence. He suddenly spots the roving eye and ducks behind a tree. Camera 35 shows where an underground sensor has gone off, so the agent dispatches a crew to "lie in wait" for the crossers. They will pack in on horseback or on four-wheelers. Sometimes it takes two to three days to reach the spots - and the waiting can be inhospitable. One agent, Shannon Stevens, recalls her first ambush duty: She was stalked by a tarantula.

In another room, the walls are decorated with photos of confiscated items - knives, shotguns, 4,391 pounds of cocaine from a bust. Here, junior agents attend classes in Spanish and immigration law one day a week for 10 months. They're tested twice. If they fail, they lose their job. The lessons are a follow-up to the 19 weeks the agents spend at an academy that includes the equivalent of three years of college Spanish. Jim Hawkins, a senior agent, says the border patrol receives 40,000 applications a year. Only 2,000 to 3,000 survive screening and training.

Another room in the building is reserved for confiscated drugs. On this day, agents have loaded some 5,000 pounds of marijuana into two Penske moving vans and sent it north to Tucson for burning, which happens once a week.

***

To stem illegal entries in Nogales, the agency is trying a "defense in depth" strategy. It involves blocking smuggling routes through the town with the lit up "iron curtain" - and pushing the traffickers farther out in the desert, where agents have two or three days to track them. The idea is also to avoid shootouts in populated areas.

On the ground, the agency is bolstering surveillance with a new "scope truck." It looks like a Chevy camper. But the roof has been cut out and a large infrared camera sits in the back like a periscope. Controlling it with a joy stick, agents can see illegals at night as far as six miles away.

We leave headquarters and bump along a road for several miles that follows a border ridge through the Coronado National Forest. Only three strings of barbed wire separate the US from Mexico here. The Mexico side is on high ground - rolling hills dotted with oak and walnut trees that provide cover for smugglers. Although no people are crossing, worn paths littered with empty water jugs wind across the border at frequent intervals.

DOJ_NMG_0025384

We circle back west and head through the city, where houses are painted in pastels. Hawkins points out what he calls the most troublesome drug-smuggling neighborhood in Nogales. A supposed drug lord's large hacienda sits among scores of shanties.

Farther east we reach Hamburger Hill, a notorious smuggling route. Below, the welders repair the fence. Their truck is fortified with mesh cages to protect the windows from the rock throwers. Sometimes the stoning is just a diversion, Hawkins says: While the youths throw, a smuggler crosses a short distance away.

"Manpower alone is not going" to stop this, says Rodolfo Espino, a political scientist at Arizona State University in Tempe. "As long as there's a pull for employees on this side of the border, there will be a constant push to enter from the Mexican side."

Driving back through Nogales, the agents note other ways illegals gain entry. Underneath two dry washes, which the border patrol filled in to prevent crossings, the immigrants crawl through a metal drainage culvert. To stop this, agents fabricated a steel door for the pipe. The smugglers retaliated with hydraulic jacks. The agents responded with sensors, cameras, and flood lights. It's keeping the smugglers at bay, for now.

"It's a game of constant adjustments," sighs Hawkins.

The Amnesty Trap (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

When the week began, it looked almost as if it was time to celebrate a springtime blossoming of good sense in Washington. The Senate appeared to be closing in on solid bipartisan support for a comprehensive overhaul of the nation's immigration system. That meant adopting an approach that has been on the table for months in a bill offered last year by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy, then revised and passed last month by the Senate Judiciary Committee. It combines, sensibly, tighter borders with a path to citizenship for people here illegally.

The bill's opponents, including the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, had long derided the multifaceted strategy as "amnesty," but over the weekend even Mr. Frist appeared to have a light bulb go off. On a talk show and in a news release, he recast his definition of the word in a way that seemed to justify allowing at least some of the nation's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants to get in line for green cards.

But it is too soon to exhale. The Judiciary Committee's bill apparently remains stuck in the amnesty trap. While it has enough votes to pass, it may not have enough to avoid a filibuster by hard-core Republicans. For them, anything other than punishment and border enforcement smacks unforgivably of forgiveness.

Now Senators Mel Martinez of Florida and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska are offering a "fallback" compromise if the committee bill fails. They would not eliminate the citizenship track, but narrow it severely. Immigrants who have been here at least five years could apply, but those who arrived more recently would be treated more harshly. The details were unclear yesterday, but the newcomers might either have to leave the country to apply for citizenship, or do so from a border city, like El Paso.

Arbitrarily separating the illegal immigrant population with a five-year rule would be cruel. Inviting millions of them to report to be deported would be utterly unfeasible. And turning El Paso into the "Go" square in Monopoly would just be stupid. It would add a meaningless hurdle to a citizenship obstacle course that is already long and difficult. All it would do is give a face-saving assurance to hard-liners that immigrants would suffer adequately for their green cards and allow Republicans to reassure suspicious constituents: this is so not amnesty.

Half-measures and semantic trickery are not what's needed now. This country has been on a long and improbable path to immigration reform. The more it has wrestled with the issue, the more distance has grown between the thoughtful Americans and the nativists who long for a Great Wall of Mexico, or for a two-tiered nation of citizens and of immigrant hired hands, free to toil forever as guest workers but never to fully join our society.

The Martinez-Hagel compromise is a bad idea. It's tempting to think flawed reform is better than none, but the wiser approach is to stand firm for what Mr. Kennedy has called "the real enchilada." We need to get it right this time, once and for all.

Here We Go Again (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0025385

USA Today, April 5, 2006

They never learn. Politicians keep pushing "guest worker" programs, even though the concept is built to fail and always does.

I don't mean what President Bush wants — where as many as 12 million illegal immigrants could stay in the USA for three years, and then apply to stay for another three years, before being expected to "self-deport." That's not realistic. Nor is it a genuine guest-worker program. People who are already here aren't really guests. What Bush proposes is temporary amnesty.

I'm talking about importing hundreds of thousands of new foreign workers from a country such as Mexico to work in farming, construction, hotels or restaurants.

That's what Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., has proposed as part of a reform bill that his Judiciary Committee put together and which serves as a starting point for the Senate immigration debate. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has a competing bill that steers clear of guest workers, focusing instead on enforcement and increasing the allotment of green cards.

Here we go again. The U.S. government has turned to foreign workers before. And given that these programs are often criticized as indentured servitude, it's ironic that the person who kicked off the phenomenon also freed the slaves.

Under pressure from industries suffering labor shortages during the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln settled on foreign workers as the solution. Congress passed the Act to Encourage Immigration of 1864, which allowed employers to recruit foreign workers and pay their way to America.

Workers were supposed to forfeit some of their pay to their sponsor, but many also had to work off living expenses and wound up in debt. Labor groups, concerned that foreign workers were taking jobs from Americans, pressured Congress to repeal the act, and by 1868 it was no longer in effect.

In 1917, under pressure mostly from farmers during World War I, Congress launched a foreign-worker program to allow farmers to import workers from Mexico. It didn't go as planned. Politicians thought the workers would return home, but many did not. Eventually, the war ended, and so did the urgent need for guest workers.

The idea made a comeback during World War II, which brought another labor shortage and the arrival of the most infamous guest workers of all: the braceros. The name comes from the Spanish word for arms, brazos, as in someone who works with his arms and hands.

From 1942 to '64, under an agreement between the United States and Mexico, nearly 5 million Mexican workers went north to work in the fields. The workers were promised housing, transportation, food, fair wages and health care — most of which never materialized.

Perhaps farmers thought the benefits too costly, which isn't good when you're talking about a program that was supposed to reduce labor costs. Congress shut down the program after television journalist Edward R. Murrow documented the abuse of workers. It was bye, bye braceros.

Too many politicians and businesses view guest workers as the magic-wand solution to our immigration woes. Employers get workers. Workers get jobs. And then those workers head back across the border where they belong. They don't hang out, buy homes, enroll their children in school, join the PTA, start businesses, and change the culture and complexion of neighborhoods and towns.

Put aside the fact that guest workers are a form of corporate welfare or that, ideally, government shouldn't be in the labor-contracting business.

There are practical reasons why guest-worker programs don't work:

• Workers don't leave. While the workers are supposed to be temporary, they stick around. They get married, have kids and put down roots. As former U.S. senator Alan Simpson of Wyoming used to say, there is nothing more permanent than a temporary worker.

• Backlash never abates. Because these temporary workers never leave, a guest-worker program doesn't really put an end to the thing that gets Americans all worked up in the first place — the changing culture and complexion of towns and neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0025386

• Exploitation happens. Guest workers are ripe for abuse because if employers were to provide things such as housing, prevailing wages, health care and worker's compensation insurance, that would undermine the whole idea behind the program: cheap labor. Once labor isn't so cheap anymore, expect employers to lose interest.

• Illegal immigration continues. Most guest-worker plans deal in the hundreds of thousands. As long as millions of immigrants want to come to the USA and can fill millions of jobs, such a limited approach would never end illegal entry.

Congress should forget about importing new guest workers, or granting a wholesale amnesty to all 12 million illegal workers already here, and focus on reforms that stand a chance of working.

Here's a four-point plan to add to the mix:

1) Stiffen penalties against employers, including jail time, and enforce them for a change.

2) Beef up the ranks of the border patrol by 25%.

3) Increase the allotment of green cards and work visas to allow people to come in legally.

4) Grant legal status to some but not all illegal immigrants, the preference going to those who have been here the longest and who have immediate family members who are U.S. citizens.

And, lastly, let's accept the idea that, in this debate, there are no easy solutions or free lunches.

A Potential Tidal Wave Come Election Time (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Two hundred; 500; 1,000; 2,000; 10,000; 300,000; 500,000. Far from counting sheep, these numbers of protesters signify an awakening. Political pundits and community activists say the prospect of congressional action on immigration reform has stirred up the Latino community.

Protesters have taken to the streets in cities coast to coast, chanting their opposition in two languages to the immigration reform plans being debated in Congress.

The threats of criminalizing undocumented immigrants and the Good Samaritans who help them, separating families, imposing a man-made border, toiling away at a government-sanctioned job while paying taxes but still having no clear path to citizenship — those are just a few issues propelling people to forgo the safety of society's shadows to speak out in unison.

It's clear that depending on which side of the river you're looking across from, immigration reform is either a political/economic issue or a human rights cause.

Members of Congress, who think their chances at future elections will be enhanced with voters if they play hardball with the issue, sprinkle their speech with words such as "terrorists" and "porous border" in the same breath with "illegals" and "taking jobs from Americans."

Sympathetic supporters and the undocumented hear the ticking of the proverbial clock — not for when as many as 12 million people will be expected to turn themselves in, but for when they will be forced to live even more secretive, invisible lives.

Native-born attitudes

Though 12 million is a huge number of people, it pales in comparison with the 28 million Latinos in the USA who already have access to public services, health care, car insurance, among other taken-for-granted rights that come with legal status. These are the people who must be stirred to action.

It won't be an easy task. For one, Latinos are not a monolithic group. For another, a 2005 Pew Hispanic Center study found that although most Latinos have positive attitudes toward immigrants, native-born Latinos tend to be more divided in how they view the effect of illegal immigrants on U.S. society.

When native-born Latinos were asked whether illegal migrants helped the economy by providing low-cost labor rather than hurt the economy by driving wages down, 55% agreed vs. 34% who did not.

Where the political clout rests

The 12 million undocumented immigrants here have no influence over elected leaders. They're not citizens. They can't vote. They can make a lot of noise; they can't make a difference in a politician's future.

DOJ_NMG_0025387

But there are at least 15 million eligible Hispanic voters, and they can — if only they'd wield the full force of their votes. Numbers from the 2004 election, though, are not encouraging. Just 47% of Hispanic U.S. citizens (of any race) questioned after the election said they had voted. In contrast:

• 67% of non-Hispanic whites did.

• 60% of African-Americans did.

• 44% of Asian-Americans did.

The top reason given for why many eligible Hispanics didn't vote was that they were too busy or had a conflicting schedule. Another reason: They weren't interested.

Time will tell what actions Congress will take against as many as 12 million illegal immigrants. Only then will we see whether this sleeping giant holding Latino votes has truly awakened, or is merely yawning before turning over to go back to sleep.

Fuzzy Math On Illegal Immigration (WSJ)

By Carl Bialik

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

New York Democrat Charles Schumer said legislation is needed "to solve the problem of millions of foreigners who live here illegally and unprotected" as well as "to alleviate the problem of the millions more who enter illegally every year." He kept his estimate of the number of illegal immigrants vague because "no one knows for sure how many are really here," the National Journal reported. "Nor can anyone give a reliable estimate of how fast that unknown figure is growing each year."

A sound bite from last week? Nope. The year was 1985, Mr. Schumer was in the House of Representatives and debate was raging over how to address the growing number of illegal immigrants, then estimated at somewhere between 3 million and 12 million.

Twenty-one years later, several amnesties granted to undocumented immigrants have failed to keep the number of illegal immigrants from growing. And estimates of their numbers remain fuzzy and full of pitfalls, even as lawmakers toss them around in the latest round of debates over whether to offer guest-worker status to illegal immigrants.

At the core of the problem is the fact that undocumented immigrants don't generally come forward to be counted. The most widely quoted estimate of 11 million to 12 million is derived indirectly, using what's called a residual method: Researchers subtract the number of immigrants who were authorized to come to the U.S. from the number of foreign-born residents counted by the Census Bureau, then adjust the number using estimates of immigrants' deaths and migration, and of Census undercounting. Some critics say that estimate understates the degree of undercounting: Another estimate making the rounds holds that there are 20 million illegal immigrants.

That was the upper range Bear Stearns analysts Robert Justice and Betty Ng estimated last year, citing high growth rates in foreign remittances and in school enrollments in localities with high illegal-immigrant populations. The analysts added, "According to our discussions with illegal immigrants, they avoid responding to census questionnaires."

And there are still-higher estimates to be found online: The Web site of the "immigration crime-fighting" group American Resistance Foundation estimates there are more than 28 million illegal immigrants, based largely on border-patrol apprehension rates; however, there is little reliable data on how many border-crossers who are caught try to enter a second time.

"No one really knows," says Bill Strassberger, a spokesman for the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a branch of the Department of Homeland Security.

Of those citing the 20 million figure, Mr. Strassberger says that "the number seems to be agenda-driven." But if so, it's not always the same agenda doing the driving.

On CNN last Sunday, anchor Lou Dobbs, who has argued for tighter border controls, spoke of "the toll that 20 million illegal aliens take on the infrastructure of the United States and on local, state, and federal taxpayer budgets." (At other times during his recent broadcasts, Mr. Dobbs has cited a range between 11 million and 20 million. A CNN spokeswoman says Mr. Dobbs is relying on the Bear Stearns report for the higher number.)

DOJ_NMG_0025388

But talk-show host Tony Snow, arguing that immigrants are a boon to the economy, wrote Monday, "The United States somehow has managed to absorb 10 million to 20 million illegal immigrants not only without turning into Animal Farm, but while cranking up the most impressive economic recovery in two decades."

In 2000, before it was folded into DHS, the Immigration and Naturalization Service used the residual method to estimate there were seven million illegal immigrants and their numbers were growing by 250,000 to 300,000 per year. Mr. Strassberger says that remains the government's best estimate, though he concedes it's out of date.

Following largely the same procedure that INS used, the Washington, D.C., think tank Pew Hispanic Center counted 11 million illegal immigrants last year, and between 11.5 million and 12 million last month; the group is the source for most lawmakers and reporters citing a number. (The Wall Street Journal generally has printed estimates of 11 million, or a range of 11 million to 12 million.)

But the residual method is by necessity complicated, and each step in its formula introduces uncertainty. Jeffrey Passel, a Pew senior research associate, walked me through the procedure (also outlined in Pew's latest report). The starting point is the Census Bureau's annual Current Population Survey report, which bases a count of foreign-born residents on interviews conducted with about 80,000 households. The Census intentionally seeks out a disproportionately large number of Hispanic households to get richer data. Interviewers, either by telephone or in person, ask where every member of each household was born. These figures are then extrapolated to the nation, adjusting for the larger sample of Hispanics. The latest estimate of foreign-born Americans to emerge from such calculations was roughly 36 million, Dr. Passel says.

Next, Pew subtracts the number of foreign-born Americans authorized to be in the country. Dr. Passel's team compiles annual numbers of green-card recipients, refugees and people granted asylum, a count that stretches back decades. But merely adding these numbers would be misleading, because some authorized immigrants decide to leave the country and others die. Dr. Passel assumes that immigrants of a certain age die at the same rate as the country's residents overall, and uses estimates from various studies on "outmigration," something he concedes is "hard to measure." (The outmigration numbers are also much bigger -- perhaps seven times as large -- as the number of deaths, because immigrants tend to be young.) Then the calculated total is subtracted from the total number of foreign-born residents, and the result is adjusted upwards by 10% to account for census undercounting of illegal immigrants. (That adjustment is based on one post-Census 2000 survey of undercounting among Mexican immigrants in the Los Angeles-area; other studies have yielded different estimates of undercounting.)

Dr. Passel and Robert Warren pioneered the residual method while working together at the Census Bureau in the 1980s. Dr. Warren then helped develop INS's methods for its 2000 estimate, so it's no surprise that the government's methods are similar to Pew's. Michael Hoefer, director of the office of immigration statistics, a branch of DHS, told me that the government uses the Census Bureau's American Community Survey instead of the Current Population Survey, which is based on a larger sample of households but is published later than the CPS. (Mr. Hoefer's office is working on a 2004 estimate to update the 2000 official figure of seven million.)

Also, Pew's count of illegal immigrants includes those considered "quasi-legal," meaning they're on their way to legal status, and awaiting asylum or in temporary protected status; INS's count doesn't, though the next round of government estimates might. That could mean a difference of about one million in the total count, Mr. Hoefer says.

Back in 1985, Dr. Passel told the National Journal, "The fatal flaw in virtually every study was that there's some assumption that you have to make in your estimation model for which there is absolutely no data." But he says now that estimation methods have improved, thanks to refinements of the residual-method technique, more-regular Census counts of the foreign-born population, and comparison of the numbers with Mexico population figures to see if the estimate of illegal immigrants from Mexico squares with a gap between expected and actual population counts south of the border.

However, there is still large uncertainty in the current estimates, due largely to Census undercounting and limited data about immigrants leaving the country. It's impossible to say how uncertain the estimates are; neither Pew nor the government publishes a margin of error, which is a standard component of most statistical estimates.

The variable numbers have provided material for Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert, who noted that on a recent Sunday political talk-show, Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, referred to "11 million undocumented aliens," and just 30 minutes later on a different network, Massachusetts Democrat Ted Kennedy used the "12 million figure." Mr. Colbert's comment:

DOJ_NMG_0025389

"One million illegals snuck into this country in half an hour! That is alarming. At that rate the entire population of Mexico would be here in three days. Congress, get to work on that fence." Mr. Kennedy's spokesman cited the Pew report; a representative for Mr. Specter didn't return my call seeking comment. (Numbers Guy readers Allen Cantrell, Shauna Laughna and Robert Tamiso also spotted inconsistent immigration numbers and suggested this column topic.)

Not everyone agrees that the numbers debate matters. "As long as people concede that the number is large to begin with and is increasing, the number itself is irrelevant," Vernon Briggs, a professor of labor economics at Cornell who favors enforcing sanctions against employers of illegal immigrants, told me.

But if that were so, the numbers wouldn't be continually cited by lawmakers and the press, who would serve their constituents and audience better by acknowledging the uncertainty of these estimates.

The Immigration Impasse: A Way Out (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Our immigration debate is at an impasse. The House has passed a mean-spirited and delusional bill that focuses heavily on border security and would criminalize some humanitarian acts that aid immigrants. As for the 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here, the supposition is that they should somehow go home. Just how is unclear. Meanwhile, the Senate seems ready to authorize up to 400,000 "guest workers" annually. Guest workers, also endorsed by President Bush, would reduce illegal immigration by giving many of the same people -- mainly poor and unskilled Mexicans -- work permits. The Senate approach also is delusional and undesirable. It would increase American poverty under the guise of curing worker "shortages."

We can do better, but chances are we won't. In 2004 immigrants accounted for nearly 12 percent of the population, the highest share since the 1920s. The fact that there are so many immigrants makes discussion harder because passions on both sides are so easily aroused. Already, hundreds of thousands of Hispanics have marched in Los Angeles, Chicago, Washington and elsewhere. But broader public opinion is also increasingly agitated. A new survey by the Pew Hispanic Center finds that 52 percent of Americans think immigrants "are a burden because they take jobs [and] housing." That's up sharply from 38 percent in 2000.

In this climate, the immigration debate has become an exercise in political public relations, often disconnected from practical realities. Republicans and Democrats are trying in different ways to appease middle-class anxieties without alienating present and future Hispanic voters. The one saving grace is that we may still have time to fashion a more sensible consensus. By the Pew poll, most Americans aren't yet so fearful of immigration that they aren't open to reason and evidence. Only 21 percent see immigration as a "very big problem" in their localities, although responses are higher in areas of greater immigration (55 percent in Phoenix, 36 percent in Las Vegas).

Let me outline what I think such a consensus might be. It has three elements and borrows from both House and Senate approaches.

· Strengthen border and employer enforcement. Unless it's stopped, the present illegal immigration of an estimated 500,000 people annually will overwhelm any system. The main lure is jobs. That's why it's essential to adopt a mandatory requirement for employers to verify new workers -- electronic checking of documents. Companies that hire illegal immigrants should be penalized heavily. But it's also essential to dry up the supply. In an earlier column, I supported the construction of fences or walls, 20 to 30 feet high, along the Mexican border. They would, I think, significantly reduce the flow, though some would still come by overstaying student and tourist visas.

· Grant amnesty to existing illegal immigrants . President Bush and many Republicans oppose this, but it's essential. We can't run an immigration system that condones mass illegality. Most illegal immigrants deserve legal standing -- and a path to citizenship. Although they "broke the law," we (meaning American society) encouraged them by inadequately policing the border and employers. Most won't voluntarily return home, where typical wages are 80 percent lower. Trying to force them back would create a huge backlash. We'd have stories of parents being torn from their American-born children. Companies would complain that government was destroying their firms by removing longtime, diligent workers. Finally, the failure to legalize today's illegal workers would weaken companies' incentives to comply with checks of new workers. If firms were already breaking the law to stay in business, why not take the added risk?

DOJ_NMG_0025390

· Forget guest workers . Maybe a few job categories (sheepherders) with existing guest worker programs are justified. But businesses' complaints of widespread labor "shortages" mainly put a respectable face on their thirst for cheap labor. Most guest workers won't go home, even if required (see above). They'll become illegal immigrants or citizens. Either way, adding poor people is bad social policy. It would bloat the demand for government social services. And it would hurt today's poor -- including other immigrants and many African Americans -- by keeping wages down. Jobs attracting lots of immigrants have low wage increases. From 2002 to 2004, median hourly wages rose only 2 percent for construction laborers and 3.6 percent for dishwashers.

On paper, this package has something for everyone. It lifts anxiety for today's illegal immigrants and acknowledges their dignity. It lets companies keep today's illegal workers. It toughens border and employer policing. But it would also disappoint everyone. For business groups, immigration advocates and Bush, there would be no new guest workers. The president and House Republicans would have to swallow amnesty, though maybe they could change the label and debate the details. One Senate proposal envisions an 11-year transition period and a requirement to learn English.

I don't claim that this approach would succeed. Preventing illegal immigration may prove impossible. If so, we'll need to rethink immigration policy fundamentally. But I do believe this approach has better chances of success than most of the congressional proposals. Unless we legalize today's illegal immigrants and reject large-scale guest worker programs, we will indefinitely have two tiers of immigrants -- legal and illegal -- with the prospect that the stigma of illegality will taint the legal. By success, I mean that new immigrants gradually think of themselves as Americans and that most slowly disperse all along the economic spectrum. And immigration ceases to be a major issue, because it is no longer a source of large social and economic conflicts.

High Fence And Big Gate (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

America today is struggling to find the right balance of policies on immigration. Personally, I favor a very high fence, with a very big gate.

So far, neither President Bush's proposal to allow the nation's millions of illegal immigrants to stay temporarily on work visas, nor the most hard-line G.O.P. counterproposal, which focuses only on border security, leaves me satisfied. We need a better blend of the two — a blend that will keep America the world's greatest magnet for immigrants. Why?

First, the world is flattening, and as a result more and more people around the globe have access to the same technological tools for innovation and entrepreneurship. In such a world, where innovation is concentrated really matters — because that is where the best management, research and sales jobs will be located for any company.

Because of its deeply rooted culture of immigration, the U.S. has a huge advantage in such a world. If we are smart, we can still cream off the most first-round intellectual draft choices from around the world — more than any other country — and bring that talent to our shores to start companies and work in others.

We have gone from the Iron Age to the Industrial Age to the Information Age to the Talent Age, and countries that make it easy to draw in human talent will have a distinct advantage today.

Anybody out there try to become a Swiss citizen lately? It's not so easy — and it's also not an accident that Switzerland's most famous product is the cuckoo clock.

Second, a steady flow of immigrants keeps a society flexible and competitive. In this flat world, more people than ever can leverage technology. So whatever can be done — whatever today's technologies enable and empower — will be done by someone, somewhere. The only question is whether it will be done by you or to you. The more open your society is to new people and ideas, the more things will be done by you, not to you.

We shouldn't just welcome educated immigrants, but laborers as well — not only because we need manual laborers, but also because they bring an important energy. As the Indian-American entrepreneur Vivek Paul likes to say: "The very act of leaving behind your own society is an intense motivator. ... Whether you are a doctor or a gardener, you are intensely motivated to succeed."

DOJ_NMG_0025391

We need that steady energy flow, especially with India and China exploding onto the world stage with huge pent-up aspirations. If you want to know what China and India feel like today, just take out a Champagne bottle, shake it for 10 minutes and then take off the cork. Don't get in the way of that cork. Immigrants keep that kind of energy flowing in America's veins.

An amnesty for the 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already here is hardly ideal. It would reward illegal behavior. But since we are not going to deport them all, some version of the Arlen Specter bill seems like the right way to go: Illegal immigrants who were in the U.S. before Jan. 7, 2004, could apply for three-year guest-worker visas, each renewable one time if the applicant paid a $1,000 fine and passed a background check. After six years, if the immigrant learned sufficient English and paid another $1,000 fine and back taxes, he or she could start to apply for citizenship.

But because I strongly favor immigration, I also favor a high fence — if not a physical one, then at least a tamperproof national ID card for every American, without which you could not get a legal job or access to government services. We will not sustain a majority in favor of flexible immigration if we can't control our borders.

Good fences make good immigration policy. Fences make people more secure and able to think through this issue more calmly. Porous borders empower only anti-immigrant demagogues, like the shameful CNN, which dumbs down the whole debate.

We also need to control the influx of immigrants because one byproduct of the flattening of the world is that many decent low-end factory jobs previously open to someone with only a high school degree or less are now disappearing. As Dan Pink notes in his book, "A Whole New Mind," many of those jobs can now be done faster by a computer or cheaper by a Chinese worker. Therefore, we can't just endlessly expand our pool of manual labor without condemning people at that low end, particularly black men, to a future of declining wages or unemployment. That will have terrible social consequences.

For all these reasons, I weigh each immigration proposal with two questions: "Does it offer a real fence? Does it offer a real gate?"

TAX:

SoCal Anti-tax Crusader Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison (AP)

AP, April 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES – Nationally known anti-tax crusader George Henry "Nick" Jesson will serve 27 months in prison for tax fraud, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson on Monday also ordered Jesson, 55, to pay $215,454 in restitution to the federal government. The Fountain Valley resident, who ran for California governor in 2002, was taken into custody after his sentencing.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Brown said she believes the sentence was "wholly appropriate" and would deter others from considering anti-tax protests.

Jesson's wife, Trina Thi Vu, declined to comment after the sentencing, as did her attorney, citing pending state tax charges against the couple. Jesson's attorney, Robert Barnes of Malibu, could not be reached for comment.

Jesson pleaded guilty last June to filing a false federal tax form in May 2000. He had stated that his Huntington Beach company, No Time Delay Electronics, paid no wages in 1997 when he actually paid wages of $177,083 that year to himself and $273,236 to his wife. He also admitted to falsely obtaining a business tax refund of $215,454.

Jesson and his wife face trial in state court on six felony counts of failing to pay taxes on $3 million in income from 1997 to 1999. Jesson could get nine more years in prison and his wife a seven-year sentence if they're convicted of all counts.

Jesson ran for governor on an anti-tax platform and finished fourth of seven candidates in the 2002 Republican primary.

He was involved with an organization called "We the People for Constitutional Education," which contended that paying taxes is not required in the United States. He dared tax agents to try to collect from him and described raids on his home and business as "terrorist attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0025392

Last month, he didn't show up for his scheduled sentencing on federal tax fraud charges. He was taken into custody after his wife told federal marshals he had left the house that morning despondent and possibly with a weapon.

Tax Preparers Come Under Fire (WSJ)

By Tom Herman And Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

A new government report highlights persistent problems of tax preparers cheating on clients' returns, sparking calls among leading senators to fast-track proposed legislation that would further regulate the tax-preparation industry.

The report by the Government Accountability Office was presented yesterday at a Senate Finance Committee hearing in Washington into tax-preparation issues. The report detailed undercover visits by government investigators to 19 outlets of several commercial tax-preparation chains, which weren't identified. Staffers posed as taxpayers and asked the firms to prepare -- but not file -- federal returns under two scenarios. In 10 of the 19 cases, preparers failed to report side income that had been supplied by the taxpayer, the GAO report said. Some preparers also missed key tax-saving opportunities, such as neglecting to itemize deductions or failing to claim all available deductions, it said.

GAO officials noted the survey was narrow and shouldn't be used to generalize about the industry. Still, senators said the results were disturbing and strengthened the case for new legislation. The report comes on top of other GAO studies in recent years suggesting that a number of taxpayers who relied on paid preparers may have paid too much in taxes because of overlooked tax breaks.

More than 60% of all individual income-tax returns are signed by paid preparers, up from 46% in the mid-1980s, said Sen. Chuck Grassley, the committee chairman. Industry experts estimate the number of tax preparers nationwide is in the range of 1.2 million to 1.6 million. Among them are highly trained certified public accountants, lawyers and enrolled agents, all of whom already face regulation from the Internal Revenue Service. At the other end are storefronts staffed by part-timers with little or no training. Proposed legislation is aimed at bringing these and many other paid preparers under the IRS's regulatory wing. In most states, "anyone can be a paid preparer regardless of education, training or licensure," the GAO said.

H&R Block Inc., the nation's biggest tax-preparation chain, says it runs a 66-hour tax course and administers a test to prospective hires. The firm said it also maintains continuing education programs from year to year. The GAO report didn't identify any of the firms its investigators visited in their survey.

In recent years, the IRS has been turning up the heat on fraudulent preparers as part of a broad-based attack on tax cheating and dodging. At the same time, the IRS has been cracking down on CPAs, lawyers and others involved in complex tax shelters.

Industry experts say tax preparers sometimes receive payment in the form of a percentage of any tax refund, which can give the preparer an incentive to magnify tax breaks. Other preparers may be eager to maintain customer loyalty, or to sell them additional products, such as instant refund loans or audit insurance.

The GAO report found a range of faulty practices. Of tax preparers surveyed, there were "unwarranted extra refunds" of nearly $2,000 in five cases, while in two cases the preparers cost the taxpayer more than $1,500. Had these problems been spotted by the IRS on real returns, "many of the preparers would have been subject to penalties" for such things as negligence and willful or reckless disregard of tax rules. But taxpayers would be on the hook for underpayments and interest, plus possibly penalties.

Senators said the vast majority of tax preparers do a fine job. But "we are getting reports that an increasing minority is doing a disservice to the American public -- some through bad advice, some through incompetence, and some through taking advantage of the public by unscrupulous means," Sen. Grassley said.

He said the hearing should "provide new momentum" to a regulatory bill pending in the Senate that he backs, along with Sen. Max Baucus, the committee's ranking Democrat. The bill would give the IRS Office of Professional Responsibility, which currently regulates CPAs, tax lawyers and others, additional oversight of all paid tax preparers. The bill would begin requiring exams and imposing continuing education requirements. It also would require "non-monetary sanctions," such as suspension or termination, for failure to comply with the regulations.

DOJ_NMG_0025393

"The GAO study raises important points regarding returns preparers and the tax system. The facts presented in the study show the need for simplification of the tax code," the IRS said.

* * *

A TAX-LAW GLITCH attracts growing attention.

Part of a law enacted in 2004 was supposed to simplify and streamline the definition of a "child" for tax purposes. But that law created "unintended consequences," a Treasury official said. For example, some upper-income households now qualify for tax breaks they weren't supposed to get, and some low-income people have lost valuable benefits.

Rep. Lloyd Doggett, a Texas Democrat, says he plans to introduce a bill soon to clean up the mess, effective for the 2006 tax year. The Treasury also has proposed a legislative remedy.

Referring to the 2004 law, Rep. Doggett says: "This is an excellent reminder that some attempts to simplify the tax code offer an overly simple answer that is simply unfair."

* * *

BRIEFS: The IRS expects to receive more than 9.6 million forms for automatic six-month extensions this year, according to a recent publication. ... IRS Commissioner Mark Everson says even he gets a bit nervous when he gets a letter from the IRS. "I still get a little twitch when I go home and find an envelope in the mail with 'Internal Revenue Service' on it," Mr. Everson told the Yale Alumni Magazine. "And all it is is some personnel notice, saying that there's been a change in my dental benefits."

Some Tax Preparers Don't Add Up (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Commercial tax preparers made errors, sometimes amounting to more than $1,000 in incorrect refunds and overpayments, in 100 percent of returns brought to them by a government agency seeking to test the accuracy of work done by large chain tax-preparation firms.

The study by the Government Accountability Office was small -- only 19 returns, which the GAO cautioned cannot be used to generalize to the entire commercial return-preparation industry -- but on only two returns did the preparer produce what the agency determined was the right amount. And even those two had mistakes, though they did not affect the final tax amount.

In five cases, paid preparers produced returns showing improper refunds of nearly $2,000 each, and in two cases, the returns would have had taxpayers paying more than $1,500 unnecessarily.

The agency reported its finding to the Senate Finance Committee at a hearing yesterday and urged taxpayers to be careful in choosing tax preparers.

GAO workers posed in nine cases as a plumber and his family and in 10 cases as a low-income single mother with wages from retail sales and side income from baby-sitting. The agency, with staff members from the Senate Finance Committee and Joint Tax Committee, went over both scenarios and agreed on what the correct refunds would be.

The preparers were not identified. They were described as outlets "of several commercial chain preparers scattered throughout a metropolitan area." All the preparers in the study were what the Internal Revenue Service calls "unenrolled preparers" who have not passed an examination or worked for the IRS. There are 300,000 to 600,000 such preparers. More than half of the 130 million returns filed each year are done by paid preparers, and in most states anyone can go into that business without special training or a license.

The GAO noted that several hundred thousand certified public accountants and lawyers are authorized to practice before the IRS and that another group of about 41,000, known as enrolled agents, must pass an examination or have worked for the IRS.

The GAO found that in 10 cases the preparers did not include business income. In five cases, the preparers did not ask where the taxpayers' children lived or ignored the GAO worker's explanation and incorrectly claimed the earned-income tax credit, meant to help low-income workers and their children.

In three of nine cases in which the taxpayer could have claimed a credit for higher education, the preparers did not do so, and in seven of nine cases in which itemizing would have helped, the preparers either did not do so or left off some deductible expenses. Seven of the 19 returns reported too many personal exemptions, while eight of 19 reported state tax refunds incorrectly.

DOJ_NMG_0025394

"Had these problems been discovered by the IRS on real returns, IRS officials said that many of the preparers would have been subject to penalties for such things as negligence and willful or reckless disregard of tax rules," the GAO report said.

"Americans have a right to expect that when they hire a tax preparer they're going to get honest, straightforward advice," Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a written statement. "Unfortunately, too often that isn't the case."

The GAO urged taxpayers to take "common-sense steps," such as checking with friends and relatives for recommendations and making sure that preparers understands their circumstances and reviews their tax documents.

The IRS Web site (http://www.irs.gov/) also has tips for choosing a tax preparer. Type "choosing a tax preparer" into the search field.

Big Gain For Rich Seen In Tax Cuts For Investments (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

The first data to document the effect of President Bush's tax cuts for investment income show that they have significantly lowered the tax burden on the richest Americans, reducing taxes on incomes of more than $10 million by an average of about $500,000.

An analysis of Internal Revenue Service data by The New York Times found that the benefit of the lower taxes on investments was far more concentrated on the very wealthiest Americans than the benefits of Mr. Bush's two previous tax cuts: on wages and other noninvestment income.

When Congress cut investment taxes three years ago, it was clear that the highest-income Americans would gain the most, because they had the most money in investments. But the size of the cuts and what share goes to each income group have not been known.

As Congress debates whether to make the Bush tax cuts permanent, The Times analyzed I.R.S. figures for 2003, the latest year available and the first that reflected the tax cuts for income from dividends and from the sale of stock and other assets, known as capital gains.

The analysis found the following:

¶Among taxpayers with incomes greater than $10 million, the amount by which their investment tax bill was reduced averaged about $500,000 in 2003, and total tax savings, which included the two Bush tax cuts on compensation, nearly doubled, to slightly more than $1 million.

¶These taxpayers, whose average income was $26 million, paid about the same share of their income in income taxes as those making $200,000 to $500,000 because of the lowered rates on investment income.

¶Americans with annual incomes of $1 million or more, about one-tenth of 1 percent all taxpayers, reaped 43 percent of all the savings on investment taxes in 2003. The savings for these taxpayers averaged about $41,400 each. By comparison, these same Americans received less than 10 percent of the savings from the other Bush tax cuts, which applied primarily to wages, though that share is expected to grow in coming years.

¶The savings from the investment tax cuts are expected to be larger in subsequent years because of gains in the stock market.

The Times showed the new numbers to people on various sides of the debate over tax cuts. Stephen J. Entin, president of the Institute for Research on the Economics of Taxation, a Washington organization, and other supporters of the cuts said they did not go far enough because the more money the wealthiest had to invest, the more would go to investments that produce jobs. For investment income, Mr. Entin said, "the proper tax rate would be zero."

Opponents say the cuts are too generous to those who already have plenty. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, the senior Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, said after seeing the new figures that "these tax cuts are beyond irresponsible" when "we're in a war; we haven't fixed Social Security or Medicare; we've got record deficits."

DOJ_NMG_0025395

Because of the tax cuts, even the merely rich, making hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, are falling behind the very wealthiest, particularly because another provision, the alternative minimum tax, now costs many of them thousands and even tens of thousands of dollars a year in lost deductions.

About 3.5 million taxpayers filing their returns for last year are being hit by the alternative tax. But that figure will balloon this year to at least 19 million taxpayers, making as little as about $30,000, unless Congress restores a law that limited its effects until now, according to the Tax Policy Center in Washington, a joint project of the Brookings Institution and the Urban Institute, whose estimates the White House has declared reasonable.

The tax cut analysis was based on estimates from a computer model developed by Citizens for Tax Justice, which asserts that the tax system unfairly favors the rich. The group's estimates are considered reliable by advocates on differing sides of the tax debate. The Times, which also did its own analysis, asked the group to use the model to produce additional data on the effect of the investment tax cuts on various income groups. The analyses show that more than 70 percent of the tax savings on investment income went to the top 2 percent, about 2.6 million taxpayers.

By contrast, few taxpayers with modest incomes benefited because most of them who own stocks held them in retirement accounts, which are not eligible for the investment income tax cuts. Money in these accounts is not taxed until withdrawal, when the higher rates on wages apply.

Those making less than $50,000 saved an average of $10 more because of the investment tax cuts, for a total of $435 in total income tax cuts, according to the computer model.

During last week's debate on whether to restore limits on the alternative minimum tax or make permanent the cuts in investment income taxes, House leaders chose as their spokesman Representative David L. Camp, a Michigan Republican. He said Republicans favored continuing investment tax cuts because that would help more people and would especially benefit those making less than $100,000.

"Nearly 60 percent of the taxpayers with incomes less than $100,000 had income from capital gains and dividends," he said on the House floor.

But I.R.S. data show that among the 90 percent of all taxpayers who made less than $100,000, dividend tax reductions benefited just one in seven and capital gains reductions one in 20.

Mr. Camp, who had said in an interview that his figures were correct, said Monday through a spokesman that he had been misinformed by the staff of the House Ways and Means Committee. But his office said he supported making the investment tax cuts permanent because cutting these rates was "good policy and good for our economy."

President Bush, in his budget, urged Congress to make permanent the reduced taxes on investment income. He also proposed limiting the effects of the alternative minimum tax through next year, saying a permanent solution "is best addressed within the context of fundamental tax reform."

The Congressional Budget Office estimated that making the investment tax cuts permanent would cost the government $197 billion over 10 years. But advocates of eliminating taxes on investments say there is no cost to the government because lowering taxes on such income encourages more investment, which should lead to more and higher-paying jobs. Taxes on wages from those jobs should more than offset the tax savings to investors, said Mr. Entin, an advocate of eliminating taxes on most investment income as a way of promoting economic growth.

However, the Congressional Research Service, an arm of Congress that analyzes issues, concluded in a January report that lower taxes on investment income may translate into lower savings because people need fewer investments to earn the same after-tax income. In another report, the research service showed how lower taxes on investment income can encourage investment outside the United States, creating jobs, but not for Americans.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which advocates for the poor, and several mainstream policy research organizations say the investment tax cuts will have insignificant positive effects and may even damage long-term economic growth by contributing to soaring budget deficits. In an era of budget deficits, "the net effect is a wash or may even be negative," said Robert Greenstein, the executive director of the center.

DOJ_NMG_0025396

There have been three tax cuts for individuals under President Bush. The top tax rate on compensation was trimmed twice and is now 35 percent, from 39.6 percent when President Bush took office. Most compensation also faces a 1.45 percent Medicare tax, which is matched by the employer, making the effective federal tax rate on high earners 37.9 percent.

Then, the top rate for most investment income was reduced to 15 percent in 2003, from the 39.6 percent for dividends and 20 percent for profits on asset sales that were in effect when Mr. Bush took office.

A result is that the wealthiest Americans now pay much higher direct taxes on money they work for than on money that works for them.

Wealthiest American Families Add To Their Share Of U.S. Net Worth (WSJ)

By Chriatopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The share of net worth held by the wealthiest 1% of American families rose slightly after inflation between 2001 and 2004, according to new figures from the Federal Reserve.

The top 1% held 33.4% of the nation's net worth in 2004, up from 32.7% in 2001, but still lower than a peak of 34.6% in 1995. Although the increase from 2001 is small, the data suggest that the upper strata, who saw their share of net worth decline between 1998 and 2001 as stock prices crashed, regained some of those losses by 2004.

The new figures on net worth -- the difference between assets and liabilities -- come from the Fed's Survey of Consumer Finances, a triennial survey based on interviews of 4,522 families that excludes those listed on the Forbes 400 list of wealthy individuals. Fed economist Arthur Kennickell noted that some respondents interviewed in the survey had wealth greater than the lowest value on the Forbes list, however.

The survey identified 715 families in the top 1%, corresponding to 1.1 million nationwide, and said the minimum net worth for the group was $6 million. In 2004, the wealthiest percent owned 70% of bonds, 51% of stocks and 62.3% of business assets.

After the richest 1%, the Fed found that the next wealthiest 9% of families held 36.1% of net worth in 2004, down from 37.1% in 2001. Below them, families in the top 50% to 90% held 27.9% of net worth in 2004, a slight increase from 2001, while families in the bottom half saw their share fall to 2.5% of net worth in 2004 from 2.8% in 2001.

Between 1989 and 2004, the figures show, families in the top 1% saw their share of net worth rise to 33.4% from 30.1%, while families in the bottom half saw their share fall to 2.5% from 3%. In the report, Mr. Kennickell noted that "wealth moved in relative terms to the upper half of the distribution during this time."

The rising slice of net worth for those at the very top between 2001 and 2004 didn't come because the super-rich acquired a greater share of stocks, cars or houses. In fact, the share of assets held by the top 1% held steady at 29.5% during the period.

Mr. Kennickell noted that it is difficult to pinpoint exactly why the top 1% gained a greater share of net worth between 2001 and 2004, because their share of assets was unchanged and their share of debt grew.

The survey found that 25% of those in the lowest 25% of net worth said they spent more than they earned in 2004, while only 6% of those in the top 1% said they did.

"A possible explanation of the decline for the lowest wealth group might be changes in their use of debt," Mr. Kennickell wrote.

Is Reliance On Real Estate A Crack In The Foundation? (WP)

By Neil Irwin

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

The U.S. economy is more dependent on housing than it has been in a half-century, as the sector fuels consumer spending and has accounted for nearly three-quarters of the nation's job growth in the past five years.

As a result, economists worry that the housing slowdown that began late last year could hurt the broader economy more than past real estate downturns, although other parts of the economy appear to be accelerating.

What makes the real estate boom of the past decade unusual is that its effects have reverberated far beyond closely related sectors such as construction, driving sales in places as varied as furniture stores and motorcycle showrooms, especially in the Washington area and others where home prices have soared particularly rapidly.

DOJ_NMG_0025397

"People know they can always refinance or flip their houses, so they are willing to spend more," said Matt Ross, sales manager at Coleman PowerSports in Falls Church, who figures that at least 20 percent of his sales of motorcycles, motor boats, and jet skis are to people who pay for their purchase using home equity.

By almost any measure, the U.S. economy is built on housing more than in the past. In 2005, investment in housing constituted a higher proportion of the goods and services the nation produced than it has since 1950, when the nation was experiencing a massive postwar housing boom. The proportion of jobs in real-estate-related fields is the highest it has been since at least 1970.

Locally, there is strong job growth in sectors other than housing. The value of home transactions in the region was nearly as high as federal procurement spending in the region last year, though each dollar spent by the government generates significantly more economic activity. But Washington area residents took more money out of their houses through mortgage refinancing and home equity loans, as a proportion of income, than those in most other cities, which could mean local consumers' spending has depended more on housing than in most places.

Now the companies that have benefited from this expansion are bracing for the great unwinding. The nation appears to be entering a period in which the role of housing in the economy is returning to something more resembling its historical norms.

A small group of economists argue that housing prices in many parts of the nation, including the Washington area, have so outstripped those supported by economic fundamentals, such as income levels, that they are due for a painful and rapid correction that could cause a recession. But most mainstream economists believe that the unwinding of the housing market's outsize role in the economy will be gradual and come just as other industries take over as economic drivers.

Nationally, the number of homes sold declined every month from August to January, according to the National Association of Realtors. Builders started work on 4.8 percent fewer units of housing in February than a year earlier, following years of sharp increases in construction.

So far, the housing slump appears not to have caused much economic distress, but the consensus of Wall Street economists' predictions is that growth will slow in the second half of the year, in part due to the housing slowdown.

"Clearly, housing is going to be a drag on the economy; the question is how much does housing slow and how quickly," said Dean Baker, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research and a certified housing bear who expects a housing slump that will lead to recession.

A more common view among economists is that a cooling in the housing market would be only a mild drain on the economy.

"There will be losses in housing-related sectors, but I think other sectors will take up the slack," said Eugenio J. Aleman, a senior economist with Wells Fargo & Co.

Even if he's right, a housing slowdown could have ripple effects down to the corner paint store. Monarch Paint and Wallcovering Co., with three stores in the District, has benefited more than most from the long boom in housing, with double-digit-percentage sales increases in 2003 and 2004, said President Victor K. Krause. Those good times led the company to increase its staff 10 percent and spend about $75,000 a year on new computer systems, paint-mixing machines and other capital expenditures.

Sales growth has slowed in recent months, Krause said, which he figures is due to fewer people buying new houses and apartments they wish to have painted. If the pattern continues and sales growth slows further or stops, he plans to hold off on any new capital expenditures or hiring. "You reinvest those extra dollars that come in," Krause said, "but you don't do that if the dollars aren't there."

Real estate helped pick up the job-market slack that resulted when the high-tech bubble burst five years ago, saving the region from the severe economic slowdown some predicted. Marla Selko, for example, worked in sales for a company that provided online education services until investors in her old employer pulled its funding during the tech collapse. Looking for work in 2002, she decided to start a business that refers people to home remodeling and other contractors, called Urban Referrals, which has been fueled in part by the strong housing market.

DOJ_NMG_0025398

The question is whether another engine will come in and replace housing. The Washington area is better positioned than much of the nation in that regard. Nationally, real-estate-related industries accounted for 74 percent of new jobs over the past five years. Locally, they account for only 21 percent, because in the Washington area other sectors have grown faster.

At the end of 2005, 11 percent of Washington area jobs were held by real estate brokers, construction workers, mortgage brokers or otherwise tied to real estate, according to an analysis of Labor Department data by Moody's Economy.com. That's the highest level in the 35 years the data go back.

Indeed, there were more than 12,000 members of the Northern Virginia Association of Realtors at the end of last year, twice as many as in 2001. "If the volume of business declines just a little bit, there won't be enough business to support that many people," said Dave Hawkins, managing broker of McEnearney Associates Inc. in Alexandria, who expects those numbers to eventually drop.

There are other ways housing has influenced the economy that could leave the region vulnerable.

Economists call one the wealth effect. It's the degree to which rising prices of homes (or, in the late 1990s, stocks) lead to people spending more than they would otherwise. It's notoriously hard to measure, and economists can only guess at its exact scope, but it works through different ways. For one, when people see their house appreciating sharply, some feel less need to save as much as they would otherwise, resulting in more money to spend on everything else. For another, rising home prices and low interest rates have led many Americans to refinance their mortgages or take out home equity loans, giving them more money to spend.

Economy.com figures that mortgage refinancing put money in Washington area residents' pockets equivalent to 14.5 percent of personal disposable income. That's the 14th-highest rate among major metropolitan areas, behind mostly cities in California and Florida.

"Those economies where housing has gone skyward are most vulnerable as housing comes back down to earth," said Mark Zandi, the consulting firm's chief economist.

Despite the risks ahead, some businesses that have benefited from the housing boom say they are confident that they will keep growing even as housing slows.

Case Design/Remodeling Inc., in Bethesda, has doubled to 300 employees since 2001, fueled in part by homeowners' confidence in investing in their homes and cheap money available through mortgage refinancing and home equity loans.

President Mark Richardson said he is confident that business will keep growing strongly even with the housing slump, as people hire his company to make improvements to their current homes rather than buying a new place.

So what happened in 1989, the last time the housing market entered a slump? "Oh, that was painful," said Richardson, who had to cut his staff as sales of remodeling services declined. "The market dropped off so dramatically and so quickly. People became very gun-shy. But then during that era, you had home appreciations that were double-digit in the 1980s, and all of a sudden, it went into negative territory. It made people say 'time out' and not want to do anything."

Fed Debate On 2000 Tech Bust Holds Lesson On Current Risks (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials remained bullish on technology spending through most of 2000 even as a massive bust got under way, and may have delayed easing monetary policy for fear of reinflating stock and bond markets, newly released transcripts show.

Transcripts of the Fed's deliberations through 2000, released with the customary lag yesterday, offer some lessons for today. Like in 2000, the Fed has been raising interest rates to stave off inflation. In 2000, the economy was being propelled by surging tech spending and high stock prices. Housing plays a similar role today. An important difference is that in part because of the lessons of 2000, the Fed is on the alert for any downdraft in housing.

The stock market peaked in March 2000, then began to decline with a brief rebound in August. Tech orders peaked that summer, and tech shipments at the end of the year. Still, as late as October, Fed officials remained bullish on spending in the sector.

DOJ_NMG_0025399

In June 2000, then-Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan acknowledged that the economy had begun to slow, but from an unsustainable pace.

That August, David Stockton, the Fed's research director, said there was little sign of "an appreciable dent in the demand for equipment and software. It just doesn't look like this boom is about to dissipate any time soon."

In retrospect, a multiyear tech boom peaked at about that time. Business equipment spending grew at double digits in the second quarter of 2000, then screeched to a halt in the third. It was the first of eight quarters of negligible growth, or declines, in equipment spending. That slump was the main cause of the recession that ran from March to November of 2001.

By October 2000, some leading tech companies began to warn of disappointing sales. "Is there something there that those companies are seeing that we're not seeing?" William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, asked. Mr. Stockton replied it was probably noise while acknowledging he was "nervous."

According to the transcripts, Mr. Greenspan wasn't worried. "There is nothing terribly significant going on in the economy excluding energy," he said.

The Fed had last raised short-term rates in May, to 6.5%. Thereafter, the "balance of risks" in its post-meeting statements were tilted to risks of inflation, suggesting a rate increase was more likely than a rate cut. But even as a slowdown became apparent, officials were reluctant to change that. They thought tight labor markets and high energy prices threatened to raise inflation.

Mr. Greenspan said even if the risks were balanced, saying so risked sending markets higher, creating "financial conditions that would be too easy."

Fed Governor Edward Gramlich agreed that "it is certainly possible that this would spark a rally and I don't think anybody wants to see that," but nonetheless suggested the change ought to be made.

That December, Mr. Greenspan acknowledged that growth had "unambiguously moved down dramatically." A few weeks later, the Fed began to cut rates.

Stocks Rise On Hopes Of More Mergers (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 5, 2006

NEW YORK — The possibility of increased merger activity boosted stocks Tuesday and pushed the Nasdaq composite index to a five-year high.

With Citigroup freed to pursue expansion by federal regulators and Computer Sciences putting itself up for sale, investors were cheered by the potential for M&A activity to remain strong through the rest of the year.

However, there were no new economic reports or major corporate earnings, and some investors held off from making big bets ahead of Friday's Labor Department report on job creation, a key barometer of economic health.

“There's fairly widespread anticipation that the economic numbers this week will be solid, though not great,” says Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors. “The market is reflecting that.”

The Nasdaq gained 8.62 points, or 0.4%, to 2345.36 for its best close since Feb. 16, 2001. However, its gain for the day actually trailed the other two major U.S. stock indexes. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 58.91 points, or 0.5%, to 11,203.85, and the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 8.12 points, or 0.6%, to 1305.93.

In company news, Citigroup gained 80 cents to $48.21 after the Federal Reserve Bank of New York lifted a yearlong ban on acquisitions as the financial conglomerate worked to improve its internal compliance programs.

Meanwhile, Computer Sciences rose $2.51 to $59.80 on news that it plans to examine “strategic alternatives” — including a sale of the company — while also cutting 5,000 jobs, or 6% of its workforce, over the next two years.

The potential for increased M&A deals comes as the Federal Reserve is expected to wind down its current program of rate increases. While another increase is expected in May, bringing the benchmark fed funds target rate to 5%, halting rate increases soon after could prompt companies to renew their acquisition efforts, knowing that rates for borrowing would be stable.

DOJ_NMG_0025400

"The next phase of the market is in M&A activity, and the Fed moving to the sidelines will help with that," says Joe Keating, chief investment officer at First American Asset Management. "So I think investors can still stay in the market and put their money to work."

3M climbed $1.16 to $77. The company said it would sell its pharmaceutical business that makes products related to dermatology, women's health and cardiology.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow Gets Muted Bush Support, Fueling Talk He Will Leave Soon (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, fueling speculation that Treasury Secretary John Snow will depart soon, offered only muted support for the former railroad executive when asked whether he is likely to survive an expected staff shake-up.

With Mr. Snow sitting next to him at a conference on health savings accounts, Mr. Bush said the Treasury secretary "has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service." But he said nothing to squash widespread talk that Mr. Snow is likely to be replaced.

The president is awaiting recommendations from new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten for a reorganization.

There has been widespread speculation for months that Mr. Snow, who succeeded Paul O'Neill in February 2003, will leave before the end of this year.

One person familiar with Mr. Snow's thinking said the secretary has told acquaintances that at some point before the end of the president's term, he plans to return to the private sector, possibility before year end. Mr. Snow is said to be keenly interested in influencing the choice of successor.

The secretary is seen largely as a public spokesman for the president's economic policies, rather than a major force in shaping them. His defenders in the administration say this White House, unlike some earlier ones, simply has never surrendered control over the president's domestic agenda to any cabinet secretary. Mr. Snow is, however, credited for effectively handling the administration's stance toward China on its currency regime.

The perception that the Treasury post is weaker than it was when Robert Rubin or Lawrence Summers held it in Bill Clinton's years or when James Baker held it in Ronald Reagan's administration could make it hard for the administration to replace Mr. Snow with that kind of high-profile Wall Street or corporate executive.

"People from outside do not want to come in to be Treasury secretary if they are not going to have responsibility, and this administration has not given responsibility to agencies," said Peter Wallison, a former Reagan administration official who is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "That's been one of the problems from the beginning, and Treasury has been one of the principal victims."

One potential candidate, Henry Paulson, chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group, has little interest in the job and instead wants to aid environmental causes when he leaves the firm, according to a person familiar with his thinking.

So there has been speculation recently that Mr. Bush might turn to an insider should he decide to replace Mr. Snow. One possibility that has surfaced recently is to pick Allan Hubbard, director of the White House National Economic Council, a longtime friend of the president whose profile has risen lately as he pushes his approach to changing the American health-care system. But some Republicans close to the White House believe that Mr. Hubbard, an Indiana businessman, might not enjoy the heavy diet of speeches and public events that comes with the job, preferring his largely behind-the-scenes role.

Other possibilities include U.S. Trade Representative Rob Portman, a former Ohio congressman; and Steve Friedman, a former Goldman Sachs executive whom Mr. Hubbard succeeded at the National Economic Council.

Treasury Secretary Is Said To Be Thinking Of Quitting (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025401

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Treasury Secretary John W. Snow has expressed interest in leaving his job in the next several months, a person close to him said Tuesday, as speculation raced through Washington that the White House was seeking Mr. Snow's replacement.

President Bush did little to tamp down the talk after a morning meeting about health care in the Roosevelt Room, where he responded with a tepid endorsement to a question about whether Mr. Snow would stay. The Treasury secretary was in the room as the president spoke.

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Mr. Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion. I'm glad you brought him up. He has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service."

When Mr. Bush has been asked in the past about whether Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld would remain in his job, he has spoken out more forcefully and enthusiastically.

Several prominent Republicans who consult regularly with the White House said on Tuesday that Joshua B. Bolten, the president's incoming chief of staff, was interested in a replacement for Mr. Snow who could more powerfully communicate the administration's message that the American economy is strong.

Another Republican who is in close contact with the West Wing staff said White House officials were expecting Mr. Snow to step down.

"They're waiting for Snow to do the right thing," the Republican said. "They thought he would have gotten the message right now and submitted his resignation."

The Republicans and the person close to Mr. Snow were granted anonymity to discuss private deliberations and thinking within the administration.

Mr. Snow's spokesman, Tony Fratto, declined to comment.

Speculation about Mr. Snow's departure has ebbed and flowed for more than a year but has intensified since Mr. Bush announced last week that Mr. Bolten would be his new chief of staff. Mr. Bolten, who once worked at Goldman Sachs, is said to be interested in filling the Treasury post with someone from Wall Street who could help reassure financial markets worried about record-high budget and trade deficits.

Although Mr. Bush has been resistant to a Treasury secretary from the investment and financial worlds, Republicans say that he is less so now and that he recognizes that his economic team needs more credibility.

Names circulating in Republican circles as possibilities for the Treasury job include Stanley O'Neal, the chairman and chief executive of Merrill Lynch, and Henry M. Paulson Jr., the chief executive of Goldman Sachs.

Some Republicans questioned whether either man would be seriously interested in the Treasury post, which in this White House has not been the powerhouse position it was when Robert E. Rubin held it under President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Bush's Treasury secretaries — Paul H. O'Neill, the former chief executive of Alcoa, was Mr. Snow's predecessor — have not had their own voices on economic matters and have been effectively subordinate to Karl Rove, the president's political adviser and deputy chief of staff. Although Mr. Bolten has told associates that he wants to overhaul his economic team, it is unclear if he wants to change its basic structure.

Mr. Snow, who has been in the job for three years, has long said he will return to the private sector at an appropriate time. The person close to Mr. Snow who said that the secretary was interested in stepping down in the next several months appeared to be reflecting that thinking, but also appeared to be defensively positioning Mr. Snow so that any resignation could be portrayed as his own.

In his remarks in the Roosevelt Room, Mr. Bush indicated that he had given Mr. Bolten a strong hand to reorganize the White House, but only so far as he approved. Republicans have criticized the departing chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., as fatigued and slow to react to national crises over the past year, including Hurricane Katrina.

"I told Josh that he is — will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs," Mr. Bush said. "And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people."

Mr. Bolten is to take over on April 14, and the president said he looked forward to his recommendations on "how to get this White House for the last two and a half years of my administration to continue to function in an effective way."

DOJ_NMG_0025402

When DeLay Talks, People Could Pay (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who is no longer running for reelection and is leaving Congress shortly, should do well in the private sector -- as long as he doesn't get convicted of anything serious. The immensely profitable -- ask Bill Clinton -- speaking circuit awaits, along with perhaps a book, teaching, a radio talk show and whatnot.

In addition, he's eligible for a pension of a bit over one-third of his $183,500 majority leader's salary, or about $65,000 a year, complete with health benefits and cost-of-living adjustments.

Five House members have recently introduced pension-revocation legislation for convicted felons, and the House Administration Committee will be taking up that issue among others tomorrow when it considers a lobby reform package.

All five lawmakers are Republicans. Apparently no House Democrat has introduced such a bill. That may be, a colleague suggests, because Republicans can't imagine themselves as scofflaws; Democrats know themselves better.4-Finger Salute Loop Fans have been asking why we didn't use the actual photo of Justice Antonin Scalia 's controversial gesture last week to respond to a question from Boston Herald reporter Laurel J. Sweet .

Scalia, leaving a special Mass for lawyers, was asked how he responds to people who questioned his impartiality on church-state cases.

Scalia flicked his fingers out from under his chin in what the Herald's reporter called an obscene gesture and Scalia insisted was not. Experts and members of the Soprano family in Jersey were divided on the issue.

A glitch in the purchase delayed the photo's arrival in time for Monday's column. But the photo of the justice as he completes his courtly response is not to be missed.The Nearly Departed

If Treasury Secretary John W. Snow doesn't know he's outta there, he might want to study President Bush 's response to a reporter's question yesterday at a health-care meeting about whether Snow is "expected to stay on."

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion." [Note past tense.] "I'm glad you brought him up." [No doubt.] "He has been a valuable member of my administration [Past tense again.], and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service. [It's been great.]"

Then, Bush almost, almost did it again. " Andrew Card , my longtime friend, a person who will go down in the annals as one," Bush paused, "a really fine chief of White House in the history of the White House." You just know he was going to say "one heckuva" chief of staff.The Departing

Somebody draw the short straw? President Bush announced yesterday that he has selected Karen P. Hughes , undersecretary of state for public affairs, to lead the U.S. delegation to the inauguration tomorrow of President-elect Thomas Yayi Boni of the beautiful West African Republic of Benin.Rice, Straw and the Cobra's Tale

The No. 1 reading material on the Condoleezza Rice - Jack Straw tour to Iraq this week was the book "Cobra II," an inside account of the Iraq war by Michael R. Gordon and Bernard E. Trainor .

Both U.S. and British officials accompanying the secretary of state and the British foreign secretary were engrossed in reading it as they flew back and forth to Baghdad from England. The book contains an appendix with a series of secret British memos critical of the U.S. occupation, written by diplomat John Sawers , who just happened to be part of the Rice-Straw meetings in Iraq.

The book also recounts how British officers were appalled when Gen. Tommy Franks showed his officers the movie "Gladiator" before the invasion to inspire them.Ill Literacy

"The National Strategy for Financial Literacy 2006" report, which was to have been completed in July, showed up yesterday. The last sentence of the foreword says that, as for nongovernmental Web sites, "the United States Government, including the Financial Literacy Education Commission and its member agencies, dies not endorse, approve, certify, or control those external sites . . ."

Well, dies it endorse literacy in general?Happy Landing

DOJ_NMG_0025403

Brian V. McCormack , an Idaho GOP veteran and former personal aide to Vice President Cheney and to former Iraq viceroy L. Paul Bremer in Baghdad, has landed nicely in the White House handling the business portfolio in the office of public liaison.Not This Club

Samuel H. Silver , chairman of the board of the Seattle area group Toward Tradition, a nonprofit that promotes traditional Judeo-Christian values, writes to say that, contrary to our "spurious implication otherwise," in a column last week, his organization never gave former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff , a former board member and friend of organization head Daniel Lapin , any award.

Abramoff had asked Lapin for an award -- so he could get into the Cosmos Club -- and Abramoff reportedly claimed on his biography that he had received such an award.

So do we believe a claim by Abramoff, a man who Silver says is "an admitted felon and forger"? Well, since he puts it that way, no, we believe Silver. No award.

Bush Eager To Hear Ideas From Bolten (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP2, April 4, 2006

President Bush dodged questions Tuesday about whether he would keep Treasury Secretary John Snow in his Cabinet but said he was eager to hear recommendations for change from his new chief of staff.

Some staff changes are expected when Joshua Bolten, currently the budget director, moves into the West Wing to replace Andy Card, who has been chief of staff since Bush became president. Card's last day is April 14.

Republicans have urged Bush to make major staff changes to reinvigorate the administration and lift his approval ratings from record lows.

"I told Josh that he is — will organize the White House in such a way that he is comfortable with and that meets my needs," said Bush. "And my needs are to have good, crisp information so I can make decisions on behalf of the American people."

Republicans close to the White House say they expect changes in Bush's communications, congressional relations and domestic policy shops. The political team, led by deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, is believed to be immune to change.

Critics have complained that Snow has not convinced the public that the economy is on a healthy upswing. Rumors about his departure created an awkward moment for Bush in the Roosevelt Room, where Bush discussed his initiative for health savings accounts. When a reporter asked Bush whether Snow was expected to remain in the Cabinet, the president noted that Snow was in the room.

"Secretary Snow is here at the table," Bush said. "He's been a part of this discussion. I'm glad you brought him up. He has been a valuable member of my administration, and I trust his judgment and appreciate his service." But he did not say whether Snow would stay.

Asked later why the president didn't simply dispel rumors of a Snow departure, White House press secretary Scott McClellan replied: "We've had a long policy of never speculating about personnel matters."

McClellan ducked a question about his own fate. "I appreciate the question, and as I've said, I never speculate on personnel matters. Period."

With widespread talk of a shake-up, some White House staffers report getting job offers from outside employers. Others who were planning to leave are considering staying longer so their departures are not viewed as part of any housecleaning.

Bolten must find someone to take his old job — director of the Office of Management and Budget — and find a new domestic policy adviser. Claude Allen left that post in February just before he was charged with theft for allegedly receiving phony refunds at department stores.

___

On the Net:

The White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

Supreme Court Pushes Back On Televised Proceedings (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

DOJ_NMG_0025404

Legal Times, April 5, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy pushed back strongly Tuesday against a bill pending in the Senate that would require the Court to televise its proceedings.

"Mandating direct televised proceedings would be inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches," Kennedy said in response to questions from House members at the Court's annual budget hearing Tuesday. "We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts."

Kennedy also spoke out forcefully in favor of a pay raise for federal judges, warning that the failure by Congress to pass salary increases is "assuming the proportions of an historic wrong."

Every spring, justices go before a House Appropriations subcommittee seeking approval for the Court's annual budget, which next year will total $76.4 million if passed. It is a rare and often illuminating encounter between branches, with House members asking pointed questions that put justices on the spot about a range of issues.

There was some of that on Tuesday, but to an unusual degree the hearing became a platform for Kennedy and Justice Clarence Thomas to vent about actions or inactions by Congress on matters of deep interest to the high court.

The camera issue was raised early on by subcommittee chairman Joseph Knollenberg, R-Mich., who said the recent confirmation hearings for two new justices had "brought about greater interest" in the Court on the part of the public.

Kennedy at first deferred to Thomas, describing him as a "media star," apparently a reference to Thomas' greater visibility dating back to his stormy confirmation hearings in 1991. Thomas acknowledged, without pleasure, that he is probably the most recognized justice on the Court. On the issue of cameras in the Court, Thomas said it "runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases." He also said cameras would reduce the justices' cherished anonymity, leading to the need for more security. Cautiously, Thomas added that requiring the Court to allow cameras could prompt "some conflict between the branches."

That teed up the issue for Kennedy, who spoke much more forcefully against the proposal, often using the pronoun "we" to suggest that at least by his own measure of the situation, he was speaking for the full Court.

Kennedy took aim at Senate legislation sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., which would require broadcast access unless a majority of justices in an individual case decided that a party's due process rights would be violated. The bill was endorsed by the Senate Judiciary Committee last week.

The Supreme Court, Kennedy said, does not tell Congress how it should conduct its proceedings, so likewise, Congress should not be doing the same to the Court. "We feel very strongly that we have an intimate knowledge of the dynamics and needs of the Court," said Kennedy. "By having no cameras, we teach that our Court has a different dynamic."

Rep. John Olver, D-Mass., sympathetically asked Kennedy, "Why would you countenance such a bill" if it is so inappropriate. Kennedy replied, "We wouldn't." But Kennedy did not specify what form the Court's resistance to a bill passed by Congress would take.

Kennedy seemed less vociferous about a separate bill that passed the Senate Judiciary Committee last week, legislation that would permit, but not require, camera access in all federal courts at the discretion of the chief judge or justice. He indicated that bill, if passed, would pose far fewer separation of power issues, serving mainly as a signal from Congress that the judiciary should rethink its opposition to cameras.

When Olver said, "You might get called tone deaf if you don't move somehow toward some openness and transparency," Kennedy was conciliatory. "The 'tone deaf' phrase is apt," he said.

But Kennedy's passion was aroused again later in the hearing when he was asked about the salary issue, a sore point for the judiciary for decades. Current pay for the chief justice is $212,100, while associate justices are paid $203,000. The salary for appeals court judges is $175,100, with $165,200 for district judges. Congress has traditionally pegged the judicial salary structure to the pay for senators and House members, which is $165,200, the same as district judges. Reps. Adam Schiff, D-Ca., and Judy Biggert, R-Ill., co-chairs of the Congressional Caucus on the Judicial Branch, introduced a bill last week to de-link judicial and legislative salaries.

DOJ_NMG_0025405

"In my view the present status of judges' salaries threatens the quality of the judiciary," said Kennedy, noting that when his law clerks leave his chambers, some are hired by law firms with hiring bonuses equal to his salary. "This devalues the position of the judiciary."

Kennedy said it is no longer the case, as it was decades ago, that the best lawyers in a given community aspire to the federal bench. "It doesn't happen anymore," Kennedy said, adding that the salary situation has led to a "serious erosion in the morale of the judges."

2 Justices Indicate Supreme Court Is Unlikely To Televise Sessions (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Television cameras are not about to enter the Supreme Court any time soon.

That was the unmistakable message that two Supreme Court justices gave Congress at a hearing on Tuesday on the court's budget.

Several members of the House Appropriations subcommittee on transportation, treasury, judiciary, and housing and urban development, which handles the judicial branch's annual appropriation, raised the issue of television after Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas had finished discussing the court's $76.4 million budget request.

Last year, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, introduced a bill to require the Supreme Court to permit its arguments to be televised unless a majority of the justices voted to bar television on a case-by-case basis. Other proposals include mandating television access, or simply permitting and encouraging it.

Asked for his views on the subject, Justice Kennedy said it raised a "sensitive point" about the constitutional separation of powers.

"It's not for the court to tell Congress how to conduct its proceedings," and the reverse was also true, he said. He added, "We feel very strongly that we have intimate knowledge of the dynamics and the mood of the court, and we think that proposals mandating and directing television in our court are inconsistent with the deference and etiquette that should apply between the branches."

Justice Thomas was equally firm, warning that television in the courtroom would have a negative impact on the argument sessions.

"It runs the risk of undermining the manner in which we consider cases," he said. He added that some members of the court "feel more strongly than others," but that all agreed that the court should decide the issue for itself. "The general consensus is not one of glee," he said.

Justice Thomas also said that televising the court would raise security concerns, "as members of the court who now have some degree of anonymity would lose their anonymity."

The justices, who have been the court's representatives to Congress on budget matters for several years, appeared to relish the chance to elaborate on the television question. Justice Kennedy described the absence of cameras as a positive.

"We teach that our branch has a different dynamic," he said. "We teach that we are judged by what we write."

One member of the subcommittee, Representative John W. Olver, Democrat of Massachusetts, appeared taken aback by Justice Kennedy's fervor. "You've made it clear that you are part of the cerebral branch," Mr. Olver said.

School System Improves Under Our Bright Light (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Few voices have been stronger in support of education reform over the years than your editorial page. Which is why it troubles me to have to respond to your March 24 editorial "Spellings Test."

Instead of challenging reform's opponents, you found fault with its best friend. The Bush administration led the charge to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, the strongest educational accountability measure ever instituted. The Department of Education has challenged states that have tried to water down or wriggle out of its provisions. And we have been immovable on the "bright line" goals of the law, including annual testing, disaggregated test score data and full grade level proficiency in reading and math by 2013-14.

DOJ_NMG_0025406

Four years ago, we fought hard to ensure that public school choice and tutoring services were part of NCLB. They are important accountability tools. We have urged school districts to partner with community and faith-based organizations and to set aside adequate funds for transportation. We insist school districts comply with both its letter and spirit; for example, by informing parents in a timely manner and in plain language. Sticking a letter in a kid's backpack is just not good enough.

We are holding up successful districts, such as Miami-Dade County in Florida and Desert Sands Unified in California, as role models. And those dragging their feet have been warned of consequences. Henry Johnson, who heads my Office of Elementary and Secondary Education, is taking a very close look at how well states are complying with the law. We will not hesitate to take appropriate enforcement actions.

Of course, we are not satisfied with current student participation rates. To spur improvement, we established pilot programs in several states prior to the 2005-06 school year. Early returns are promising. In Newport News, Va., for example, preliminary data show that 62% of students eligible for free tutoring signed up, aided by a door-to-door campaign to notify low-income parents. This is nearly four times the national average.

We welcome everyone's effort to use the latest data in support of closing the achievement gap. The bottom line is that none of this activity would be happening without the No Child Left Behind Act. It has done more than raise test scores and narrow the achievement gap. It has shone a bright light on the entire public education system, so that parents are no longer kept in the dark.

Margaret Spellings
U.S. Secretary of Education
Washington

NJ Senators To Remove Block On Bush Highway Nominee (AP)

By Donna De La Cruz
AP, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- New Jersey's two Democratic senators on Tuesday said they will lift their block on President Bush's nominee to head the Federal Highway Administration after the agency agreed to give the state more than $150 million for transportation projects that had been in jeopardy because of a new rule.

Sens. Frank Lautenberg and Robert Menendez placed a hold last week on Richard Capka's nomination to head the FHA, alleging that the agency was rescinding approvals that allowed New Jersey to spread costs for transportation projects over several years.

Since 1999, the FHA has allowed New Jersey and some other states to use multiyear funding. For example, if a project costs $100 million and would take five years to complete, New Jersey would budget $20 million a year for five years. The state paid the bills year by year.

Under the new rule, New Jersey would have had to put the project's entire cost into an escrow account.

New Jersey transportation officials met Tuesday with FHA Associate Administrator Chip Nottingham, who pledged to reverse the rule and allow six state projects to continue, the senators said.

The U.S. Transportation Department did not immediately comment.

Lautenberg said placing the hold on Capka seemed to do the trick.

"The Bush administration has blinked and promised to provide the rest of New Jersey's highway money for this year and the amount we have requested for 2007," Lautenberg said.

Menendez said Bush's plan "would have made our state more congested and less safe, and we will never sit by and allow that."

The six projects are:

_Work on the Interstate 280/Garden State Parkway interchange in East Orange.

_Work on Interstate 78 in Union, Hillside, Irvington and Newark.

_Work on the Delilah Road bridges in Absecon and Pleasantville.

_Work on the Route 440-High Street connector in Perth Amboy.

_Widening Route 1 in Edison and Woodbridge.

DOJ_NMG_0025407

_Work on Interstate 295 in Greenwich, East Greenwich and West Deptford.

Capka was nominated by Bush to be the permanent FHA administration earlier this month. He will remain the acting administrator, a job he has held since August 2005, until the Senate can take action on his nomination.

Under Senate rules, any senator can block nominations or legislation. The procedure is commonly referred to as a hold. Democratic Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and John Kerry of Massachusetts have also placed holds on Capka's nomination _ Baucus for FHA's refusal to fund a $50 million transportation project for his state and Kerry for Capka's involvement with Boston's controversial $14.6 billion "Big Dig" project.

Boehner Says Budget Will Reach Floor This Week (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

Although the House Rules Committee postponed its vote Tuesday evening on setting the debate for fiscal 2007 budget resolution, Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) insisted that the measure will reach the House floor before Members depart for the two-week Easter recess.

"It will be a tough sell. We will get there," Boehner said at a Tuesday press conference, before the committee delayed action on the rule. "Listen, we are going to do the budget this week. It is going to mean a lot of conversations and a lot of honest dialogue. So I am looking forward to the dialogue beginning."

Asked whether the resolution could be delayed through the weekend, Boehner added: "It will be done before we leave here this week."

A spokesman for Majority Leader said that the chamber could vote on the budget resolution as early as Thursday, assuming that the Rules panel approves the matter today.

Although the committee was expected to reconvene Tuesday evening on a separate matter, no definitive schedule on the budget resolution rule had been released at press time.

"I will be frank with you: If we don't do it this week, why do it?" Boehner added Tuesday. "So that is why we are going to do it this week, and we are going to pass it."

In the meantime, House Budget Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa) testified before the Rules Committee Tuesday that his panel will take up a numerous reform issues — including a presidential line-item veto and earmark reform — as single package, winning praise from conservative GOP lawmakers.

While members of the conservative Republican Study Committee have criticized the budget resolution, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the group's chairman, has said that the group could support the matter in exchange for leadership support of a quartet of reform proposals.

Pence said Tuesday he is "encouraged" by Nussle's testimony on both the line-item veto proposal as well as by the creation of a sunset committee to evaluate federal programs. But he added that the RNC will continue to seek a "date certain" to vote on the proposals.

Pence also noted that discussions with House leadership continued Tuesday.

"I'm satisfied that negotiations are moving along," Pence said. "We're encouraged by the progress."

In particular, Pence said that a proposal to provide for stricter enforcement of the budget on the House floor with regard to emergency appropriations could be included in a manager's amendment for the budget resolution.

But Pence suggested that if the House bill includes an amendment sought by moderate Republicans that would add $7 billion to provide for education- and health-related programs — a measure similar to one that is included in the Senate's budget resolution — it could result in a "significant departure" of conservative votes.

"We see the president's number as a ceiling," Pence said, referring to the $873 billion in domestic discretionary spending which is identical to the amount included in the House budget.

Under a substitution amendment offered by Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.), a leader of the effort to add the $7 billion provision to the resolution, and Reps. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) and Dave Reichert (R-Wash.), the discretionary budget would total $880 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0025408

House Republicans Seek To Raise Spending (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, April 5, 2006

Three House Republicans yesterday introduced a substitute to the budget resolution that would boost discretionary spending.

The centrists hope to match the success of their Senate counterparts and increase money for education, health and the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) by $7.16 billion above the resolution marked up by Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle (R-Iowa).

GOP Reps. Mike Castle (Del.), Nancy Johnson (Conn.) and Dave Reichert (Wash.) sponsored the substitute amendment.

Castle and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) are scheduled to debate the budget on C-SPAN at 7:45 a.m. today. Pence is the chairman of the Republican Study Committee, a group of fiscal conservatives seeking deeper cuts in discretionary funding.

The centrists are hopeful that the Rules Committee will allow their amendment to proceed to the floor, Castle spokeswoman Elizabeth Wenk said.

House GOP Lacks Agenda, DeLay Says (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Departing Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas said yesterday that House Republicans have no vision or agenda and have let the Democrats choose the GOP leadership.

"We don't have an agreed agenda -- breaking up our leadership has taken its toll," Mr. DeLay told a small group of reporters invited to his offices in the Cannon House Office Building.

The interview came only hours after Mr. DeLay had announced in Houston that he would resign his House seat in the coming weeks, giving his party time to name someone else to stand for election from the conservative 22nd District of Texas.

The House GOP leadership "breakup" he spoke of began when he relinquished his House majority leader's post in September after a local Democratic prosecutor won a grand jury indictment against him on campaign-finance charges. Some of his former aides and associates have been indicted or convicted on various charges, and Democrats have painted Mr. DeLay as the leader of the Republican "culture of corruption" they say they're campaigning against.

"The only reason I was indicted [was] the stupid rule that allows the Democrats to pick the Republican leadership," Mr. DeLay said.

He was referring to a party rule requiring that any Republican indicted for a crime give up his leadership post. Mr. DeLay has contended that is why the Democrats, who have no such rule, persuaded Ronnie Earle to seek a grand jury indictment of Mr. DeLay and keep seeking it until he got one.

Mr. DeLay maintains his innocence and told friends and supporters in Houston yesterday that he will formally resign this spring, in large part so that Democrats won't be able to "steal" one more House seat in a critical midterm elections.

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," he said. "As difficult as this decision has been for me, it's not going to be a great day for liberal Democrats, either. My loyalty to the Republican Party -- indeed, my love for the Republican Party -- has played no small part in this decision."

Mr. DeLay called President Bush on Monday, and they spoke while the president was flying back from Cincinnati, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said yesterday.

"The president wishes Congressman DeLay all the best. He appreciates his service and thanks him for his service to the nation," Mr. McClellan said.

When asked whether Mr. Bush regrets the decision by his key political ally, Mr. McClellan said, "The president respects his decision. This was a decision that Congressman DeLay made."

Democrats said his resignation is just the tip of the iceberg, however, and they'll continue to hammer away at corruption issues.

DOJ_NMG_0025409

"Mr. DeLay's departure from Congress is one piece of the changes needed to end the Republican culture of corruption," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "We need a new direction that returns the people's house to the American people."

Republican colleagues praised both Mr. DeLay's aggressive, effective leadership style and his decision to step aside for the good of the party.

"His leadership helped take our Republican conference and, as a result, our nation in a new direction, and I am confident that Tom's legacy as one of the most effective Republican leaders in a generation is assured," said Majority Whip Roy Blunt, the Missouri Republican who briefly served as leader when Mr. DeLay stepped aside.

"With this decision, he has put the interests of others ahead of his own," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican.

Republicans were confident yesterday that a Republican will win Mr. DeLay's seat in November. They said the decision to step down was his.

"There was never any pressure for Tom DeLay to step down. People would have stood by him," said Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican.

But some party members clearly breathed a sigh of relief at the news, saying Mr. DeLay's resignation takes a key Democrat issue, one that would have been used against other Republicans, off the table. "For the tight congressional races, he will not be the poster child that he would have been if he was still in office," said Rep. Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican.

Mr. DeLay won his primary last month, but still faced a strong challenge from Democrat Nick Lampson, a former House member. The race looked tough because of Mr. DeLay's Texas indictment and ties to convicted ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

House Minority Whip Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, and other Democrats said Mr. DeLay's resignation doesn't save Republicans from their problems.

"National Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Drug companies, insurance, oil and energy industries "still hold sway over the Republican Congress and write the legislation," he said.

Yesterday, a determindely upbeat Mr. DeLay said also that he would devote much of his time out of Congress to "doing what I do best, strategizing for the conservative cause" and helping Republicans in the House create a "vision" for the rest of the year and beyond, including on immigration policy.

He warned that if the immigration bill sponsored by Sens. John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy becomes law, it "would seriously undermine our own base" and cost Republicans seats in the November elections. The House "should not conference with the Senate on something we haven't discussed in the House."

In his Washington interview, he said that after leaving Congress he will raise money for Republican candidates. When asked whether he could imagine eventually becoming a lobbyist for a living, he replied: "Maybe."

DeLay Announces Resignation From House (AP)

By David Espo

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

Succumbing to scandal, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay said Tuesday he will resign from Congress in the face of a tough re-election race, closing out a career that blended unflinching conservatism with a bare-knuckled political style.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," DeLay said in a statement to constituents. At the same time, he said, "I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign."

He said the voters of his Houston-area district "deserve a campaign about the vital national issues that they care most about ... and not a campaign focused solely as a referendum on me."

DeLay relinquished the post as House majority leader last fall after his indictment in Texas as part of an investigation into the allegedly illegal use of funds for state legislative races. He decided in January against trying to get the leadership post back as an election-year corruption scandal staggered Republicans and emboldened minority Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0025410

Last week, former DeLay aide Tony Rudy pleaded guilty to conspiring with lobbyist Jack Abramoff and others to corrupt public officials, and he promised to help the broad federal investigation of bribery and lobbying fraud that already has resulted in three convictions.

Neither Rudy, Abramoff nor anyone else connected with the investigation has publicly accused DeLay of breaking the law, but Rudy confessed that he had taken actions while working in the majority leader's office that were illegal. DeLay has consistently denied any wrongdoing.

Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a major player in congressional investigations of Abramoff and the lobbyist's involvement with Indian tribes, said Tuesday that he respects DeLay's decision to step down, and added, "I think there are other aspects of the Abramoff scandal that will be unfolding in the weeks ahead."

McCain spoke to reporters following a speech to a Hispanic conference.

President Bush said Tuesday that DeLay had informed him of his decision Monday afternoon.

"I wish him all the best," Bush told reporters during a brief White House session, adding, "It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas."

Bush said the Republican Party won't suffer from DeLay's decision to resign from Congress. "My own judgment is that our party will continue to succeed because we are the party of ideas."

DeLay, an 11-term Texas lawmaker who turns 59 on Saturday, said he would make his resignation effective sometime before mid-June but contingent on the congressional calendar.

"He has served our nation with integrity and honor," said Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, who succeeded DeLay in his leadership post earlier this year.

But Democrats said the developments marked more than the end to one man's career in Congress.

"Tom Delay's announcement is just the beginning of the reckoning of the Republican culture of corruption that has gripped Washington for too long," said Karen Finney, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee. "From DeLay to Scooter Libby to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, to Duke Cunningham, to Bob Ney, to David Safavian, the list of goes on and on."

DeLay portrayed his decision to resign as a fatal blow for the fortunes of his opponent, Democrat Nick Lampson, who has garnered national attention — and financial support.

"As difficult as this decision has been for me, it's not going to be a great day for liberal Democrats, either," DeLay said. "My loyalty to the Republican Party, indeed my love for the Republican Party, has played no small part in this decision."

Last month, DeLay capped a triumph in a contested GOP primary with a vow to win re-election.

It was not clear whether Texas Gov. Rick Perry would call a special election to fill out the unexpired portion of DeLay's term, or whether the seat would remain vacant until it is filled in November.

Either way, DeLay's concern about the potential loss of a Houston-area seat long in Republican hands reflected a deeper worry among GOP strategists. After a dozen years in the majority, they face a strong challenge from Democrats this fall, at a time when President Bush's public support is sagging, and when the Abramoff scandal has helped send congressional approval ratings tumbling.

Until scandal sent him to the sidelines, DeLay had held leadership posts since the Republicans won control of the House in a 1994 landslide. DeLay quickly established himself as a forceful presence — earning a nickname as "The Hammer" — and he easily became majority leader when the spot opened up.

DeLay was the driving force behind President Clinton's impeachment in 1999, weeks after Republicans lost seats at the polls in a campaign in which they tried to make an issue of Clinton's personal behavior.

His trademark aggressiveness helped trigger his downfall, when he led a drive to redraw Texas' congressional district boundaries to increase the number of seats in GOP hands. DeLay was soon caught up in an investigation involving the use of corporate funds in the campaigns of legislators who had participated in the redistricting.

GOP Ponders A New Era (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025411

The decision by Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to retire signals the official end of an era in Republican governance, leaving GOP leaders and rank-and-file members pondering the direction of their party.

The departure of the man who has come to define brass-knuckle politics in Washington comes at a pivotal time for Republicans, as both the conference and the White House grapple with significant changes and new personalities brought in to help boost their flagging poll numbers and reshape their respective images.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) officially assumed DeLay's title earlier this year, but in many ways the outspoken Texan was still the tough-talking symbol of Republicans in the House.

DeLay's decision , which broke late Monday night and which he confirmed in a long speech to his constituents early yesterday morning, coincides with a similar shakeup at the White House, where the president's chief of staff for the past five years offered his resignation last week.

Boehner's leadership and the retirement of prominent chairmen, including Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.), ushers in an era of change for the party in which new members must now fill those roles.

In the House, news of DeLay's decision not to seek reelection came as leaders prepare for a series of tough votes on the budget and a bill to apply current campaign-finance rules to 527 groups, which is expected on the floor today.

With more changes expected at the White House, Boehner met with incoming White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten on Monday to discuss interactions between the administration and Congress.

Boehner would not discuss the details of their meeting, except to say that Bolten asked him about some of the strengths and weaknesses in the White House legislative-affairs team.

"I think he is a very capable manager, and he was doing what a good manager would do, and that is to assess where he thinks the White House operation is and how it can be improved," Boehner said of Bolten.

Boehner has taken an active role in the internal budget negotiations with rank-and-file members and has clearly signaled his desire to take responsibility for the eventual outcome. His leadership continues to be a focus among members, staff, lobbyists and the media, but he has not shrunk from the spotlight.

Boehner and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) are the last two members of a leadership team that assumed control of the majority in 1994 under then-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), DeLay as whip and Hastert as his chief deputy. Boehner was the House GOP conference chairman but lost his seat at the leadership table when former Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) ousted him from the post in 1998.

But Boehner bided his time, patiently waiting for a return. What happens with the votes on the budget and 527-reform bills this week will be the first clear tests of Boehner's skills as leader.

Hastert remains an anchor for the conference, but his role could be increasingly challenged if Boehner's stature increases. Hastert was noticeably absent from a press conference yesterday to address this week's agenda.

Republicans in the House reacted to news of DeLay's departure with a mixture of surprise, resignation and anger for what they perceive to be a partisan attack on their outspoken former leader. Members were also quick to praise DeLay's skills as a legislator and GOP leader.

"Tom DeLay has been a great leader for our party," Boehner told reporters yesterday during his regular weekly briefing. "I still believe he's one of the most effective whips we've seen in the Congress."

Boehner said he had yet to speak to other members about DeLay's decision but summed up their sentiments by saying: "My guess is that most of my colleagues are saddened by this."

DeLay called Hastert and Boehner on Monday to notify them of his decision, but the majority leader said he was already asleep when his predecessor placed the call. Other members were caught off-guard. Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) read the news in an e-mail alert while watching his University of Florida Gators beat UCLA to win the national championship in college basketball.

In his statement to district voters, DeLay conceded that external political pressure played a major role in his decision to resign. Legal questions were bound to haunt the former majority leader for the duration of his campaign, and he acknowledged those impediments in his remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0025412

"As one of my colleagues in the House leadership astutely observed a while back, the wheels of justice turn much more slowly than the wheels of allegation," DeLay said.

Those legal questions include the possibility of further indictments in the ongoing federal investigation of former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, although DeLay and his lawyer, Richard Cullen, both deny that DeLay is a target in the probe. The questions also include the impending Supreme Court decision on the constitutionality of Texas's congressional map and a related campaign-finance case in which DeLay and two associates have been charged with illegally funneling corporate contributions to Republican candidates during the 2002 Statehouse races that allowed them to redraw that map.

DeLay has maintained his innocence in the latter case since he was indicted by a Texas grand jury and forced to step aside as majority leader. Democratic District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who indicted DeLay last fall, released a statement yesterday saying he would continue to prosecute the former majority leader despite his decision not to seek reelection.

While Boehner expressed sorrow for the circumstances of DeLay's resignation, he did not completely defend his predecessor for the wrongdoing of his former aides, two of whom have pleaded guilty.

"At the end of the day, the members are responsible for what happens in their offices and responsible for their staff," Boehner said yesterday. "Clearly, there were several…former staffers for Tom who ran off the road, and it is sad and unfortunate."

Asked yesterday whether or not he felt like a "marked man" given the retirements of so many contemporaries, Boehner joked: "I'm the last man standing."

Continuing Legal Troubles Reportedly Left DeLay Dispirited (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Philip Shenon

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 4 — Representative Tom DeLay's decision to resign his House seat came as federal prosecutors continued to investigate the aides who once made up his inner circle, leaving Mr. DeLay dispirited, potentially intensifying his legal troubles and further undercutting his prospects for re-election in the fall, lawmakers and others said Tuesday.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," Mr. DeLay said in a formal announcement of his decision to constituents in the suburban Houston district he has represented since 1985, issued Tuesday morning as a written statement and a video on his Web site.

Mr. DeLay said his announcement on Tuesday was unrelated to a former senior aide's guilty plea last week to corruption charges, the latest admission of wrongdoing in the Jack Abramoff scandal by onetime staff members. Another of Mr. DeLay's former aides has also pleaded guilty, and prosecutors publicly signaled last week that they were examining the activities of a third.

Mr. DeLay is also under indictment in Texas on charges that he broke campaign finance laws, and he faced the prospect of an inquiry by the House ethics committee into travel arranged by Mr. Abramoff.

Some suggested it was no coincidence that his decision to resign and forgo a re-election bid came after the plea bargain last week by Tony Rudy, a former deputy chief of staff to Mr. DeLay. Mr. Rudy is cooperating with federal investigators.

"The two of them have been very close over the years," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, referring to Mr. DeLay and Mr. Rudy. "Every story that is written will include DeLay's name, that's for sure."

Democrats cheered the departure of Mr. DeLay, who said he would leave Congress by mid-June. They said that he had only himself to blame for the abrupt end to his public career and that his decision to quit the House would not spare Republicans from a voter backlash.

"Tom DeLay's legacy of abuse of power, strong-arm tactics, broken House rules and pay-to-play politics has cast a long, dark shadow over this majority leadership and the entire Congress," said Representative Louise M. Slaughter of New York, the senior Democrat on the Rules Committee. "DeLay may be gone, but this is still his Congress."

President Bush, who spoke with Mr. DeLay on Monday, said he "wished him all the best," but added that Republicans would continue to flourish "because we're the party of ideas."

Administration officials said the White House had not pushed Mr. DeLay to step down.

DOJ_NMG_0025413

Privately, some senior Republicans said Mr. DeLay should have acted months ago, when Mr. Abramoff entered his guilty plea and when Mr. DeLay abandoned plans to try to regain the majority leader post he vacated after being indicted in Texas. Party strategists said his decision not to seek re-election could ease the way for other embattled Republicans, with Democrats losing a prime target for their claims of widespread corruption.

"In Richard Nixon terms, you won't have Tom DeLay to kick around anymore," said Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. He predicted that Republicans would easily hold Mr. DeLay's seat.

In addition to Mr. Rudy, another former top DeLay aide, Michael Scanlon, has pleaded guilty in the corruption case and is cooperating with prosecutors. The third former aide to be caught up in the investigation, Edwin A. Buckham, was among Mr. DeLay's closest associates, and the Justice Department is seeking to build a conspiracy case against him, people involved in the case said.

Phone calls to a home telephone number listed under Mr. Buckham's name in Maryland were not returned. A Washington lawyer who has recently represented Mr. Buckham, Laura A. Miller, did not return repeated phone calls.

Another close associate said that Mr. DeLay had been consistent in telling friends he had done nothing wrong, but that he had become dispirited in recent weeks because many of his former aides and closest friends were becoming targets of the Justice Department and were being pressured to incriminate him.

"Tony Rudy and especially Ed Buckham were more than just former colleagues — they are Tom DeLay's friends," the associate said. "You can imagine what it feels like: to know that your friends are being squeezed to say terrible things about you, things that aren't true. By leaving the House now, I think DeLay hopes that the spotlight on him and his friends will dim a little."

The associate spoke on condition of anonymity because, he said, Mr. DeLay had insisted that friends not talk to reporters about his legal troubles.

Mr. Rudy pleaded guilty last week to conspiring to corrupt public officials, although his plea agreement made no direct accusation of wrongdoing against Mr. DeLay. In a public indication that Mr. Buckham, Mr. DeLay's former chief of staff, was under scrutiny, federal law enforcement officials confirmed that he was the person referred to as "Lobbyist B" in court documents released as part of Mr. Rudy's plea agreement.

In announcing that he would relinquish the House seat he built into a formidable power center, Mr. DeLay acknowledged that the criminal inquiries had exacted a toll on his election prospects and his will to remain in Congress.

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," he said in the statement to constituents.

Colleagues and others said that even as Mr. DeLay was campaigning for re-election, he was preparing to exit the race after the primary if his political troubles appeared too deep. The more than $1.2 million in campaign contributions he amassed could now be used for legal fees.

In explaining the decision to resign, Mr. DeLay and others described as a turning point a speech he gave last week on the nexus between Christianity and America's place in the world.

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, the founder of Vision America and former pastor of a Houston church that Mr. DeLay sometimes attended, had asked Mr. DeLay to give that speech, at a conference titled "The War Against Christians" in Washington last Tuesday. He ran into Mr. DeLay again Saturday night at Sugar Creek Baptist Church in Houston.

"He pulled me aside and said that at our conference he had finally made a decision that was going to be difficult for him to announce but that God wanted him to get out of that race," Mr. Scarborough said.

DeLay Resignation Unlikely To Affect Election-year Dynamics (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, April 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to retire from Congress will do little to help his embattled party retain control of the legislature in November's elections and won't erase his image as a poster child for corruption.

It leaves unchanged the larger dynamics of this year's congressional elections: deep dissatisfaction with President Bush, the war in Iraq and problems in the Republican base over such issues as immigration and federal spending.

Even with the Texas Republican leaving Congress, he'll remain a symbol that Democrats will burn into voters' minds with ads next fall. They'll relentlessly hammer the former House majority leader who cemented close ties between Congress and lobbyists and who was engulfed by a lobbying scandal that already had snared two of his former top aides and a close friend, lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"Tom DeLay may be gone, but he's not forgotten," said John Zogby, an independent pollster.

His resignation, expected within the next two months, should help Republicans retain his suburban Houston district, where he easily could have lost the seat he has held since 1984. With a fresh candidate, Republicans have a much better chance there. That's important in a year when a net loss of just 15 seats would cost Republicans control of the House of Representatives.

But it won't shift the national tide.

DeLay, who will turn 59 on Saturday, formally announced his decision to step down Tuesday after alerting supporters and reporters the evening before. The decision came three days after a former close aide, Tony Rudy, pleaded guilty to corruption charges and said that he, like other DeLay allies before him, would cooperate in a continuing investigation.

DeLay said the corruption investigation had nothing to do with his decision, that he wasn't its target and that he resigned only to let voters focus on Republican ideas instead of controversy associated with him.

"I could have won this seat, but it would have been nasty," DeLay told Fox News.

Republicans hoped that DeLay's decision would put his controversial House tenure and its connection to scandal behind them.

"Our party will continue to succeed because we're the party of ideas," President Bush said when he was asked about DeLay on Tuesday.

"House Republicans will continue to move forward with an aggressive agenda," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Democrats refused to join the political eulogy.

"DeLay is a symptom of a larger disease," Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said, "a sick Republican culture of corruption that touches everyone who took his dirty money, voted for his corrupt leadership or sat silently while their party has sold our government to the highest bidder."

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said DeLay's woes wouldn't matter in November.

"I am not sure there will be any broad national impact. All of these races are won based on local candidates, local issues, their take on the national issues. And I don't expect it will have any impact."

Many issues are breaking the Democrats' way as election season nears.

"I don't think it (DeLay's resignation) alters the fundamental landscape," said independent political analyst Stuart Rothenberg, who closely tracks congressional races. "The campaign is still more about George Bush and Iraq."

And when the campaign turns to other issues, one of them is ethics and scandal in Congress. That's not good for Republicans.

There could be more criminal charges or even trials this year to remind voters of congressional corruption. And even if DeLay isn't indicted in connection with the Abramoff-congressional scandal, he faces trial in Texas on campaign-finance charges.

"He's still going to be in the news," said Linda Fowler, a political scientist at Dartmouth College in New Hampshire. "His name is still going to be present, keeping ethics and scandal alive."

Democrats will see to that.

"Republicans can try to move on now, arguing that DeLay's exit is a bright line. But I don't think it's going to be that easy," Rothenberg said. "The Democrats will keep pounding on ethics. ... The Democrats still have the edge for the cycle. The ethics issue is still an advantage for the Democrats."

Republicans take some solace from polls showing that about a third of Americans blame both major political parties for corruption. But among those who choose sides, they blame Republicans more than Democrats by 31 to 14 percent, according to a Pew Research Center poll.

DOJ_NMG_0025415

"This is an ancillary issue," Zogby said. "But it could become a powerful ancillary issue."

The Pew Research Center poll of 1,502 adults was conducted Feb. 1-5 and had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

DeLay's Hardball Tactics Coming Back On Him (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — After Tom DeLay announced he will leave Congress, Republicans are saying goodbye to the last of the revolutionary leaders who envisioned theirs as a majority party.

DeLay, together with former House speaker Newt Gingrich and fellow Texan Dick Armey, assembled the agenda that propelled Republicans to power in 1994 after four decades in the minority.

In the end, the same hardball tactics that helped preserve that power led to DeLay's fall with Tuesday's announcement that he would resign from Congress in June. His aggressive pursuit of campaign funds to help increase Republican House seats in Texas led to his indictment last year in Texas on money-laundering charges.

DeLay, nicknamed "the Hammer," took fundraising, political organizing, ties to lobbying and party discipline to new levels.

In addition to the Texas criminal charges, DeLay also faced a federal corruption investigation that has brought guilty pleas from two former aides, and House ethics committee scrutiny.

The weight of those legal woes left DeLay no longer confident he could hold the suburban Houston district that had been safely his since 1985. Democrats, led by the party's congressional campaign chairman, Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, sought to turn the scandal into a political weapon against all Republicans.

Emanuel and other Democrats insisted that DeLay's departure will not change their focus. "National Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," Emanuel said.

In a series of interviews, DeLay continued to maintain that he was innocent of wrongdoing but said he had come to believe that he should resign rather than risk getting beat in November.

Last month, DeLay overcame a primary challenge to win renomination for his House seat. He still faced a tough challenge from Democrat Nick Lampson, an ex-lawmaker who lost his seat in 2004 because of DeLay's legislative maneuvering.

On MSNBC's Hardball, DeLay said he was concerned with endangering the GOP majority. His constituents "deserve a Republican" to represent them, he said. "I can't be guaranteed that I would win."

Cal Jillson of Southern Methodist University said it's unlikely that's the only reason because DeLay is "a street fighter" unaccustomed to backing down. "That leaves the possibility that DeLay is aware of future adverse developments that are lapping at his doorstep," Jillson said.

DeLay said he was at peace with his decision, which he said frees him to fight for conservative causes and candidates.

Analysts saw few silver linings for the GOP. "It's a huge embarrassment for the Republicans in every jurisdiction, from Washington to his district," said Earl Black, a political scientist at Rice University.

DeLay said he planned to make his Virginia home his legal residence so Texas Republicans can replace him on the ballot. Under state law, a nominee cannot be replaced unless he dies, moves out of state or is convicted of a felony.

Black said DeLay will be remembered as an architect of the 1994 Republican congressional breakthrough. "He did not accept permanent minority status for House Republicans, and that was a very different way of thinking," Black said. "He helped get them there and keep them there."

DeLay engineered a redistricting plan in Texas that gained six seats for his party in the 2004 elections. He set up a fundraising operation that led to the indictment.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said DeLay's legacy as a vote counter is unmatched. He was perhaps the "best whip … in the history of the Congress," Lott said.

DOJ_NMG_0025416

DeLay enforced party discipline so Republicans could enact legislative priorities without many Democratic votes. His application of that strategy on the Medicare bill in 2003 led to an admonition from the ethics committee, which said he improperly pressured a colleague for his vote.

Rep. Henry Bonilla, R-Texas, credited DeLay with helping build the GOP in once-solidly Democratic Texas. "The state is a leading Republican power base in this country," he said.

DeLay's Decision Fuels GOP Concerns (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis And Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush and his congressional allies expressed hope Tuesday that their party could recover from the web of scandals that ensnared Tom DeLay, the powerful and hard-charging former House Republican leader who has announced that he will quit Congress within weeks.

But DeLay's decision to resign underscored broader concerns among some Republican strategists that the still-unfolding corruption charges could cost other vulnerable lawmakers their seats this year. And Democrats promised a push to make Republican scandals a signature theme of the elections.

The imminent departure of DeLay -- the 11-term congressman known as "The Hammer" for his uncompromising style and particularly popular with the president's conservative base --also leaves Bush without a go-to enforcer on Capitol Hill at a time when his influence is waning and his relations with Republican lawmakers are frayed.

Bush said Tuesday that DeLay's move "had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district," and the president sounded a note of optimism that Republicans could move beyond the scandals.

"My own judgment is, is that our party will continue to succeed, because we're the party of ideas," Bush said.

DeLay, in interviews and a videotaped statement to his constituents, said he cut short the bid for re-election to his Houston-area seat out of concern that he might not win the race. With a characteristically defiant flourish, he said he also hoped to deprive Democrats of a chance "to steal this seat with a negative personal campaign" and turn the contest into "a referendum on me." He pointed to polls that showed him tied with his Democratic challenger.

"I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities," DeLay said.

But his announcement came within days after a former top aide, Tony C. Rudy, pleaded guilty to charges that he conspired with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff to corrupt public officials. Abramoff, once a close DeLay associate, was sentenced last month to nearly six years in prison in an unrelated Florida fraud case.

DeLay, who is facing campaign finance fraud charges in Texas, stepped down from his leadership post last fall. Three days after Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to charges of bilking Indian tribes out of millions of dollars and conspiring to bribe public officials, DeLay announced that he would not seek to reclaim the leadership post.

Insiders said DeLay decided to leave Congress after determining that the unraveling lobbying and influence scandal could doom his candidacy. One said Rudy's plea "crystallized" the decision to quit the race. Polls showed that DeLay's re-election chances were being weighed down by questions about his character and credibility, all attributable to his legal problems. DeLay and his top aides recognized that they could do virtually nothing to combat those kinds of concerns, people close to him said.

"The last 18 months have been politically debilitating" for DeLay, said former Republican Rep. Bill Paxon of New York.

But Republicans also recognize that their problems could go far beyond DeLay. Most expect new corruption revelations in the coming weeks, with investigations continuing into conduct by Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican who surrendered a committee chairmanship this year under suspicion that he took bribes from Abramoff, and other former top House leadership aides.

"I don't think we've seen the last shoe drop here," one senior House Republican aide said. "There's going to be an ongoing trickle."

DeLay's imminent exit leaves Bush without an influential figure in the House. Despite his legal problems, DeLay still enjoyed considerable power, especially among conservatives who comprise the chamber's center of gravity.

DOJ_NMG_0025417

Now the White House, consumed with its own personnel shake-up and facing complaints from restive Republicans that Bush has mishandled key issues and failed to communicate with them, has substantial work ahead to repair relations on Capitol Hill.

DeLay "was obviously the go-to guy when the going got tough, and they'll have to find the next go-to person. There's no time to wait," said Stuart Roy, DeLay's former communications director.

"Is it a void that can never be filled? No -- the White House has other channels -- but this is one foot soldier they'll miss," said Greg Crist, a former top Republican leadership aide.

The White House played down the effect of DeLay's departure on Bush's agenda. Asked whether the president regretted DeLay's plans, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, "The decision has been made, and now it's time to move forward and continue working with congressional leaders to build upon our record."

In their public comments Tuesday, House Republican leaders praised DeLay's tenure and expressed sorrow at his impending departure.

"Tom's been a tremendous leader for us," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, calling his predecessor "one of the most effective whips that we've seen in the Congress."

"I'm sorry that he's leaving," added Boehner, who took over the leader's post in February. There was no pressure on DeLay to quit, but he looked at the political landscape and did the "honorable thing," Boehner said.

"Tom DeLay has been a great friend and an ally, and he will be missed," said California Rep. David Dreier, the Rules Committee chairman.

Privately, however, there was some relief at the idea that a prime target was being removed. In public, House Republican leaders were skittish about the subject: At an afternoon news conference, Boehner, Dreier and other top officials briefly lauded DeLay, made short remarks about this week's legislative agenda and then scurried away to avoid questions from a gaggle of reporters.

Maryland Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the No. 2 House Democrat, said it was obvious that DeLay's colleagues were wary of his mounting problems.

"They want to get DeLay off the stage," he said.

Ebullient Democrats, who have hammered Republicans over what they call the "culture of corruption" in the current Congress, said DeLay's departure would do nothing to dull the issue.

"Republicans want you to believe they have turned the page, but the Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man," Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said in a statement.

Tom Matzzie of the liberal political advocacy group MoveOn.org, said DeLay's resignation would not rally public support to Republicans -- or stop Democrats from raising the ethics issue.

"We're going to still kick Tom DeLay and Tom DeLayism," Matzzie said.

But Boehner dismissed the idea that DeLay, either in or out of the House, would be a factor in the elections.

"All of these races are won or lost based on local candidates, local issues, their take on the national issues," he said. "I don't expect this to have any impact."

Republicans May Be In Path Of Political 'hurricane' (USAT)

By Susan Page and Richard Wolf

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Is a tidal wave gathering?

The announcement Tuesday by Rep. Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, that he would resign from Congress signaled what Democrats hope for and Republicans fear: that Democrats could be swept into power in November by the sort of political tsunami that helped Republicans win control of Congress in 1994.

"We know that there's a hurricane coming, and it's going to hit the Republicans in November," says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report. "We're just trying to figure out how big this thing is."

DOJ_NMG_0025418

Dick Armey, who became House Republican leader when the party gained control in 1994, acknowledges that Republicans have "set the stage for the Democrats." However, he says, Democrats need to offer an alternative rather than just attack. "I think it takes a double-barreled shotgun, and they've only got one barrel."

A Democratic takeover of the Senate seems distant, but Cook and others now figure it's possible (though not yet likely) that Democrats will gain the 15 seats they need to seize control of the House of Representatives.

Three of the five key ingredients of the 1994 turnaround are in place, including broad public dissatisfaction with the direction of the country, dismal approval ratings for the president and the taint of scandal in Congress. But there are differences, too: The number of competitive House districts is much smaller than 12 years ago, and the opposition party has yet to articulate a unified, positive message.

DeLay says his decision to call it quits helps prevent Democrats from gaining the confluence of forces they need, not to mention reducing the chances that the GOP would lose his Texas seat.

His resignation denies Democrats an easy target. "It helps Republicans slightly in that it removes the poster child for bad behavior from the political scene," says Kenneth Baer, a former speechwriter for Vice President Al Gore and author of Reinventing Democrats. He worries fellow Democrats are deluding themselves that the "once-in-a-lifetime convergence" in 1994 is about to be repeated.

He says Democrats could win back the House, though — a turn that would transform the final two years of Bush's presidency. The oversight hearings and congressional investigations that bedeviled the Clinton administration would become a factor for Bush. Even a narrow majority would put Democrats in a stronger position to shape legislation, command attention, even issue subpoenas.

The election is seven months away, and analysts are calculating how 2006 is similar to 1994, and how it's different.

•On the wrong track: Democrats' biggest advantage: Americans are increasingly worried that the country and Congress are moving in the wrong direction. In a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll last month, 29% of those surveyed said they were satisfied with the way things were going in the nation; 68% were dissatisfied. At this point in 1994, 35% were satisfied.

"There's a very big mood out there that the country is way off course," says Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democrats' congressional campaign committee. "When they feel this way … voters take it out on the party in power."

In the latest survey, registered voters said they were leaning toward Democratic congressional candidates over Republicans by 55% to 39%. That's the biggest lead Democrats have had since they lost control of the House.

•An unpopular president: Presidents matter, too. In 1994, Democrats' loss of Congress was in large part a rebuke to President Clinton. His complicated proposal to overhaul the health care system and early fumbles on issues including gays in the military pushed his job-approval rating as low as 39% in September and October. By Election Day, it was still below 50%.

Bush's approval rating in the latest survey, taken last month, was 36% — one percentage point below the low point of Clinton's presidency. It hasn't been as high as 50% in almost a year.

"The big Achilles heel for the Republicans are the president's approval rating and the war in Iraq," says Virginia Rep. Tom Davis, a former chairman of the Republicans' congressional campaign committee. "It shapes up in the atmospherics to be a pretty good year to be a Democrat."

•The taint of scandal: In 1994, Democrats were tainted by years of scandal, including the forced resignation of a House speaker, the indictment of a powerful committee chairman and a controversy over overdrawn checks at the House bank.

This year, Republicans have faced similar ethics issues: the conviction of former California congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham for taking bribes and the continuing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. DeLay's decision to resign is the latest reminder of those woes.

Liberal groups are trying to capitalize by tying other Republicans to "a pretty toxic Congress," says Eli Pariser of MoveOn.org.

Republicans counter that the charges won't stick. Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the Republicans' congressional campaign committee, says one lawmaker's ethics troubles don't rub off on others. Voters are more concerned with "pocketbook issues," he says.

•Where's the opening? Democrats' biggest single problem: Where to fight?

DOJ_NMG_0025419

The number of competitive House districts has been shrinking, in part because redistricting has protected incumbents in both parties. In 1994, strategists could target 111 members of Congress who had won two years earlier by 55% of the vote or less. This year, there are just 32 members in that category.

Political scientist Alan Abramowitz of Emory University in Atlanta has run two political models for 2006. In one, using such national political conditions as public unease about the country's direction, Democrats gain 33 seats. In a second, which includes more "micro" factors such as the number of open seats, they pick up just eight seats.

MoveOn.org is trying to make some seemingly safe Republican incumbents vulnerable. On Monday, Pariser announced a $1.3 million ad buy in districts in Connecticut, Indiana, Ohio and Virginia.

•The opposition's message: In a sprawling news conference on the steps of the Capitol in September 1994, Newt Gingrich, then the No. 2 ranking Republican in the House, led dozens of Republican House candidates in signing a "Contract with America." It outlined specific congressional reforms and policy votes they promised to pursue if they won control.

Democrats haven't issued their own "contract," although Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California last week unveiled what they called a unified Democratic approach to national security.

"The biggest reason why Republicans may keep the House is the failure of Democrats to articulate anything positive at all," says Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster who helped devise the 1994 plan. Joe Gaylord, a Republican consultant who also advised Gingrich, agrees.

He's not convinced Republicans are safe, though. "It's possible that the Democrats could capture control of the House," he cautions. In the wake of controversies like those that sank DeLay, Republicans better be "pushing the leadership to get as many reform things passed as possible."

Indicted DeLay To Resign From Congress (FT)

By Edward Alden And Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, April 5, 2006

Tom DeLay, the powerful former Republican House leader, announced on Tuesday he would not seek re-election this year to the US House of Representatives.

Mr DeLay, who played a critical role in consolidating Republican control of Washington over the past decade, said he was stepping aside to avoid a bruising political fight in his Texas district that he might have lost.

"It's very nasty. Every leftist organisation in America is down here in Houston. I just realised that my constituents don't deserve this. They deserve a Republican," he told Fox News.

He added: "I'm more interested in growing the Republican majority than in my own future."

The announcement came just days after his former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and corruption and promised to cooperate with prosecutors investigating an alleged corruption ring run out of Mr DeLay's leadership offices.

Mr DeLay was a close friend of Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist whose influence-peddling is at the centre of the investigation.

Democrats seized on the resignation, with party leader Howard Dean saying Mr DeLay was "a symptom of a larger disease – a sick Republican culture of corruption that touches everyone who took his dirty money".

A senior lobbyist with close ties to the Republican party said the resignation would likely have little impact on the Senate races this year, or on the 2008 presidential elections, but said it could hurt House Republicans.

"If you are a Republican running for the House in 2006, there is an impact," he said.

A Clean Slate For The GOP? (PHI)

By Dick Polman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, April 5, 2006

"The Hammer" has driven himself out of politics, and the big question today is whether his decision to quit the Congress will dispel the increasingly acrid cloud of scandal that imperils Republican hegemony.

DOJ_NMG_0025420

After all, a switch of only 15 seats puts the Democrats back at the helm in the House - a prospect that could make life more difficult for President Bush, because Democrats armed with subpoena power would be a tad more willing to launch probes of the administration's conduct.

No wonder the Republicans hope that Tom DeLay's departure is a boon to their fortunes. His precipitous fall from power - he reigned supreme as House majority leader at the start of January; he'll be out of a job by June - perhaps undercuts the Democratic quest to topple the GOP in November. DeLay, after all, has been the poster child for what Democrats have been calling "a culture of corruption" in Republican Washington.

DeLay insisted on Fox News yesterday that he was "excited" about his new clout-free life, and most Republicans think that would be just fine, because they believe his abrupt exit will brighten their November prospects. As conservative analyst William Kristol contended yesterday, DeLay's departure "gets rid of one distraction."

But does it?

Seven months remain until the election, and during that long span federal prosecutors will continue probing the scandals spawned by Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist and convicted felon. That could potentially embarrass the GOP by providing the Democrats with fresh corruption story lines.

Marshall Wittmann, a former Christian Coalition lobbyist and ex-Republican aide who now works at a centrist Democratic think tank, said yesterday: "For the Republicans, it's white-knuckle time. DeLay's quitting makes the best out of a bad situation, but any Republican who thinks that this will remove the sting from the corruption issue is just whistling past the graveyard."

A party compass

It can't be assumed that corruption will be a top-tier voting issue in November - Iraq is clearly the biggest concern, according to all the polls - but any new legal proceedings aimed at Republicans could underscore the widely held perception (even among many conservatives) that the governing party has lost its compass.

DeLay has been indicted for alleged violations of Texas election laws, and he is awaiting trial. Republicans can try to distance themselves by noting that DeLay is a private citizen. More problematic is the ongoing federal probe - conducted by a Republican Justice Department - into crimes that include the corruption of public officials, as well as wire, tax and mail fraud. That probe features a strong DeLay connection.

Two figures helping the feds are Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, both of whom were high-ranking DeLay aides, both of whom have pleaded guilty to criminal acts. Rudy, who made his deal last week, admitted in court papers that he conspired with Abramoff (a longtime DeLay adviser and friend) to corrupt public officials and defraud clients while working for DeLay.

Nobody yet knows what Rudy and Scanlon are telling the prosecutors; nor is it yet known whom Abramoff, another cooperating party, might be naming.

'A favor'

DeLay himself has not been charged with anything (although he is designated as "Representative #2" in the Rudy criminal documents). But the GOP's image could be damaged even if none of its members are criminally indicted; both Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana (neither of whom has been charged with anything) have political problems at home, because of their respective, and well-documented, past ties to Abramoff.

All told, longtime DeLay critics insist the issue won't die with DeLay. Tom Matzzie, the Washington director at MoveOn.org Political Action, said yesterday that even though DeLay was "a comic-book super-villain of sorts," nevertheless "there will be trial dates for himself and his cronies that will be pit stops on the way to the November elections."

But the Republican argument that DeLay's departure could foil the opposition was seconded yesterday by liberal author David Corn, who wrote on his blog: "Justice may be served by his fall, but not the Democrats' prospects in November."

And Larry Sabato, a nonpartisan political analyst who closely tracks voter behavior, said by phone yesterday: "If DeLay had stayed in his reelection race, there would have been 1,000 headlines this fall about 'Tom DeLay's hot race and his battle to survive.' He has eliminated those headlines now. He did his party a favor. Now a different Republican can run and keep that seat for the Republicans. And every seat matters this year."

Sabato questions whether the Democrats can get traction with the corruption issue, now that "their poster boy is off the wall." As he sees it: "People need parables, someone who can put a face on a complicated issue. DeLay was a wonderful parable. Without DeLay front and center, people are more likely to lapse into, 'Yeah, they're all corrupt, both parties, just a bunch of crooks.' "

Indeed, it's historical fact that Washington's modern special-interest culture was basically created by the Democrats who controlled Congress for 40 successive years until 1995, and who in 1981 came up with the idea of giving greater access to corporate lobbyists in exchange for campaign money.

But, as DeLay critics see it, the relevant issue in 2006 is that DeLay institutionalized a cash-for-favors culture far beyond anything the Democrats did. And public-interest groups are mapping an '06 campaign that seeks to connect the Republican culture, as nurtured by DeLay, to real issues that affect voters' daily lives.

Case in point: Republicans, with heavy contributions from the pharmaceutical firms, passed the Medicare drug-prescription law - which explicitly bars the federal government from buying drugs in bulk and thereby saving seniors a lot of money. David Donnelly of the Public Campaign Action Fund contended yesterday that making these links could be "combustible" in November.

And many conservatives know that DeLay's legacy has not exactly helped their '06 election prospects. The directors of redstate.org wrote yesterday that "just because he is no lawbreaker does not mean he behaved in an ethical and honorable manner." The key to a comeback, they said, is for the still-Republican Congress "to be focused on achieving the right things for the right reasons."

DeLay's Departure A Relief For GOP (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

With the House Republican majority he helped create in a peril also largely of his making, embattled Texas Rep. Tom DeLay (R) announced Tuesday that he would resign from Congress this year.

DeLay's decision marks the end of a career that helped transform nearly every aspect of Congressional politics, from lobbying and fundraising to redistricting, vote-counting and interparty relations.

The former Majority Leader's withdrawal from the House — which will occur at a still undetermined date before mid-June — brought forth effusive public praise and private sighs of relief from his Republican colleagues, who paid tribute to DeLay's achievements even as they hoped to rid themselves of the political effects of his burgeoning legal problems.

With DeLay's announcement, the expected passage of 527 reform this week and consideration of a broader lobbying reform package coming after the easter recess, House Republicans hope to finally get ahead of the ethics stories that have plagued them for the entire election cycle.

"In the long run this is great news because the 'Tom DeLay problem' goes away," said a House Republican leadership aide. "If he has further legal problems it will be on page A8 instead of A1 because he's no longer a Member of Congress."

After giving word of his decision to a select few media outlets Monday night, DeLay made his decision official Tuesday morning in a speech in Texas' 22nd district, where he had faced a very difficult re-election race against ex-Rep. Nick Lampson (D).

"Because I care so deeply about this district and the people in it, I refuse to allow liberal Democrats an opportunity to steal this seat with a negative, personal campaign," DeLay said, adding that he had "no regrets today, and no doubts. I am proud of the past. I am at peace with the present."

DeLay informed Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) — whom DeLay first brought into the leadership and mentored for more than a decade — of his decision on Monday and told other leaders of the news later in the day, holding a conference call with his Texas GOP colleagues that night.

"Over the last 11 years, Tom DeLay has been a most effective Majority Whip and Majority Leader for our Conference, and I am sorry to see him leave the House of Representatives," Hastert said in a statement, adding that DeLay "embodies the term steadfast and perseveres through even the toughest attacks on Republican ideals and principles."

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), a former DeLay enemy who succeeded the Texan in that post after DeLay was forced to step down, was similarly complimentary.

DOJ_NMG_0025422

"I still believe that he is one of the most effective Whips that we have seen in the Congress, and I am sorry that he is leaving," Boehner said, later adding that DeLay "did a very honorable thing by stepping aside."

Boehner, the former Conference chairman, also laughed as he observed that he was the "last man standing" from the elected leadership team that inaugurated the GOP's reign in the majority in 1994.

Of the GOP leaders elected in November of that year, Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) resigned in 1998, Majority Leader Dick Armey (Texas) retired in 2002, then-Majority Whip DeLay announced his resignation this week and National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Bill Paxon (N.Y) retired in 1998.

Further down the ladder, Republican Policy Chairman Christopher Cox (Calif.) resigned in 2005, Conference Vice Chairwoman Susan Molinari (N.Y.) resigned in 1997 and Conference Secretary Barbara Vucanovich (Nev.) retired in 1996.

With the possible exception of 1998, most political observers believe House Republicans are in more dire straits now than they have been at any point since the 1994 takeover.

One major contributing factor to their weakness has been the incessant focus on their alleged ethical failings headlined by DeLay, who remains under indictment in Texas for allegedly laundering corporate money into 2002 state legislative races and is also under scrutiny in a wide-ranging federal investigation into bribery and fraud related to convicted former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to several charges, as have former DeLay press secretary Mike Scanlon and, most recently, former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy, who admitted breaking the law while in DeLay's employ.

When DeLay was indicted by a Texas grand jury and temporarily stepped down from the Majority Leader post in September, his fellow Republicans almost universally pronounced him innocent of the charges and painted the Travis County prosecutor, Ronnie Earle, as a partisan attack dog.

And when DeLay permanently vacated the Leader post in January, most of his colleagues again expressed confidence that he would be exonerated.

But while Republicans praised DeLay Tuesday for his career achievements and for his decision, they mostly did not repeat the their earlier assertions that his legal troubles were baseless or driven solely by vengeful Democrats. At most, some simply said DeLay was innocent until proven guilty.

Boehner said that "to see [DeLay] being wrenched through this political stretching machine, if you will, rack, it is just not fair."

But when he was asked whether there was any "substance" to the allegations against DeLay, Boehner simply said, "I think the whole picture is a sad one. He has done a great job and to find himself in this predicament is regretful."

The news of DeLay's decision came during an already tumultuous week for House Republicans, who are hoping to pass a politically difficult budget and 527 reform as they parry questions about the Senate's progress on immigration reform.

"I think all of you know that this is probably the toughest week that I have had, this coming week, since I was elected Majority Leader," Boehner said to reporters Tuesday. "So I hope you all be a little charitable today. I don't think I ever took two Advil in the morning before I came to work, but I did today."

The House's plate is so full that there was very little discussion of DeLay at Tuesday's elected leadership meeting, with the conversation focused instead on the budget and 527 reform.

Even after he stepped down as Leader in September, DeLay continued to play an active role within the Conference, helping to assemble coalitions for tough votes and serving as an informal adviser to the leadership.

But DeLay largely stopped playing that role in January, according to leadership sources, as his legal predicament grew worse and he became more focused on his re-election race.

Capitalizing On DeLay Dropout (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to leave Congress is a wake-up call to his colleagues that anti-Washington sentiment is running high, which may dictate quick action on ethics legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0025423

When a federal influence-buying probe heated up in January, Republicans pledged to learn from the past and enact reforms. But in deference to senior Republicans, the legislation has been delayed until at least late this month.

Now some Republicans say Mr. DeLay's resignation offers an incentive to act.

"This creates an opening for House Republicans to move aggressively to put this whole episode behind them," said Republican pollster Whit Ayers. "With his resignation, the House can pass strong ethics legislation and can credibly argue that they have learned from and responded to the whole imbroglio."

In 1994, powerful Democrats didn't respond to signs that their party had lost touch, and as a consequence lost control of the House that year to Republicans. It is unclear whether House Republicans are moving aggressively to head off similar political currents in an election year.

Mr. DeLay's decision to leave may have had as much to do with problems in his own backyard as his party's worries here. Mr. DeLay said he won't seek another term after he concluded he might lose his re-election race. The former No. 2 House Republican won the nomination in a crowded primary last month, but he faced a tough contest against former Democratic Rep. Nick Lampson and an independent challenger.

Ironically, Mr. DeLay made himself more vulnerable by driving through a Texas redistricting plan that his party implemented to pick up Republican seats in Texas in 2004. As part of the bargain, he absorbed into his district some Democratic precincts from his challenger Mr. Lampson, who then represented a neighboring Houston district, and in return moved some Republican precincts from his own district to help more vulnerable Republicans in surrounding districts. That left Mr. DeLay to run in a tougher, less Republican district.

A bigger problem was that former Rep. Steve Stockman -- a conservative maverick who was part of the fabled 1994 Republican class -- had come back to run against him as an independent.

"It was a much more complex environment for winning with Stockman taking votes away," said David Hill, a Texas pollster and Republican consultant who advised Mr. DeLay early in his House career. "That made the numbers a problem."

It is unclear how the resignation will affect the fight for control of Congress. Republicans hold 231 of the House's 435 seats, so a shift of just over a dozen seats would cost the party control for the first time since 1994.

Republicans said the resignation will make it tougher for Democrats to win seats because they won't have Mr. DeLay to kick around any more. "Democrats don't have an example No. 1 in their argument that there is a Republican culture of corruption," said Republican pollster Glen Bolger.

Democratic strategist James Carville argued Mr. DeLay's departure will have the opposite effect, confirming in voters' minds that something's amiss in Congress. "These guys don't just resign, they go out in a pine box," he said.

Few House Republicans have had as many ethics troubles as Mr. DeLay, who has been admonished by the House Ethics Committee three times. Last fall he was indicted in a state campaign-finance probe. Two of his former aides have pleaded guilty in a federal investigation into corruption by Republican lawmakers and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Mr. DeLay has said that he is innocent in both cases.

Republicans must deal with the effects while struggling with issues such as the budget and immigration. The man they elected to succeed Mr. DeLay as House majority leader, Ohio Rep. John Boehner, illustrates the party's situation. At a news conference yesterday he joked that he was "the last man standing" of the Republican rebels who took over the House in 1994. But he also admitted that for the first time he took Advil in the morning to deal with the headaches of the job.

DeLay Shows Need For Reform (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

Proponents of stricter lobbying laws say the resignation of embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay underscores the urgent need for reform.

"This Congress needs to be rescued," said Rep. Christopher Shays, Connecticut Republican. He added that members are being put on the defensive and need to tell voters: "We aren't as corrupt as you think."

DOJ_NMG_0025424

Mr. Shays made his comments during a series of hearings on a lobbying reform bill that the House expects to debate and pass this spring.

Rep. Steve Chabot said yesterday that Mr. DeLay, Texas Republican, "has been a distraction" from key issues facing Congress. The Ohio Republican made his comments after a hearing of his Judiciary subcommittee on the constitution over the proposed lobbying bill.

The witnesses testifying at that hearing used Mr. DeLay as an illustration of the need to put tighter restrictions on lobbying.

"I don't need to remind you about the scandals," said Chellie Pingree, president of Common Cause, a nonpartisan watchdog organization. "You have unique power to restore our faith in elected leaders."

Miss Pingree noted that 85 percent of voters are concerned about corruption in Congress and worry that lawmakers will "ignore the headlines, and they can't be much bolder than they are this morning."

The measure under consideration requires lobbyists to disclose their expenses and activities more regularly and "puts more teeth into the enforcement of current law," Mr. Chabot said.

Also in the bill is a temporary suspension on privately funded travel for the rest of the 109th Congress and a ban on allowing lawmakers to travel with lobbyists on corporate flights. It also increases the penalty for violating ethics rules.

"Today's news certainly brings added stress to the situation," said Kenneth A. Gross, who heads a political law practice.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, New York Democrat, said the recent indictments, resignations and prison sentences "have cast a pall over this institution, whether we like it or not."

Without swift action, voters""will only become more cynical," he said.

Several House committees this week are expected to pass elements of the lobbying reform plan. The Senate passed its own version -- which includes a ban on gifts to lawmakers -- last week. The two chambers will need to reconcile the differences to the measures in a conference committee.

Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the House Rules Committee, said passing ethics reform will make Congress "more accountable [and] more deliberative."

Enhancing disclosure will help both political parties clean up their image, he said.

Many lawmakers say the more pressing need is campaign finance reform. The House this week is expected to consider a measure dealing with 527 groups -- nonprofits funded mostly by wealthy activists.

Analysis: DeLay Leaves Troubling Legacy (AP)

By Tom Raum

The Associated Press, April 4, 2006

Tom DeLay leaves a troubling legacy for Republicans as they face re-election.

The Texan, once one of the most powerful and feared leaders of Congress, joined Newt Gingrich in helping to lead Republicans to power in 1994. But he became a symbol of the widening ethics scandal that now clouds GOP prospects for continued control.

Republicans face voters weary of corruption allegations and the heavy-handed tactics DeLay came to personify. At the same time, GOP candidates are further weighed down by President Bush's low approval ratings and the unpopularity of the war in Iraq.

"It's hard to believe that in just 12 years, Republicans could end up in the same situation that it took Democrats 40 years to get in," said Republican strategist Frank Luntz.

Luntz, who was once Gingrich's pollster and who helped orchestrate the 1994 "Contract With America," a set of unifying GOP policy initiatives, said the GOP majority now seems "tired" and those speaking out for change and innovation "are just not being noticed."

Republicans hold 231 of the 435 House seats. Democrats have 201. There is one independent and two vacancies.

DeLay said Tuesday he would resign from Congress rather than seek a 12th term so as not to hurt Republican chances. He acknowledged his re-election prospects were threatened.

DOJ_NMG_0025425

The voters of his Houston-area district "deserve a campaign about the vital national issues that they care most about and that affect their lives every day, and not a campaign focused solely as a referendum on me," DeLay said.

He had stepped aside as House majority leader last fall after a grand jury in Texas indicted him, accusing him of funneling illegal corporate contributions into state legislative races. In January, he decided against trying to get the leadership post back amid a spreading election-year corruption scandal.

Former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a key DeLay ally, and two of DeLay's former aides have pleaded guilty in a Justice Department corruption probe and are cooperating with prosecutors.

DeLay denied anew on Tuesday that he had done anything wrong. "I'm not stupid," he said in an interview on MSNBC's "Hardball." He said he had checked with lawyers to make sure every one his actions was within the law and House rules.

"My lawyers have been told I'm not a target of the investigation," DeLay said. He said he managed his congressional office "by trusting the people I hired. Evidently, they mishandled that trust."

The Texas congressman said hoped to travel around the country to help unify the conservative movement and hoped to remain influential in Republican politics — something he suggested he could do better outside Congress.

"It's quite evident to me in the last couple of months that being a rank-and-file member, I'm not able to accomplish the things I have been able to accomplish," he said.

DeLay's resignation "marks the end of a 12-year reign of unquestioned Republican dominance and casts a shadow on the chances of Republicans in the fall elections," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University who specializes in Congress.

Under DeLay's sometimes iron-fisted rule, House Republicans marched pretty much in lockstep during Bush's first term, delivering one legislative victory after another. "Republicans, however loyal they may have been in the past, are now taking an every-man-for-himself attitude," Baker said.

Congress draws even lower public opinion ratings than the president. An AP-Ipsos poll last month showed only 31 percent of those surveyed approved of the job Congress was doing, compared with 37 percent for Bush.

When people were asked if they wanted to see Republicans or Democrats win control of Congress, Democrats got more backing, by 47 percent to 36 percent.

Democrats have used DeLay's legal problems and those facing other Republicans — including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby — to claim that Republicans are in the grips of a "culture of corruption," an assertion they repeated on Tuesday.

DeLay's resignation might help to take the heat off rank-and-file Republicans — by removing from the scene an easy target for Democrats. But the Democrats signaled they were unlikely to change their focus whether DeLay was in Congress or not.

"Tom DeLay will leave behind a sad legacy of partisan political corruption," said Rep. George Miller (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif.

Further indictments and trials would help keep alive the "corruption" issue — and DeLay's role.

"As the Justice Department gets closer and closer to him through his aides, and if he is in more trouble, certainly the Democrats will use that," said James Thurber, an American University political science professor.

Republican leaders, from Bush to House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, were generous in their praise of DeLay on Tuesday. And Bush told reporters, "My own judgment is that our party will continue to succeed because we're the party of ideas."

Bush and DeLay haven't always seen eye to eye and are not close. Still, DeLay "has been a good soldier for Bush. And Bush has always said the right things when DeLay gets in trouble," said Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas.

But there are limits to what Bush can do at this point to help DeLay — or Republicans facing tight races.

DeLay Says Prospect Of Losing Led Him To Step Down (HC)

By Kristen Mack, Eric Hanson, and Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, April 5, 2006

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay decided more than a week ago to resign his seat, disappointed with the margin of his Republican primary victory and looking at poll numbers that showed he might lose the seat in November, he said today.

DOJ_NMG_0025426

DeLay said in an interview with Sam Malone on KTRH-AM (740) that he "should have done better" than his 62 percent showing against four challengers in the March 7 primary.

His internal polling showed he had a 50-50 chance of winning in November, he said.

"The district was very polarized," he said. "I had strong support and strong opposition."

He would have had to draw votes of moderate Republicans and independents, he said.

"Why risk it, when we can save the seat?," he said. The district leans Republican. "I'm incredibly confident I'm not leaving the 22nd District in jeopardy."

Former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson is the Democratic nominee for the 22nd congressional district seat.

Lampson, whom DeLay has long lampooned as the "Hollywood" candidate because of his financial support from Democrats outside the state who oppose DeLay, will see that money supply dry up if he's running against less of a lightning rod than DeLay, the congressman predicted.

"He's got enough to run a campaign right now, but it's not going to be a referendum on me," DeLay said. "He has to defend his voting record."

DeLay, the subject of more ethics investigations than any other member of Congress, has been under increasing pressure from a sprawling investigation into political corruption that grew out of the lobbying activities of Jack Abramoff, with whom he had close political ties.

The ongoing investigation has an impact on him politically.

"I'm a realist and understand that," he said. "But all they have is guilt by association. I've served honestly and ethically. I've never broken a law or a House rule."

DeLay said he's not going away, but will fight for conservative causes in a different arena. And he says he will work to elect a conservative Republican as his successor.

DeLay has run up $2.5 million in legal fees, $1.5 million of which remain unpaid. He hopes to make some money on the speaking circuit to help pay those mounting legal bills.

"I feel very much at peace with this decision," he said. "I've already been planning and strategizing about what's next."

The resignation of Tom DeLay was the main topic of conversation Tuesday at Cinnamon's Bakery, a popular morning gathering place in the Sugar Creek area of Sugar Land.

Rich Christoffersen said customers were stunned by the announcement, with several saying the congressman's legal woes played a role in the resignation.

Christoffersen said current events and politics are frequent subjects discussed by morning customers who are generally supportive of DeLay.

"I think most folks are pretty sorry to see him go, with a few exceptions," Christoffersen said.

"I am very disappointed to see him go. I think he was on the last true conservatives that were out there," he said.

Customer Abraham Joseph said he was surprised by the sudden nature of DeLay's resignation.

"I think he just buckled under pressure from the left, he didn't want to put up with all their whatever, so the best thing to do was just to back out," Joseph said.

Another customer, Charles Lojo, said DeLay has been a strong leader and wondered why the congressman would step down after winning a hard fought primary.

"It is really a shocker. Only he knows why and hopefully they are good reasons," Lojo said.

DeLay left Houston's Fox network studio around 9:20 a.m. without giving a statement to the press gathered outside. He rode in the front passenger's seat of a gray Lincoln and pulled into the station's garage.

He will not hold a press conference today, but has instead spent the day granting interviews to friendly reporters and news outlets. He also released a video address, which was distributed to news outlets.

DeLay called President Bush Monday with the news that he was stepping down from Congress, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said today.

The two for years have been uneasy allies, working together on shared goals despite sometimes sharp policy differences.

DeLay called Bush when the president was aboard Air Force One on Monday.

McClellan sidestepped questions about whether Bush was relieved by the fact that DeLay was seeking to defuse a controversy involving the congressional lobbying scandal, which has led two former DeLay staffers to plead guilty to corruption charges.

"Congressman DeLay has been a good ally with whom the president has worked to get things done for the people," McClellan said.

DeLay's ethics troubles have been a distraction for the White House, which has seen its once-ambitious domestic agenda stalled by ethics scandals, division over the war in Iraq and other complications.

Bush in the past year has run hot and cold on DeLay, expressing support and spending time with the embattled Sugar Land Republican, urging others not to pre-judge DeLay, and then putting some distance between the two of them.

McClellan said Bush will continue working with the new leadership in Congress, including on lobbying and other reforms.

"Congress is working to move forward on reforms and the president is committed to working with them," McClellan said.

The spokesman praised DeLay's efforts on behalf of Bush's agenda, including on tax cuts and the war on terrorism.

DeLay Departing On Own Terms (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Under siege from state and federal probes into his actions and those of his closest aides and advisers, Rep. Tom DeLay had considered resigning on several occasions over the past four months. But he waited until after he had vanquished his challengers in the Republican primary to deny them the chance to become his successor, associates said.

DeLay's decision was also provoked by recent poll results that showed he faced a stiff challenge in November, the associates said.

They also cited what the Texas Republican has privately described at his frustration at no longer being a part of the House leadership, and his diminished satisfaction with rank-and-file congressional life. The lawmaker was forced to relinquish the post of majority leader after being indicted in Texas on a felony money-laundering charge last October; he had served in the job since 2002 and had been majority whip before then.

DeLay's decision allowed him to set the terms of his departure, avoiding what could have been a personally devastating loss at the polls in November. DeLay was determined to hang on to his seat at least through the primary, said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. That was because he considered his three Republican challengers gadflies and traitors and he was determined to try to block them from succeeding him.

Several associates said DeLay was particularly influenced by poll results he received after his victory in the Republican primary on March 7, which made clear that his "negatives" in the district -- a routine tally of voters' emotional hostility toward him -- were high. That meant a close race would be won only with substantial effort and cash.

An additional impetus for putting off the resignation until now was suggested by John Feehery, a former aide to DeLay and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "He needed to raise money for the defense fund. That was the bottom line," Feehery said. "He wanted to make sure he could take care of himself in the court of law." Under federal campaign rules, any reelection money a lawmaker raises can be used to pay legal fees stemming from official duties.

DeLay's decision to resign from the chamber he once ruled with a clenched fist gave some Republicans hope that the party can move beyond a burgeoning corruption scandal as the congressional election season heats up. That scandal so far has led to guilty pleas to corruption charges by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a close ally of DeLay's, and former DeLay aides Michael Scanlon and Tony C. Rudy, who worked with Abramoff after leaving their Capitol Hill jobs.

But Democrats vowed that they would not let their opponents slip the noose of what they have labeled a "culture of corruption."

"When a person steps down, it inflates the severity of the situation, and if they think after Tony Rudy, Jack Abramoff and the other guys the country will stop debate on these issues, they've got another thing coming," Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said yesterday. "Federal prosecutors don't care about Republican spin."

DOJ_NMG_0025428

In a lengthy videotaped statement, DeLay formally said he will resign the suburban Houston seat he has held for 11 terms, taking his trademark jabs at "liberal Democrats" eager for an election fight and those he said are ready to misinterpret his every move.

"With the news of my decision, there of course will be great speculation among the political pundits and media about my reasons both for this decision and its timing. I'm quite certain most will put forth their opinions and conclusions devoid of and unencumbered by accuracy, facts and truth," he said. "I have no fear whatsoever about any investigation into me or my personal or professional activities."

The associates acknowledged that DeLay made his decision against the backdrop of a felony criminal charge in Texas that is unlikely to be resolved quickly, and amid growing interest by the Justice Department and the FBI in his family finances and the official actions he took at the behest of aides who recently pleaded guilty to involvement in a criminal conspiracy.

But DeLay -- as well as his associates -- said the decision resulted from his desire to avoid a defeat at the hands of voters in his district rather than a calculated effort to deflect any investigation.

GOP leaders were quick to praise the man who helped secure Republican control of the House and turn Washington into a bastion of Republican support. But when pushed, several Republicans conceded that DeLay bore some responsibility for the scandals that drove him from power -- scandals that reached into his House leadership offices.

"At the end of the day, the members are responsible for what happens in their offices and are responsible for their staff," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who now occupies the leadership suite where Rudy and Abramoff say they traded funds and favor for legislative action. "And clearly, there were several . . . former staffers for Tom who ran off the road, and it is sad and unfortunate."

DeLay's potential legal challenges have increased in the past three months, as Abramoff, Scanlon and Rudy struck deals with a federal task force to gain reduced prison terms in exchange for their cooperation in a continuing public corruption probe. DeLay alluded in a Time magazine interview this week to being "hit" as a result of Abramoff's guilty plea in January.

As a government official familiar with the investigation said, a noteworthy aspect of the plea deals is the "dramatic premium" the Justice Department evidently places on obtaining information that might implicate others. For DeLay, this official said, "the federal case is going to get worse before it gets better."

But Richard Cullen, a key member of DeLay's defense team, said the resignation decision was not provoked by anything federal investigators have recently said. Several of DeLay's associates said that yesterday's announcement was jarring only to those not privy to DeLay's political anxieties stretching back to the 2004 race, when he won by his slimmest margin ever. "You get concerned" when you barely win against a middling opponent, a top DeLay adviser said.

Starting in December, DeLay's private polling pointed out serious political problems. At first, it suggested a roughly even voter split with former congressman Nick Lampson, the Democratic nominee. But it also showed that nearly eight in 10 voters were already firmly decided on one of the two candidates -- a rarity for a House race, especially considering that the general election was 11 months away. That meant changing minds would be costly.

The March 7 primary in which DeLay defeated three little-known Republicans with 62 percent provided a temporary boost for his campaign. But a poll DeLay commissioned two weeks ago to measure his progress with voters since December found no shift in the overall electorate since January.

That survey stoked concern in the DeLay operation because he had experienced a relatively positive run of media coverage in the past few months, and some fretted that if that was his high-water mark, he would be hard-pressed to win in November. The tally weighed heavily on DeLay after it was presented to him last week.

Rep. Henry Bonilla (R-Tex.), one of DeLay's strongest allies, said that although the former majority leader had "a sense of euphoria" after winning his primary race, this elation evaporated after he realized he would have to raise as much as $10 million to compete in the general election.

DeLay discussed his decision with Cullen last Wednesday, and he started informing others about it on Thursday. Few lawmakers or associates tried to talk him out of it, one of his advisers and others said.

"I don't think there was encouragement [for him to leave], but I think there's a great deal of relief," Feehery said. "It was a soap opera, and people are tired of soap operas. They want to get to work."

With DeLay expected to be out of Congress by mid-June, the National Republican Congressional Committee and Texas Republican officials expressed confidence that Republicans could easily retain a district that gave President Bush 64 percent of the vote in 2004. Former GOP congressman Steve Stockman, who threatened to run in the general election as an independent, said he may run as a Republican instead, joining a wide field of potential DeLay successors. They include Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, who is organizing a campaign; Harris County Judge Robert Eckels; Tom Campbell, the second-place finisher in last month's Texas primary; Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula-Gibbs; former state district judge John Devine; and state Rep. Robert Talton.

DeLay said he would move his official residence to Alexandria and vowed to stay involved in grass-roots conservative causes and expand a foster-care program he started in Texas.

Friends and associates of DeLay say they think he can make a prosperous future for himself as a corporate-paid legislative strategist, book author and speaker.

DeLay Says He'll Lead From The Outside (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON – Once he leaves Congress, Tom DeLay hopes to put his talents to work pushing the conservative cause – without the trappings of power, the duties of high office or, perhaps, the huge political bull's-eye on his back.

Whether he gets that opportunity could hinge on whether he can clear up campaign money-laundering charges in Travis County and avoid getting ensnared in the Justice Department corruption inquiry that has nabbed three close associates.

"I have a lot of friends in the conservative movement," Mr. DeLay told MSNBC's Hardball in one of a handful of interviews he gave Tuesday. "They value my talents, and they listen to me. I think I can work with them."

As his surprise decision to quit Congress sunk in Tuesday, Republicans heaped praise on the deposed majority leader – and heaved sighs of relief in private as they took stock of the fallout. The outstanding questions were numerous: What will he do now? Can the GOP match "The Hammer's" glory days or replace his political street smarts?

Still others wondered what prompted the Sugar Land Republican to call it quits and what kind of influence he can wield.

"We're going to have a tremendous challenge to see whether or not we can function nearly as well without him as we did with him," said Rep. Tom Cole, R-Okla., a leading conservative who called Mr. DeLay a "historic figure," the most effective lawmaker in a generation. "This is a guy who produced victory after victory with very narrow legislative majorities."

Three days after a former top aide reached a plea deal – agreeing to testify in the corruption inquiry – Mr. DeLay declared that he would end his bid for a 12th term, give up his House seat by mid-June and change his legal residence to a condo in the capital's Virginia suburbs.

Explaining his decision

In a series of interviews with cable news outlets, he said criminal investigations had nothing to do with his decision.

Mr. DeLay said that when he filed for re-election in December, he expected his Texas criminal case to be resolved before the primary. Facing eight more months of campaigning and uncertain prospects at the polls, he thought it best to step aside and bolster the GOP's chances to retain his Houston-area seat. Some Republican colleagues speculated that winning the March 7 primary gave him the comfort of vindication with voters.

Now, Mr. DeLay said, he'll try to put his skills, contacts and energy to use pushing the conservative agenda from the outside.

"We are fractured and always have been fractured. I think I can be a unifying force," he said.

At least some allies seemed eager to embrace him.

"The entire left wing has been gunning after Congressman DeLay for years," said William Greene, president of RightMarch.com, a conservative group. "Yes, he won't be in Congress any longer – but there's no doubt that now he'll be a leader in other ways, moving the conservative agenda forward at a pace that will make the left wish they had just left him alone."

But such ambitions rang hollow to Mr. DeLay's legions of critics. Many were in a mood to gloat Tuesday.

"Tom DeLay is a gift that keeps on giving, and has been for a long time," said Chris Bell, the Texas Democratic nominee for governor. During Mr. Bell's one-term congressional career cut short by redistricting, he attacked Mr. DeLay's ethics.

DOJ_NMG_0025430

The resignation caught Washington off-guard. Just a week ago, Mr. DeLay sent out a fundraising appeal vowing to work "every day" to represent conservative values. And many public officials facing criminal charges have used their grip on office as a bargaining chip with prosecutors.

In Austin, Travis County District Attorney Ronald Earle said in a prepared statement that Mr. DeLay's decision doesn't affect the pending felony case involving allegations of campaign law violations. "This changes nothing," he said.

Federal prosecutors declined to discuss the resignation.

Mr. DeLay has not been implicated in the two-year corruption investigation, and he continued to maintain his innocence Tuesday. But he's been closely linked to the man at its core, fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has confessed to lavishing officials with millions in gifts and political contributions.

Friday's plea agreement by former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy represented a serious evolution in the case. It included testimony that Edwin Buckham, a former chief of staff and spiritual adviser to Mr. DeLay, arranged illegal payments to Mr. Rudy when Mr. Rudy was a DeLay deputy.

Over four years, Mr. Buckham's lobbying firm paid Mr. DeLay's wife $115,000 for research on the charitable preferences of politicians – an arrangement critics have questioned.

Mr. Buckham's attorney did not return a phone call Tuesday.

Washington ethics lawyer Stan Brand, a former House counsel who defended former House Ways and Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski and other Democrats, called it curious that Mr. DeLay would resign.

"Most members under a cloud stay as long as possible because being an incumbent is something of an advantage in the legal process," he said. But the Rudy plea put prosecutors in the "inner sanctum of DeLay's office. ... It's hard to conceive of a situation where they indict these people around him, including people in his own office, and don't go after him."

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's departure doesn't remove the taint of corruption from the GOP. They cited the ongoing "K Street project" – an effort Mr. DeLay initiated in the 1990s to pressure trade associations and lobbying firms to steer plum jobs to loyal Republicans.

"DeLay may be gone, but nothing has changed," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The Republican culture of putting the special interests first does not revolve around just one man."

Privately, many Republicans expressed relief that Mr. DeLay is moving on. And some of the praise Tuesday was restrained.

Bush's reaction

"I wish him all the best," President Bush told reporters. "It had to have been a very difficult decision for someone who loved representing his district in the state of Texas."

Speaker Dennis Hastert, who was Mr. DeLay's deputy whip before leapfrogging him into the House's top job, called him "a most effective" leader, citing the role he played securing GOP wins on a Medicare drug benefit, tax cuts and trade deals. But he suggested that Mr. DeLay isn't indispensable.

"We have a bold vision, and our agenda will continue," he said.

Lawmakers in both parties said Texas will miss his influence.

"Tom has been a tireless advocate for his constituents for over two decades," Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said.

For nearly a decade, Texans held two of the top three House positions – Majority Leader Dick Armey and No. 3-ranked Mr. DeLay in the whip's post. When Mr. Armey left, Mr. DeLay moved up.

The congressional redistricting that Mr. DeLay engineered in 2003 led to the ouster of six Democrats, among them some of the most senior lawmakers in the party – including Dallas Rep. Martin Frost, who had led the party's House campaign arm and served as top Democrat on the Rules Committee, and top Democrats on the Agriculture and Homeland Security committees.

Mr. DeLay's replacement will start at the bottom of the seniority ladder.

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's resignation completed a scorched-earth policy that has left Texas largely bereft of clout.

"It's important to have a strong leader on behalf of the state of Texas to bring back resources on behalf of the people," said Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Houston. "The distinction here was that Tom's leadership was divisive. He divided the Texas delegation."

Why DeLay Quit (NATREV)

By Byron York

National Review, April 4, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay says he made the decision to leave Congress after taking a poll in his Texas district which showed he had no better than a 50-50 chance of winning reelection this November.

In a long discussion with conservative journalists Tuesday afternoon, DeLay discussed the Republican primary he faced last month, which he won with 62 percent of the vote. While some observers called that an impressive win, given the controversy that surrounds DeLay, the congressman himself said that was when he knew he had a problem.

"After the primary — you get a sixth sense about this stuff," DeLay said. "You know your district...You don't need polls, but we ran a poll anyway. And the poll showed, basically, that I had a 50-50 chance of winning." DeLay said he had commissioned a similar poll late last year, and "the one after the primary was slightly worse than the one in December" — suggesting that his support was shrinking.

"Sixty-two percent was kind of a lift around here," DeLay said. "People gave me a lot of credit for 62 percent. But for a 21-year incumbent, 62 percent — I mean, it's good, but it should have been 70-percent-plus. Sixty-two percent means 38 percent voted against me. So I wanted a poll done. We did the poll. I was going to spend whatever it took to decide what I was supposed to do, whether to get in or get out."

DeLay said that after the primary, "I spent a lot of time in prayer. Spent all the time in prayer." He said he talked to a number of people who are close to him, and he got the impression that he should stay in the race. "I thought right after the primary, I was supposed to go through this," he said. "What's that saying? Hardened by fire? But as time went on it was quite evident that I was supposed to evaluate the election and face reality, and the reality was I wasn't supposed to go through this, that I am supposed to get involved outside the House. I can do more good outside the House in the next few months than being locked in the 22nd District trying to fight a reelection campaign."

"I have a very strong base, an incredibly strong base," DeLay continued. "I've never seen anything like it. People that would die for me. I also have a very strong opposition that would kill me if they could get hold of me."

Such polarization, DeLay said, left very few undecideds. "What's left are soft moderate Republicans," DeLay explained, "and independents that will vote for anybody but Tom DeLay, that believe for whatever reason that he's a crook, or where there's smoke, there's fire, so the beating that I've been taking has had that impact. And what I saw was it would take a ton of money to take that small group that I could appeal to and turn them around — in the face of getting beat up every day by the mainstream media and paid-for 527s."

DeLay attributed many of his problems to Ronnie Earle, the Texas county district attorney who has indicted DeLay on campaign-finance charges. "He used this case to drag my name through the mud," DeLay said, "and he has abused the grand jury-process to drag my name through the mud."

The problem, DeLay explained, was the interplay of Earle's investigation and a House GOP rule that requires members of the leadership to step down if they are indicted. "I truly believe that the only reason I was indicted is because we have that stupid rule — that is, politically, the stupidest thing we've ever done," DeLay said. The rule, he continued, in essence "allows the Democrats to pick the Republican leadership."

"But we have it," DeLay continued. "I honored it."

Now that he will soon be out, DeLay said, he feels confident that a Republican will win the seat from his district, which President Bush carried with 64 percent of the vote in 2004. "People say, isn't this a defeat?" DeLay said. "No, it's an incredible victory. Because the 22nd District is going to have a Republican fill that seat, guaranteed. That's what my polls show. Any Republican running as a Republican will walk into that seat."

DeLay also predicted that his departure from the race will hurt the candidacy of Democratic challenger Nick Lampson, who has benefited from support and money from Democrats all around the country who wanted to see DeLay go down in defeat. "Nick Lampson's money is going to dry up," DeLay said. "He's going to have to talk about what he believes in. He's got as bad a liberal Democrat voting record as Sheila Jackson Lee. We've done our opposition research, and he does not fit this district. I consider that a victory....We will have a Republican, and I will be out doing what I do best, and that is strategizing to lead the conservative cause and elect Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0025432

When the talk turned to the Abramoff scandal, and the guilty plea of former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy, DeLay said he had no idea that Rudy had been engaged in any criminal activity.

"The leadership office is a whirlwind of activity all day long," DeLay said. "There are things going on constantly. Maybe my management style is suspect. But we hired and had and always have had one of the best staffs on the Hill. Why? Because I hired people that wanted to accomplish the same things that I wanted to accomplish, and I have given them responsibilities and have trusted them to carry out those responsibilities. Unfortunately that trust was mishandled, obviously, by Tony Rudy. He admitted to it. That disappoints me greatly. But it had nothing to do with me."

DeLay said he has not seen the Rudy plea agreement. One section of that agreement says that, "In March and April 2000, Rudy obtained a letter from Representative #2 [DeLay] to an Executive Branch official opposing a postal rate increase that would have harmed one of Abramoff's clients." When asked about that, DeLay said he suspected that Rudy knew DeLay would be opposed to such an increase and tried to profit from that knowledge. "Frankly, what it sounds like from what I read in the media was that they were trading off of knowing that I would already be in those positions," DeLay said. "I have always opposed postal rate increases. So you know this one's coming up, DeLay's going to be against it, so I'm going to make some money off of it, telling so-and-so and so-and-so that I can get DeLay to be against it. Maybe that's what they were doing, it sounds like to me."

As for another former aide, DeLay said he "ran off" Michael Scanlon. "Scanlon — we didn't fire him, but we found him another job," DeLay said. "I'm not surprised about Scanlon, but I am shocked and surprised about Tony Rudy."

As for himself, DeLay said he asked his lawyers to do a thorough review of all of his dealings in Congress. "I spent a lot of money and four months of lawyers investigating me as if they were prosecuting me," DeLay said. "They have looked at everything that I've got for 20 years, the whole time I'm here, and there ain't nothing."

"There is absolutely nothing illegal in my operation. There's nothing untoward. There's nothing unethical. We also cooperated with the Department of Justice, given them everything we've got."

"They asked for it?"

"No. We just gave it to them."

"You volunteered?"

"Yes."

DeLay said the material he gave the Justice Department included "anything connected to Tony Rudy, Ed Buckham, Abramoff, or Scanlon." Beyond that, DeLay said he has had no contact with prosecutors. "None," he said. "And they have told my lawyers I'm not a target of the investigation. Of course, we have been saying that for three months and the press refuses to write about it."

Finally, DeLay addressed the work he did on the issue of lobbying and the so-called "K Street Project." "I am actually very proud of the K Street Project," DeLay said. "When we came in, I realized right away in 1995 that we may have taken the majority, but we haven't changed the culture of Washington, D.C. And I immediately started strategizing to change that culture. I mean, how in the world could you maintain a majority up here if all of K Street were Democrat lobbyists that owed their power and their checkbook to the Democrats, and their friends who were out of power?"

"We put together, I think, one of the largest and strongest political coalitions ever. We turned the culture from K Street contributing 70 percent of its campaign funds to Democrats and 30 percent to Republicans to today 60 percent Republican, 40 percent Democrat....It was so well done that the Democrats hate it, and they're working as hard as they can to destroy it."

— Byron York, NR's White House correspondent, is the author of The Vast Left Wing Conspiracy: The Untold Story of How Democratic Operatives, Eccentric Billionaires, Liberal Activists, and Assorted Celebrities Tried to Bring Down a President — and Why They'll Try Even Harder Next Time.

Legal Costs Will Remain Challenge For DeLay (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0025433

With no personal wealth to fall back on, Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) faces mounting legal and financial troubles even as he flees a thicket of ethical scandals inside a chamber he dominated for more than a decade.

DeLay is still facing an Austin, Texas, trial on campaign finance charges later this year, and the workings of his old leadership office continue to be under the microscope of federal investigators probing the previously hidden lobbying transactions of Jack Abramoff.

DeLay appears to have even acknowledged that another former staffer will face an indictment or cut a plea agreement with the Justice Department. In an interview with Time magazine Monday, DeLay said three former aides had "violated the trust of my office."

"Unfortunately, there's three ... that I don't yet, I'll wait until they're found guilty," he told Time.

That appears to be a reference to Ed Buckham, a former DeLay chief of staff who was implicated in Friday's plea agreement by former DeLay deputy chief of staff Tony Rudy. So far, Rudy and former press secretary Michael Scanlon are the only ex-DeLay staffers to have pleaded guilty as part of Abramoff's more than seven-year conspiracy to win official favors on Capitol Hill and in the Bush administration.

Any official legal move against Buckham would draw the case that much closer to DeLay, because Buckham has been considered his most trusted adviser, personally and politically, even after leaving DeLay's office in December 1997.

Buckham and Rudy previously had been using the services of the same lawyer, Laura Ariane Miller, but Miller has declined repeated requests from news organizations to say if she's still representing Buckham at a time when Rudy has singled him out in his own plea agreement. Buckham previously has denied any wrongdoing.

Once DeLay leaves office later this spring, it's unclear how he'll be able to meet his ever-rising legal bills. He has been using a legal defense fund to defray most of the costs, a fund that continues to raise money in increments of up to $5,000 per contributor, per year, under House rules.

Brent Perry, the fund's trustee, said it brought in more than $250,000 in the first quarter this year, money that was instantly turned around and paid to lawyers, leaving the fund nearly exhausted.

Perry rejected reports that the defense fund had more than $500,000 in its coffers at the end of 2005, saying, "Anytime I've had six figures in the trust, it's only been a matter of days before the money was spent."

If his backers are still willing to support him financially as an ex-Congressional leader, DeLay may be able to finance his debt through big-money donors with a private defense fund once he retires. Funds for private sector individuals, such as the one that recently raised more than $2 million for indicted former White House aide Scooter Libby, can accept unlimited donations from individuals and corporations. Those donations are not tax deductible for contributors and may run into gift-tax issues as well.

But as he heads for the exit, DeLay is left without any obvious personal wealth to use to pay legal bills.

When he first rose to national prominence in the mid-1990s, DeLay had little in the way of savings. A disclosure form detailing his personal finances at the end of 1997 showed that, other than his personal residence, DeLay had only $60,000 to $150,000 in holdings, the lion's share of it in Exxon Inc. stock.

Seven years later, DeLay held $80,000 to $200,000 in assets, split between Exxon stock and accounts with Wells Fargo and Charles Schwab, according to his 2004 disclosure form. However, at that time, DeLay was a net debtor, having already accumulated legal bills running from $125,000 to $260,000.

In addition to his home in Sugar Land, Texas, where he intends to retire, DeLay owns a condominium in Alexandria, Va., and for the time being he will need to retain the condo because he needs to use that as his new permanent residence in order to get his name off the Texas Congressional ballot in November.

An estimate from the National Taxpayers Union found that, at most, DeLay could expect $56,000 a year from his pension for almost 22 years of Congressional service. However, it is unclear if he immediately can begin receiving his full pension or wait three years until he turns 62.

As Roll Call reported in February, DeLay began earlier this year to dip into his campaign account to defray some of the costs related to the Abramoff probe. In mid-February, while still preparing for a re-election battle that he thought would cost close to $10 million, DeLay's campaign was sitting on $1.3 million.

It's unclear how much of that money was spent in beating back several challengers in the March 7 primary, or to what level the campaign fund was replenished in the final weeks of March.

Any leftover campaign funds could now be used to pay his legal bills, the course followed by ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) after his recent resignation and by ex-Sen. Bob Torricelli (D-N.J.) after he bowed out of his re-election amid ethics allegations in 2002.

But DeLay — who prided himself on creating a "team" attitude in the GOP Conference that involved giving contributions to colleagues, candidates and party committees — may feel peer pressure to turn over a large chunk of that cash to lawmakers or the National Republican Congressional Committee, as is allowed under the law.

In the two months before his GOP primary, DeLay was on the receiving end of a financial outpouring from his colleagues, taking in almost $100,000 from the campaign accounts of fellow House Republicans, their political action committees and their relatives, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Even if DeLay decides to use a substantial chunk of his campaign committee's cash to pay for lawyers, it's unclear whether that will be enough to cover the mounting costs.

After his campaign paid $110,000 in February to McGuire Woods, home to Richard Cullen, the lawyer handling the Abramoff matter, DeLay's legal payments topped $1 million since July 2004, according to records with the House and the FEC.

But his bills have only soared since and will continue to do so, particularly once the Texas trial approaches and commences, and the team of lawyers working on the Abramoff investigation continue to bill hours at a high rate.

The recent agreement the Justice Department worked out with Rudy officially placed the Abramoff scandal squarely inside DeLay's leadership office, as Rudy pleaded guilty to a criminal conspiracy that began in 1997, when he was DeLay's press secretary, continuing through his rise to deputy chief of staff and then into the lobbying world in 2001.

Without officially naming Buckham, the plea agreement clearly identifies him as someone who at times worked hand-in-hand with Abramoff as a co-leader of the conspiracy, working with the confessed felon to funnel $86,000 to Rudy's family while he worked for DeLay in exchange for official favors.

In addition, the plea agreement covers events through 2004, meaning that Rudy — who left Abramoff's firm and went to work for Buckham at his Alexander Strategy Group in mid-2002 — has admitted to committing crimes while working for two-and-a-half years at Buckham's side.

House Ethics Panel Not Investigating DeLay, Other Lawmakers (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, April 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House ethics committee, inactive for more than a year because of partisan disputes, has declined to launch investigations of Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and other lawmakers accused of ethical lapses.

A six-hour meeting Thursday ended in partisan deadlock, according to one Republican and one Democrat familiar with the panel's deliberations. Both declined to be identified because of committee non-disclosure rules. At issue was whether the committee could begin investigations without interfering with ongoing criminal probes.

The committee has taken different approaches to that problem in the past. In some cases, as with Rep. Bud Shuster, R-Pa., it carried on a parallel probe while coordinating to make sure it didn't damage the government's case. In others, as with Rep. James Traficant, D-Ohio, it deferred its investigation until prosecutors completed their work.

Besides DeLay, the panel deadlocked last week over whether to launch investigations of Reps. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and William Jefferson, D-La. The inaction comes as the House of Representatives prepares to take up legislation that would revamp the relationships between lobbyists and lawmakers. Several committees are set to draft pieces of an overall bill this week.

DeLay, who announced Tuesday his plans to retire from Congress, is the subject of a money-laundering case in his home state of Texas. In addition, two former aides have pleaded guilty to charges in connection with the Jack Abramoff lobbying and corruption scandal. Richard Cullen, one of DeLay's attorneys, said federal prosecutors have not indicated that his client is implicated in that case.

The House ethics panel has been gridlocked since January 2005 because of partisan disputes over its rules, staff and procedures. In the meantime, ethical questions have arisen about DeLay; Ney, who had to step down as House Administration Committee chairman because he is also caught up in the Abramoff scandal; and Jefferson, who is under investigation in a bribery case. A former aide to Jefferson has pleaded guilty in that case.

After the session, Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., the panel's senior Democrat, issued a statement noting that the lengthy meeting yielded only one agreement: to continue an investigation begun in 2004 of Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., who has admitted leaking to reporters a tape-recorded cellphone conversation involving a Republican colleague in 1996.

Committee chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., declined to comment on the panel's deliberations. Mollohan referred a reporter to his statement, which said the panel's limited action "falls far short of the committee's obligations in the current circumstances."

The Senate's lobbying bill would ban meals and gifts from lobbyists to lawmakers and their aides but contains few other prohibitions, focusing instead on new disclosure requirements for lobbyists. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll Feb. 28-March 1 found that 59% of Americans are "not too" or "not at all" confident that Congress can police itself on matters of ethics.

Republicans See Better Prospects In Texas Race (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, April 5, 2006

With Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) out of the way, Republicans concerned with holding his seat were breathing a collective sigh of relief Tuesday, while Democrats countered that the 22nd district was still theirs for the taking.

DeLay's surprise resignation announcement touched off a flurry of behind-the-scenes maneuvering Tuesday, as potential Republican candidates sought to gauge their viability as his replacement on the Nov. 7 ballot.

A spokesman for the Democratic nominee, former Rep. Nick Lampson, said the absence of DeLay and his luggage-set of ethics issues to run against would not significantly alter the ex-Congressman's strategy, nor would it hamper his fundraising effort.

But Republican officials based in the Houston area insisted that a once-competitive district in danger of being flipped by the Democrats had just turned into a walk for DeLay's as-yet-to-be-determined replacement as the Republican nominee.

"The numbers aren't there, that's why they were having to base their entire campaign on running against Tom DeLay," said Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill. "Now they don't have that."

But Lampson campaign manager Mike Malaise said the former Congressman's campaign has been about far more than running against DeLay. Malaise said voters in the 22nd district already had an unfavorable opinion of DeLay, freeing up Lampson to run a positive campaign focused on the issues.

With DeLay gone, however, it will be easier for Republicans to focus media and voter attention on Lampson's record.

A memo distributed by the National Republican Congressional Committee Tuesday sought to highlight Lampson's liberal voting record. Lampson, the memo says, voted against the Bush tax cuts of 2001 and 2003, voted against eliminating the marriage tax penalty and voted against repealing the estate tax, also known as the death tax.

But Malaise noted that Lampson has an "A" rating from the National Rifle Association. He is well positioned to win this race, as Republican voters in the district are disappointed with the GOP-controlled Congress and its record of rising deficits, foreign debt and wasteful spending, Malaise said.

Lampson previously represented about 20 percent of the current 22nd district for eight years, as a portion of it fell into the district he held prior to the DeLay-engineered mid-decade remap of Texas Congressional seats.

"There aren't many left-wing extremists who have multiple endorsements from the NRA," Malaise said, adding: "A lot of people here were extremely disappointed in the Congress DeLay led."

DeLay's decision to forgo re-election and resign from Congress, made public late Monday night, has buoyed Republicans by opening a seat with a strong GOP tilt. Because DeLay already won the Republican primary, replacing him on the ballot will fall to a committee of four electors.

DOJ_NMG_0025436

According to Woodfill, Texas election law stipulates that the four electors be chosen by a caucus of the voting-precinct chairmen from each of the four counties that fall in the 22nd district. Only the chairmen who represent precincts that lie within the district will participate in the caucus.

To satisfy a requirement for removing his name from the ballot, DeLay plans to move his official residence from Sugar Land, Texas to Alexandria, Va. By no longer residing in Texas, DeLay would be ineligible to run.

The Republican chairmen of the four counties at least partly encompassed by the 22nd district were flooded with phone calls Tuesday by individuals interested in running in DeLay's place. When asked who they thought would end up actively going after the electors' appointment, the same names came up: Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace; state Sen. Kyle Janek; state Rep. Charlie Howard; Harris County Tax Assessor-Collector Paul Bettencourt; Harris County Judge Robert Eckels; and Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, among others.

"It's so wide open at this point," said Fort Bend County Republican Party Chairman Eric Thode.

Woodfill predicted that after the dust settled, the top contenders would get together with the leading GOP officials in the district and attempt to prevent a messy, intraparty fight.

Less clear at press time was whether Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R) would schedule a special election to fill DeLay's seat for the remaining few months of his term. DeLay said he would likely officially resign by mid-June, so the machinations to replace him cannot officially begin until then.

Wallace has already said he plans to seek the seat, while Howard, Eckels and Sekula-Gibbs indicated they are looking into it. Janek said he has decided not to run, but some say he could change his mind if appealed to by party officials.

Regardless of who emerges from the scrum, the NRCC is confident that the GOP will hold the seat.

"This is a district that is 5 points more Republican than the district Lampson lost last cycle, and he was an incumbent who outspent his Republican opponent," NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said. "He's going to get his butt kicked."

In 2004, Lampson spent $2.4 million to his opponent's $1.5 million, but still lost by 13 points to now-Rep. Ted Poe (R) in the newly drawn 2nd district.

The suburban Houston 22nd district, said Thode, can be expected to deliver a base vote of 56 percent for a standard Republican candidate (DeLay garnered 55 percent in 2004, while President Bush received 64 percent).

Lampson has raised hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not more, from national Democratic donors and liberal interest groups, all under the assumption that the money would be used to unceremoniously retire DeLay.

Now that the former Majority Leader has pre-empted a possible election defeat, Republicans believe the national focus on this race, and the money that scrutiny drove to Lampson, will cease.

"If you're Nick Lampson, your chance to pick up 6 percent was based on [DeLay's] baggage; it's now not there," Thode said. "It was all about getting rid of DeLay; DeLay's gone. [Lampson's] money just dried up."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee remains optimistic that Lampson can flip the seat. Depending on which Republican is selected to replace DeLay, Democrats feel they still have a good chance of tying that candidate to the Congressman and the ethics scandals attached to his name.

Democrats also believe the national mood for change in Washington, D.C., is seeping into the 22nd district, while noting that Lampson is well-liked in the part of the district that includes the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, not to mention the portion of the district in Galveston County he once represented.

"He's very popular in the district. He's doing incredibly well," DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said. "Democrats' chances in Texas 22 are excellent."

Constituents Look To Fill Void In District (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, April 5, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas — Like him or not — and voters in Tom DeLay's suburban Houston district do both — there seemed to be a shared feeling here Tuesday that it's just as well the troubled 11-term Republican congressman is moving on.

DOJ_NMG_0025437

On the day DeLay announced he will leave Congress amid charges he laundered political money, his constituents seemed split about his guilt but resigned to his future.

At the America Buffet in nearby Stafford, onetime DeLay supporter Judy Karnika, 49, called his resignation "pretty close to an admission of guilt."

Rabbi Stuart Federow, 53, of Clear Lake is an admirer of DeLay's "morality and ethics" who said the former House majority leader may not be guilty of wrongdoing. But, he added, "it reaches a point where for the good of the people and the good of the party, you have to step aside, even if you're innocent."

DeLay maintains his innocence, even as a lobbying scandal has enveloped former staffers. As he leaves to devote himself to his defense and to what he says will be an attempt to bolster the conservative cause from outside Congress, it is unclear whether he will still be a factor in this fall's pivotal battle for control of the House of Representatives.

Gov. Rick Perry is expected to call a special election to fill DeLay's term, said Eric Thode, Republican chairman of Fort Bend County in DeLay's 22nd Congressional District. That contest, which could include a dozen candidates, is likely to be "a circus act that's totally irrelevant," Thode said.

All eyes, instead, will be on whom a committee of local GOP leaders chooses to face former Democratic congressman Nick Lampson on the November ballot.

Thode said DeLay's departure — after polls showed only a narrow lead over his Democratic challenger — makes the race "100% easier" for a Republican successor in a "hard-core" Republican district. "The bogeyman is gone," Thode said. "This is Nick Lampson's worst nightmare."

Lampson disagreed, insisting his campaign has never been about just DeLay.

"The names will change, but the issues are going to remain the same," he said.

Republican redistricting might benefit Lampson. To help other Texas Republicans, DeLay diluted the Republican Party's grip on his own district. An influx of minorities also has altered the district's makeup, making it friendlier to Democrats. Add Lampson's $2.5 million campaign war chest advantage over any late-starting Republican, and Democrats have a chance to pick up the seat, said Cal Jillson, a political scientist at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

"The fact is, Republicans in that district are chagrined and embarrassed by DeLay and all of his ethical problems," Jillson said. "Whoever they put up will have an uphill fight."

Among Republican contenders are Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace and lawyer Tom Campbell, who came in second to DeLay in last month's GOP primary.

Jillson said Wallace is the favorite of party leaders, but he doubts Wallace can make the leap from mayor of a small suburb to running "in a very closely watched race where you're going to have to come up with several million dollars" to win. Wallace could not be reached for comment.

Most callers Tuesday on DJ Sam Malone's show on Houston's KTRH-AM radio were "dancing" over DeLay's fall, Malone said.

Not everyone was celebrating. "He was too powerful in Congress, and there needed to be a scapegoat," Sandra Voughal, 47, a Sugar Land homemaker, said as she sat at a bookstore cafe. "He's a very savvy person, but I think he recognized his day was over."

Announcement Puts 22nd District Up For Grabs (DMN)

By Bruce Nichols

The Dallas Morning News, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON – One thing seemed clear Tuesday after U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay announced he would resign from Congress. Democratic challenger Nick Lampson has lost his biggest campaign issue: Mr. DeLay.

Beyond that, a lot was up in the air. When should a special election be held to complete his term? Who will take Mr. DeLay's place as the Republican nominee in the general election?

"I think Lampson's best chance was running against Tom DeLay as a candidate indicted but not yet tried and/or convicted or acquitted," Rice University political scientist Robert Stein said.

On the other hand, Republicans and Gov. Rick Perry have a lot to decide, Richard Murray of the University of Houston said, and "resolving this is not necessarily going to be without friction on the Republican side," he said.

Several prominent Republicans expressed interest in taking Mr. DeLay's place, including Harris County Judge Robert Eckels and Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace. Lawyer Tom Campbell, who lost to Mr. DeLay in the recent Republican primary, said he would like to run.

Mr. DeLay's decision, announced late Monday, to step down from his suburban, District 22 seat comes as questions mount about his involvement in a growing Capitol Hill ethics scandal. At the same time, he and several lieutenants face trial in Austin on charges stemming from corporate fundraising through a DeLay-created political committee, Texans for a Republican Majority.

Two separate issues are involved in replacing Mr. DeLay, said Scott Haywood, spokesman for the Texas secretary of state's office. One is choosing someone to complete his term and the other is picking a new Republican nominee for the November general election.

Nothing can happen until Mr. DeLay disqualifies himself by moving his residency out of state, thereby removing himself from the November ballot. He said he plans to solve that problem by moving to Virginia after completing some district business, perhaps by mid-June.

After Mr. DeLay departs, Mr. Perry would be required to call a special election – a free-for-all, open to all qualified candidates – to complete the term. House vacancies can't be filled by appointment. It's basically up to Mr. Perry when that election is staged. It could even be the same day as the general election, Nov. 7, officials said.

"I'm pushing for having them on the same day as the most efficient approach," said Republican consultant Allen Blakemore of Houston.

With simultaneous elections, Republicans reduce the risk of a possible surprise winner in the special election becoming a front-runner, and with the district 60-40 Republican, a party nominee with no ethics baggage would be expected to win, Dr. Murray said.

But some in the party might prefer an earlier special election, he said.

The new general election nominee will be picked by GOP leaders. A committee of precinct chairs in the district will have first shot. The State Republican Executive Committee will take charge if they were unable to agree by 70 days before Nov. 7.

Interestingly, if the special and general elections are the same day, voters might or might not see both ballots on the same piece of paper, Mr. Haywood said. "The counties actually have the option," he said.

Among the people expressing interest in the race, Judge Eckels would appear to have an edge because of his strong name identification and his success helping manage Houston's response to hurricanes in Louisiana and East Texas, analysts said.

Mr. Wallace has a strong base in the Sugar Land area, and Mr. Campbell, a former general counsel for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, carries the cachet of having challenged Mr. DeLay in the primary.

Houston City Council member Shelley Sekula Gibbs, a dermatologist, also expressed interest but is considerably lower in profile.

Renegade Republican Steve Stockman, a former Congressman unseated by Mr. Lampson in his old Beaumont-based district, had expressed interest in mounting an independent candidacy before Mr. DeLay withdrew. There is also a Libertarian candidate, Bob Smither.

Just because Mr. Lampson has lost his main campaign issue doesn't mean his campaign is dead in the water, Dr. Murray said. He has $2 million contributed largely by national Democratic sources, and every day Mr. DeLay puts off his official departure is another day Mr. Lampson has the field to himself, Dr. Murray said.

Complicating the matter is the possibility that, before Mr. DeLay's successor is chosen, the U.S. Supreme Court could overturn the Texas congressional redistricting that Mr. DeLay engineered, raising another set of questions.

It's unclear when the Supreme Court will rule on a challenge to the plan Mr. DeLay put together to strengthen the GOP's hold on Texas' U.S. House delegation. But a decision could come as early as June, Dr. Stein said.

DOJ_NMG_0025439

If the high court returned Texas to the previous boundaries, that could scramble all Texas Congressional races. In the case of Mr. DeLay's district, it conceivably could send Mr. Lampson back to Beaumont to seek his old seat now held by Republican Ted Poe, Dr. Murray said.

There's also some risk for Mr. Perry, who is seeking re-election as governor, analysts said.

He faces possible sniping from gubernatorial election opponents if he doesn't call an emergency election. On the other hand, unless a clear consensus GOP choice for Mr. DeLay's seat emerges, he faces possible internal Republican friction that could hurt his own election bid, Dr. Murray said.

A Surprise Move Leaves Texas Politics In Disarray (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

HOUSTON, April 4 — Less than a month after Representative Tom DeLay boasted of giving Republican rivals "an old-fashioned Texas whoopin'," his surprise resignation threw state politics into turmoil Tuesday, with the prospect of an electoral free-for-all in coming months.

"Now it gets interesting," said Jared Woodfill, the Harris County Republican chairman, one of four party officials whose organizations will be faced with the job of selecting a nominee to replace Mr. DeLay on the ballot in November. Before that, however, a special election as soon as May could draw a large field of contenders eager to fill the 22nd District seat in Congress, if only for a few months.

Among Republicans already putting out feelers for a race are a high-ranking county judge, a tax assessor and collector, a councilwoman, a mayor and a state representative — as well as one of the three challengers Mr. DeLay boasted of "whoopin' " in the primary March 7.

"Yes, I am throwing my hat into the ring," said that candidate, Tom Campbell, a lawyer, who garnered 30 percent of the vote to Mr. DeLay's 62 percent, in a television interview Monday night.

Mr. DeLay, 58, the former majority leader, is under indictment in connection with campaign financing charges in Austin and is embroiled in the investigation of top aides and the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in Washington. He abandoned his quest for a 12th term, saying that recent polls had shown that his seat was in danger of falling to his Democratic challenger, former Representative Nick Lampson.

But after his primary victory he boasted of his 2-to-1 win and ridiculed The Houston Chronicle for a poll questioning his strength.

Interviewed Tuesday on KTRH radio in Houston, part of a blitz of broadcasting appearances, Mr. DeLay belittled his primary victory. "Well, to be honest with you, it should have been better," he said. "A 21-year incumbent should have done better than 62 percent."

He told Fox News that his departure was intended to hurt Mr. Lampson. "This is probably the worst day of his campaign because he knows that any Republican that replaces me on the ballot will win this seat," he said.

The comment drew ridicule from Mr. Lampson's campaign manager, Mike Malaise. "Leave it to Tom DeLay to spin the worst thing that ever happened to him to someone else's worst day," Mr. Malaise said.

The loss of Mr. DeLay as a fixture on the Texas scene seemed to surprise longtime friends and foes alike.

"I was looking forward to supporting Tom," said David G. Wallace, the mayor of Mr. DeLay's hometown, Sugar Land, outside Houston, and now a declared candidate for the seat.

Judge Robert Eckels, Harris County's top executive for a dozen years who presided with Mayor Bill White of Houston over the response to Hurricane Katrina, said he was exploring a run with mixed feelings. "I empathize with Tom," Judge Eckels said.

Others sounded bereft for less sympathetic reasons. "A whole bunch of us made our bones on DeLay," said Beverly Carter, a longtime Republican critic and founder of The Fort Bend Southwest Star in Sugar Land.

Jim Schermbeck, a documentary filmmaker from Lubbock whose film, "The Big Buy: How Tom DeLay Stole Congress," was scheduled to open in May, said he was not disappointed by the prospect of losing the congressman as a target, but might put off the release to update the material.

DOJ_NMG_0025440

"It's hard to imagine Tom DeLay taking a low profile," Mr. Schermbeck said.

And Paul Burka, the political columnist of Texas Monthly, was in the middle of writing an 8,500-word cover story on Mr. DeLay. "Now," Mr. Burka said, "half the words were no good."

Mr. DeLay repeatedly linked his resignation to what he portrayed as a political vendetta by the Travis County district attorney, Ronnie Earle, who obtained the indictment on money laundering charges that forced Mr. DeLay to give up his majority leadership last fall.

Mr. Earle issued a short statement Tuesday, saying: "Tom DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him. This changes nothing. His criminal cases will proceed just as they would for any other defendant. DeLay's ultimate fate will be decided by the public acting through a jury."

The process to fill the remainder of Mr. DeLay's term until January is convoluted. As the only way to be removed from the ballot is by dying, going to jail or moving out of the district, Mr. DeLay must send a letter to Gov. Rick Perry advising of his move to Virginia.

The governor — who may not appoint a temporary representative — can then call a special election concurrent with the regular November election, to fill the post for just two months. Or the governor can declare an emergency and order an election before then, to take place 36 to 50 days from the call. Anyone may run, but if no candidate wins 50 percent, the two top vote-getters compete in a runoff a month later.

To replace Mr. DeLay as the Republican nominee in November, the several dozen Republican precinct chairmen and chairwomen in the sections of the four counties making up the 22nd District each choose a county elector. The four electors then select the party standard-bearer.

Many Show Interest In Seat (HC)

By Kristen Mack and Zeke Minaya

Houston Chronicle, April 5, 2006

Familiar and lesser-known political names emerged Monday night as possible contenders for the congressional seat being vacated by Republican U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay.

Those who acknowledged interest in the seat or were mentioned as contenders included Harris County Judge Robert Eckels, state Rep. Robert Talton, Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs, former state District Judge John Devine and lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran against DeLay in the March Republican Primary.

Harris County Republican Party Chairman Jared Woodfill said he started receiving calls from interested officials within minutes of hearing the news of DeLay's decision.

"Numerous people have called me inquiring about the seat," he said.

Other phones also were ringing as politicians gauged potential support or heard from backers.

"I've had a number of calls this evening. I'll visit with my family and look at the process," Eckels said. "I do have an interest in at least looking at the race."

He said that his experience coordinating the local response to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita left him frustrated with the federal government and its impact on local issues.

Sugar Land Mayor Wallace said he got wind of DeLay's decision over the weekend and began organizing a campaign.

"I'm running for that spot," Wallace said Monday night.

"It is going to be a sprint. We have been working this weekend and today kind of organizing our campaign making sure we pull together a grass-roots team," Wallace said.

Wallace said he will have to take his name off the ballot for the upcoming mayor's race.

He was elected mayor in 2002 after serving as a council member for one year.

Sekula-Gibbs, who lives in Clear Lake, said she has received several calls from local Republicans asking her if she would be interested in the seat.

"I'm saddened that the congressman has decided to step down, but I'm interested in the position," she said. "I'm definitely giving it very serious consideration."

DOJ_NMG_0025441

Campbell, who came in a distant second with 30 percent of the vote in the March primary, said he still wants the position.

"I believe that Tom DeLay did the right thing in stepping aside and allowing the Republican Party to move forward," Campbell said.

"This is vindication of our political process," Campbell said. "Ethics and integrity do in fact matter and the people who voted on those issues spoke and have been heard."

A special election to fill the remainder of DeLay's term likely will be held on the next uniform election date, which is in May. Gov. Rick Perry will set the date.

It was unclear Monday night how Republicans will select a November nominee to replace DeLay, who won the GOP primary in March.

"We've never had this happen in a congressional race," Woodfill said. "We'll have a little bit of time to figure it out. We have our lawyers looking at it."

At issue is whether the responsibility for selecting a nominee falls to the 62-member state Republican Executive Committee or to GOP officials in the five counties that lie partly within the 22nd Congressional District.

"It's in our best interest to choose a nominee before the special election. Otherwise, the election is going to be a free-for-all," Woodfill said. "The situation you don't want is for our nominee to be someone different than the person who runs for the special."

DeLay is expected to resign officially sometime after April 7 and move to Virginia to work with a conservative organization.

That would make him ineligible to run despite his nomination, opening the way for party officials to select another nominee, Woodfill said.

Former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson is the Democratic nominee for the seat. Lampson's campaign manager Mike Malaise said Lampson's plans have not changed.

"Our challenge was always to get Nick's message out there," Malaise said. "We've got $2.5 million in the bank to help us do that. The other side is going to be playing catch-up to us in that regard."

"We don't know who our opponent will be. It's unrealistic to say that Republicans have it in the bag."

Malaise said Lampson hasn't decided whether to run in the special election, and isn't sure DeLay legally can withdraw from the November ballot.

Fort Bend County GOP Chairman Eric Thode said he was not informed of DeLay's decision and that it took him and other county officials by surprise.

"I think they clearly have come to the conclusion that the race was going to be horribly difficult, ugly and expensive," he said.

Thode said he thinks Republicans will hold on to the seat.

"He (Lampson) could probably not have defeated Tom DeLay. However, against a Republican with zero baggage the race is over already," Thode said.

Republican Contenders Eye DeLay's Seat (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

DALLAS -- Within hours of Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement yesterday that he would not seek re-election to Congress, several Republicans began jockeying for position to represent the party and Houston's 22 District.

Two potential candidates seem to lead at this point: Harris County Judge Robert Echols and Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace. Both are well-known in the district, and both have expressed strong interest in running.

Most political analysts think that whoever gets the nod from the party has an excellent chance to win in November in the Republican-leaning district.

Jared Woodfill, chairman of the Harris County Republican Party, said Mr. Echols would have to be considered the favorite because of his lengthy public career and resulting name recognition.

"You'd have to handicap it in his favor," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0025442

Mr. Echols, along with Houston Mayor Bill White, received plaudits for co-managing what was considered a very successful Houston program to assist evacuees from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last fall.

Although choosing a candidate for the ballot may be a tough decision for Republicans, Gov. Rick Perry has an even more pressing problem -- whether to call a special election to fill Mr. DeLay's unexpired term. Mr. DeLay said yesterday that he would make his resignation effective sometime before mid-June.

Along with Mr. Wallace and Mr. Echols, Sugar Land lawyer Tom Campbell, who ran a distant second to Mr. DeLay in the March primary, has expressed an interest in running.

Others mentioned by political analysts as possible candidates include State Sen. Kyle Janek and state Rep. Martha Wong, both of Houston.

Chris Bell, Democratic nominee for governor who lost his congressional seat during Mr. DeLay's 2003 redistricting efforts, called the resignation "a victory."

"Tom DeLay's resignation is a great victory in the fight to clean up corruption in politics, but the war is far from over," said Mr. Bell, adding, "The culture of corruption is about a heck of a lot more than Tom DeLay."

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who brought charges of money laundering and conspiracy against Mr. DeLay last year, had little to say about the congressman's announcement.

Mr. Earle refused to answer telephone calls, but released a terse statement yesterday, "Mr. DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him, and this changes nothing."

Frontrunner: Wallace Launches Bid For DeLay's Seat (TIME)

By Hilary Hylton

Time, April 4, 2006

Congressman Tom DeLay's decision to leave the seat he has held for 22 years may have surprised many state and even local GOP leaders, as well as Democrats. But even before the embattled Texas congressman was revealing his decision to TIME in an exclusive interview, at least one potential Republican successor was already maneuvering to assume his seat. Late Monday night Sugar Land Mayor David G. Wallace,44, a popular second-term city leader whose name is on the ballot for a third term in the May 13 municipal elections, confirmed that he would make a bid for the seat.

Wallace said he had heard rumbles about DeLay's decision over the weekend, and his mayoral reelection website was pulled down for a redesign immediately after the DeLay announcement. Other insiders said they had been hearing rumors about DeLay's tight poll numbers as far back as December. Central Texas Republican Congressman John Carter told the Austin American-Statesman that a week ago DeLay had mentioned his "troubling" poll numbers that showed him in a neck-and-neck battle with his likely opponent in November, former Democratic Congressman Nick Lampson.

In an early morning videotape released to his Texas constituency, DeLay said, "I refuse to allow liberal Democrats to steal this seat with a negative personal campaign." But while his departure may be designed to take the national spotlight off the race for Texas's 22nd congressional district, it could still draw national attention, especially since Wallace's candidacy could reignite some bad blood that flared during the Bush-Kerry campaign.

Wallace now serves as investment committee chairman for Perry Properties Realty Investment Fund & Perry Properties, a commercial real estate company owned by Will Perry, son of Houston area homebuilder Bob Perry, a top Republican fundraiser in Texas who has enjoyed a long friendship with Karl Rove. Bob Perry made national news when he donated $200,000 to fund the controversial Swiftboat Veterans for Truth ads that challenged Senator John Kerry's war record during the presidential campaign.

In recent days, Bob Perry has been back in the news again for a gift to Bill Ceverha, the former treasurer of Texas Republicans for a Republican Majority (TRMPAC), the political action committee at the heart of Texas District Attorney Ronnie Earle's investigation of DeLay's funding for redistricting efforts. Ceverha is the only one, so far, found culpable in a civil suit for TRMPAC's alleged illegal maneuvers. Perry helped Ceverha pay his legal fees and, as a member of a state pension board, Ceverha was obliged to report the gift. The Texas Ethics Commission, to the chagrin of several Texas newspaper editorial pages, has said Ceverha does not need to detail the exact amount of the check.

DOJ_NMG_0025443

In addition to many influential Texas Republican backers, Wallace has personal connections to one of the icons of the conservative movement, Baroness Margaret Thatcher, the former British prime minister. He did post-graduate work at the University of Reading in England and was a founding treasurer and director of the Margaret Thatcher Foundation. In Dallas, he served as CEO of The Grantham Company, the investment firm founded by Thatcher's son Mark and named for the legendary prime minister's home district of Grantham in London.

Wallace is not the only Texas Republican expressing an interest in DeLay's seat. Harris County Judge Bob Eckels, the chief executive officer for the county that includes most of the metropolitan Houston area, may make a run, as well as Houston attorney Tom Campbell, who won 30 percent of the vote in the March primary against DeLay. But given his personal and political connections, Wallace appears to have a jump on the others.

The actual date of DeLay's resignation and its confirmation by the Texas Secretary of State will determine when an election for the seat will be held. If DeLay officially resigns before this Friday, April 7, a special election could be called for the next so-called uniform election date, May 13. If the resignation falls after April 7, Gov. Rick Perry (no relation to Bob Perry) could call a special election date later, or could hold the seat vacant until the general election in November.

In that case, a special election would be open to all comers, but it will be up to GOP officials to name a candidate to replace DeLay's name on the November general election ballot. In this scenario, any GOP winner in an earlier special election would probably have an edge.

Meanwhile, it is likely that DeLay's pending move of his legal residence to Alexandria, Virginia, will not effect his trial on campaign finance irregularities. (His move out of the state is how DeLay is making himself ineligible for reelection.) "Mr. DeLay's political status has nothing to do with the criminal charges against him, and this changes nothing," Earle told the Austin American-Statesman Monday night. On the other hand, the criminal charges may have a lot to do with his political status, and as the political jockeying already under way in Texas makes abundantly clear, DeLay's exit will change everything.

From DeLay To November (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 5, 2006

Tom DeLay's decision to resign from Congress removes one large Republican liability this election year, but it hardly ends the party's political vulnerability. One pressing question is whether the GOP majority is going to use the few productive weeks it has left to establish a 2006 record and 2007 agenda that are worthy of re-election.

Recent evidence is not reassuring. GOP leaders seem determined to avoid any meaningful legislative fights, lest their own internal fissures show. Instead, they're promising to make the election a "choice" -- rather than a referendum on their own governance -- and thus mobilize voters by claiming that Democrats would be worse: that they'd raise taxes, impeach President Bush and cut and run from Iraq if they win. And as a desperation strategy, fear does sometimes work.

On the other hand, the biggest Republican problem now is the demoralization of their own voters. Their lack of meaningful achievements this Congress (beyond the two Supreme Court Justices), all of their spending, and troubles in Iraq have left conservative voters wondering what the point is to voting for the GOP. If Republicans want their supporters to show up on election day, they'll need more of a message than wearing a "Speaker Nancy Pelosi" fright mask.

May we suggest a Plan B? How about at least fighting for the agenda that elected them the last time? It's obvious at this stage of the 109th Congress that little will actually become law, especially with Democrats able to filibuster in the Senate. But if Republicans were seen to be fighting for some principles, voters might actually decide it's worth showing up on November 7.

Here are a few ideas, none of them new, but all of them worth accomplishing:

Taxes. We hear that the House-Senate conference to extend the 15% capital gains and dividend rates isn't even meeting. This is inexplicable. The one large domestic success of the Bush years has been the post-bubble, post-9/11 economic revival, yet Republicans seem blasé about extending the tax cuts that did so much to spur it. A failure here would hurt the stock market and demoralize economic conservatives.

While they're at it, force the Senate to vote on death-tax repeal. Republicans may not get 60 votes, but if they come close enough they may be able to get Senator Jon Kyl's compromise that would cut the rate to 15%, from nearly 50% today, and raise the exemption above $10 million or so.

DOJ_NMG_0025444

Reform Congressional budgeting, by passing the line-item veto and ending static revenue scoring at the Joint Tax Committee. Another good idea is the effort by Arizonans Jeff Flake in the House and John McCain in the Senate to end earmark abuse. A return to some spending self-discipline will count for much more with conservative voters than will "lobbying reform," which is a Beltway trope designed by the same crowd that promoted the "campaign-finance reform" that empowered George Soros.

Health-care choice. Congressman John Shadegg (R., Ariz.) has a bill to let Americans purchase affordable health insurance from any of the 50 states, thus bypassing state mandates that drive up insurance costs in New York and many other places. Another idea would let associations form health-care risk pools for their members, thus giving small business owners and the self-employed the same tax-preferred insurance options that big business and unions have now. These proposals would address a top voter priority and steal a march on Democrats.

Endangered Species Act reform. This is a huge issue in the West, where ESA rules drive property owners crazy. Congressman Richard Pombo (R., Calif.) has a bipartisan proposal that would require the federal government to compensate property owners for regulatory "takings" due to wetlands preservation or endangered species limits on development. The Senate probably wouldn't pass it, but the issue could be potent in key Congressional contests this fall.

We can think of other ideas, such as fighting for appellate-court nominees in the Senate, and defending the President's anti-terror agenda, especially the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretaps. But the larger point is for Republicans to show that they are willing to fight for something.

Some Republicans seem to believe that debating any of these issues will help Democrats "nationalize" the election, which will hurt them because of Mr. Bush's low approval ratings. But a Congressman is not a dog catcher, and some kind of national agenda is what voters expect of someone they'll be sending to Washington. With the Abramoff scandal likely to keep making headlines, Republicans need something to motivate their voters. Policy will trump scandal, but only if Republicans look like they want to achieve something real.

On election night in 2004, Democratic campaign consultant James Carville asked: Where did all these Republican voters come from? Unless Republicans set a new legislative course over the next seven months, a deposed House Speaker Denny Hastert may soon be wondering: Where did all the Republican voters go?

Exit Tom DeLay (WP)

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

IT'S A MEASURE of Tom DeLay's diminished political circumstances that those most unhappy about his abandoning his House seat are the Democrats who most revile him. "This is probably the worst day of his campaign," Mr. DeLay, speaking on Fox News yesterday, said with an air of grim satisfaction of his Democratic opponent, former representative Nick Lampson. The Texas Republican had been repeatedly admonished by the House ethics committee; he is under indictment in Texas on charges of funneling illegal corporate contributions to state legislators; and he is entangled in a federal probe that has produced guilty pleas from two of his former staffers. It's much tougher for Democrats to flog their "culture of corruption" message when they can no longer kick around "Representative #2," as he's been identified in the charges against his former aides.

In truth, the DeLay reign ended in January, when Mr. DeLay permanently relinquished his position as majority leader. But his departure from the body in which he's served since 1985 offers a chance to reflect on Mr. DeLay's legacy for House Republicans -- and on the challenge that confronts them in the post-DeLay era. As New York Times op-ed columnist David Brooks put it just before Mr. DeLay left the leadership, "the real problem wasn't DeLay, it was DeLayism." That was shorthand for a political culture that put a premium on bringing in campaign cash, that dismantled barriers between the Capitol and K Street lobbyists, and that disdained debate and dissent as the GOP entrenched itself as a would-be permanent majority.

DeLayism meant keeping a book on the partisan breakdown of political contributions from lobbyists labeled "friendly" and "unfriendly." It meant strong-arming a trade group not to hire a former Democratic congressman and enlisting Federal Aviation Administration officials to track down Democrats fleeing a vote in the Texas state legislature aimed at cementing Republicans' hold on the House. Mr. DeLay offered to endorse the son of retiring Rep. Nick Smith (R-Mich.) in exchange for Mr. Smith's vote in favor of the Medicare prescription drug bill. In Mr. DeLay's House, money was king: Members had to raise so much for chairmanships, so much for leadership posts. He presided over a sprawling financial empire of leadership PACs, nonprofit groups, charitable foundations and campaign committees that at least pushed the envelope of campaign finance laws, if not outright violating them, as Texas prosecutors allege.

DOJ_NMG_0025445

Mr. DeLay in his heyday got a lot done, but at a terrible cost to the institution -- and, we would argue, the party -- that he helped lead. Will the new leadership be more respectful of the rights of the minority, more willing to permit debate on the House floor, more willing to restrict cushy travel and other perks? That's far from clear. The gushing statements yesterday from Mr. DeLay's replacement as leader, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) -- "one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known . . . has served our nation with integrity and honor" -- reflected not much embarrassment about Mr. DeLay, nor about DeLayism.

The Fall Of The Hammer (NYT)

The New York Times, April 5, 2006

Like the rise and fall of many a pugnacious politician, the case of Representative Tom DeLay, the pest exterminator turned power broker, is certainly spellbinding for its individual drama. But it is more important to note that Mr. DeLay's political demise hardly ends the influence-peddling culture to which he devoted himself. The DeLay machine's tooth-and-claw approach to politics lives on, from the Texas delegation he brazenly gerrymandered to his quid pro quo debasing of the lobbying industry.

Across two decades in Congress, Mr. DeLay pushed every limit of his power base to the extreme. He was ultimately indicted on charges of laundering the easy corporate money of Washington for use in Texas politics to win a statehouse majority and gerrymander Texas Democrats into a permanent minority. The DeLay brand of bare-knuckled triumphalism was clearly an enabling factor in the separate scandal that has prompted the indictment of two of his former lieutenants and his erstwhile ally, Jack Abramoff, the disgraced superlobbyist.

Incredibly, the G.O.P. majority Mr. DeLay dominated with a mix of campaign lucre and whiplash fear has shown no resolve to face up to his damaging legacy. Last January's vows for ethics and lobbying reform lie fallow in the House, as if the majority is gambling that voters won't notice. Republicans leaders would be foolish to think the departure of Mr. DeLay removes the obvious need to enact strong ethics enforcement and lobbying controls.

In the smarmy self-justification of Mr. DeLay's statement yesterday, he said he wanted to avoid a "referendum on me" in November. But, of course, that's exactly what the nation needs as voters come to consider a Congress deeply embedded in the easy money and easier ethics of the DeLay era.

DeLay Loses Principle, Then Power (USAT)

USA Today, April 5, 2006

Former majority leader Tom DeLay's decision to resign from Congress has given House Democrats a reason to rejoice. For more than a decade, the Texas Republican infuriated and outmaneuvered them, making them feel the acute pain of their powerlessness.

But perhaps it's the Republicans who should be the most gleeful. They'll be rid of the most potent symbol of Washington arrogance and corruption.

And perhaps DeLay's departure from the House of Representatives will give them leeway to pursue needed changes in the ways ethics are enforced and campaigns are financed.

DeLay's sorry legacy can be measured in many ways. An obvious place to start is the long list of scandals surrounding him: the guilty pleas of former friends and associates, his own indictment in Texas, and the three instances in which he was admonished by the House ethics committee (before he dismembered it).

But there are other measures as well. Through his strong-arm tactics, DeLay acted in ways contrary to long-held Republican principles. He engineered President Clinton's impeachment in a fashion more vindictive than conservative.

He was a chief architect of the biggest expansion of government since the New Deal, most notably forcing through the Medicare drug law by holding open a 15-minute roll call for almost three hours while he twisted arms.

DeLay also championed federal legislation pre-empting states' rights in areas as diverse as business regulation and the sad case of Terri Schiavo.

DOJ_NMG_0025446

These scandals and dubious legislative accomplishments have a common root. They are what happens when congressional leaders come to see the acquisition, maintenance and discharge of power as a goal itself rather than as means to achieve something broader for the public's benefit.

DeLay, an ex-exterminator nicknamed "The Hammer," was not so much a political thinker as he was the CEO of an enterprise designed to reward Republicans and sustain their majority.

He helped them raise the money they needed to be elected and re-elected. He turned his office into a concierge service for GOP members. He pressured lobbying firms to hire only Republicans. He even rewrote Texas' congressional boundaries, and the GOP picked up six seats from the Democrats.

For much of his time in power, his fellow Republicans loved him for this. And why wouldn't they? The GOP was riding high, and the system was rigged in their favor. But the enterprise lacked, and it sent out a message that virtually any behavior was OK so long as it benefited the GOP.

Now that any chance of DeLay's restoration to power has been eliminated, the attention should shift to the corrupt system he leaves behind. DeLay was simply its most egregiously able practitioner.

Nothing will be gained if his successor as House majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, simply becomes the new CEO of the enterprise.

Out Of The House, Not Out Of Trouble (WP)

By Cris Feldman

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

In announcing yesterday that he was dropping out of the race to keep his seat in Congress, Tom DeLay said he now intends to "engage in the important cultural and political battles of our day from outside the arena of the House of Representatives." Before he does that, though, he still faces a more immediate battle in another arena -- a Texas courtroom.

Ever since a grand jury in Austin indicted him on charges of laundering corporate cash to influence Texas's 2002 elections, DeLay has dismissed the action as a purely political act by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat. But a review of the law and the facts in this case suggest otherwise.

The centerpiece of the Texas indictments is Texans for a Republican Majority PAC (TRMPAC), which DeLay founded and which his operatives ran, with the paid assistance of his daughter. DeLay himself headlined fundraisers, made fundraising calls, participated in strategic planning and conference calls, and personally collected corporate checks.

In a recent TRMPAC civil trial, the court ruled that the PAC illegally accepted and spent $532,333 in corporate cash and violated Texas law by not reporting it. Included within the illegal $532,333 was $190,000 that TRMPAC sent to the Republican National Committee in September 2002. The defense in the civil trial explicitly sought exoneration for this transaction, and it failed.

Here are the known facts. On Sept. 10, 2002, DeLay's co-defendant, John Colyandro, sent a blank check overnight to co-defendant Jim Ellis. On Sept. 13, 2002, Ellis handed over the check in question to the RNC. According to the indictment, Ellis filled in the check for $190,000 and provided the RNC with a list of seven candidates for the Texas House, along with designated sums of cash. On Sept. 20 the $190,000 was deposited by the RNC in a corporate cash account. On the morning of Oct. 2, Ellis met with DeLay at DeLay's Capitol office. That same day the RNC generated seven internal memos requesting seven different checks to the TRMPAC candidates. On Oct. 4 seven checks totaling $190,000 were cut from a noncorporate account containing millions of dollars. The check numbers were in sequential order, 7470 through 7476.

DeLay argues that the RNC sent money to state legislature candidates across the country. Yet the seven Texas TRMPAC candidates received checks ranging from $20,000 to $40,000, whereas the next-largest RNC contribution to a candidate for a seat in a state house of representatives was $2,000. DeLay has also said that the $190,000 was "left over" money that TRMPAC did not need. But numerous documents indicate otherwise. For example, on Oct. 20, 2002, Warren Robold, TRMPAC's now-indicted fundraiser, solicited a donor by stating, "We still need $125,000 of corporate funds to finish the project and pay our obligations."

DOJ_NMG_0025447

DeLay's attacks on the prosecutor have been consistent, even as explanations of his own conduct have proved inconsistent. DeLay has said at different times that he knew about the $190,000 beforehand; that he heard about it after the fact; and that he did indeed discuss it with Ellis on Oct. 2, 2002.

Corporate contributions to candidates in Texas are illegal. To make such a contribution is a third-degree felony. A contribution is considered to be the direct or indirect transfer of money, including the agreement to make such a transfer. If DeLay in any way participated in an agreement to indirectly transfer $190,000 in corporate cash to Texas candidates, he still has a problem back in Texas.

The writer is an attorney in Austin. He was on the civil trial team that won a ruling last spring finding that TRMPAC illegally raised, spent and failed to report corporate contributions in Texas.

After DeLay, A New Approach? (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, April 5, 2006

Symbolically as well as practically, the departure of Tom DeLay from Congress signals the end of an era of Republican dominance. The question now is whether the retreat that clearly has begun will turn into a rout.

The former House majority leader's decision to abandon what increasingly appeared to be an uphill fight for reelection in his Texas district and retire from the House was the latest and by far the largest consequence of a widening probe of corruption on Capitol Hill.

It is one thing to see a Randy "Duke" Cunningham go to jail for bribery. Few outside his San Diego district had ever heard the name of the former Navy "Top Gun" before his spectacular downfall. Tom DeLay is a target of far larger size.

As prosecutors have extracted guilty pleas from lobbyists close to DeLay and former members of his staff, the ripples of scandal have threatened to spread through Republican ranks in the midterm election. Month after month, surveys are showing Democrats with a double-digit lead over the GOP in the voters' preference for which party should control Congress.

Whether that translates to the specific victories needed to give Democrats an extra 15 seats and a narrow House majority cannot be guessed. But the relief his fellow Republicans expressed that they can now recruit a fresh and presumably unscarred candidate in DeLay's Republican-leaning district shows how nervous they are about holding on to the House.

It is almost as if they hope that by sacrificing their erstwhile commander, they can appease the public demand for change.

As much as Newt Gingrich embodied the aggressive strategy that enabled Republicans in 1994 to break the Democrats' 40-year grip on the House, DeLay was the man who showed them how to consolidate -- and use -- their new power. As whip and then as majority leader, he built the GOP fundraising and policy alliance with the business lobbies and social conservative movements, then used that leverage to impose party-line discipline on almost every key vote.

It was a commanding performance, and one that yielded a series of policy victories for President Bush. By putting the House Republican majority in lock step with the White House, DeLay made it possible for Bush to prevail, not only over the outnumbered Democrats but also over the doubts harbored by some Senate Republicans about his agenda.

But DeLay also paid a price for his hardball tactics -- and his tendency to push against the legal limits. He was admonished repeatedly by the House ethics committee. He faces prosecution in Texas over the financing of campaigns that delivered the Texas House of Representatives to his allies, who in turn engineered a redistricting plan that gave Republicans five more seats in Congress. His palling around with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff is still under investigation.

With DeLay's departure, the Democrats lose their most convenient symbol of abuse of power by the Republican majority -- but they have not lost the issue. DeLay's successor as majority leader, John Boehner of Ohio, continues to manage the House on the same partisan basis, looking for votes almost exclusively on his own side of the aisle and declining to offer Democrats any incentives to cooperate.

And that raises an interesting challenge for the new White House chief of staff, Josh Bolten. If he is the realist that his admirers believe, he has to acknowledge the odds that there will be fewer Republicans in Congress after November than there are today -- and perhaps not a majority.

DOJ_NMG_0025448

In the House, Speaker Dennis Hastert is headed into what is probably his final term before retirement, shorn now of the support and day-to-day managerial muscle of the man who installed him as speaker, Tom DeLay. That means that if the Republicans maintain control, a lame-duck speaker will be working to deliver votes for a lame-duck president.

That could spell an awfully difficult -- and unproductive -- final two years for the Bush presidency, unless the White House finds a different approach to Capitol Hill.

The old game of muscling bills through by rounding up Republican votes through a combination of political and financial force -- the game at which Tom DeLay excelled -- is over. The question for the White House is whether it can come up with a different strategy that looks for support from at least some Democrats.

It needs that already in the Senate. And it will probably need it in the House.

Tom DeLay — A Man Of Consequence (WT)

By Tony Blankley

The Washington Times, April 5, 2006

A couple of days ago, Tom DeLay announced he would resign his Texas seat in Congress by June. His announced departure from office has induced the normal Washington hypocrisies. Democrats express delight but are actually disappointed, as his Texas congressional seat is more likely to now stay Republican and they won't have Tom DeLay to kick around any more.

Republicans express sorrow, but are actually relieved not to have him as an albatross around their party neck. And as someone who has crossed paths (and sometimes swords) with Tom ever since I started as Newt Gingrich's press secretary in 1990, I am of mixed feelings.

I first met him in early 1990, just after Newt had been elected Republican minority whip in the House of Representative. Tom had been doing the vote counting for Newt's opponent, Illinois congressman Ed Madigan — the candidate of the old Republican House establishment. Newt was — as always — the insurgent candidate.

Tom DeLay had come to make up with Newt after picking the losing side. Tom offered his loyalty in good faith, and Newt accepted it in good faith. They had never been close, but they were both smart conservative congressmen with common policy and party goals. Tom became an invaluable political ally and warrior for the Newt-led insurgent House Republicans.

